During the past year there were destroyed in the different provinces in Sweden the following number of animals of prey: 144 bears, 536 wolves, 316 lynxes, 7,892 foxes, 2,505 eagles, and other ravenous birds. This was exclusive of the slaughter by private hunting parties.

Horrible! A Nova Scotia paper informs us that a house was lately burnt in Western Bay, Newfoundland, and melancholy to relate, six children, the only inmates at the time, were burnt to cinders! The parents were absent in another part of the island.

Great fall of snow throughout France. There had been much snow, more especially in the south of France. This happening before the close of October is deemed a rare occurrence. At Toulon and Marseilles the mountains were covered, and there were severe gales on the coast. The roads were so choked up with the snow, Oct. 29, at Marseilles, that the diligence was detained some time. The olives are not injured, and no serious injury to the vintage is apprehended, as experience proves that the light frosts usual at the beginning of November gives a desirable flavor to the grapes of Saint Cyr, Les Coteaux and Breze, which are rarely gathered till after All Saints Day. At Caen in the north of France the snow was a foot deep.

Joseph Bonaparte is expected to leave London early in the spring, on his return to the United States, his residence at Bordentown, in the state of New Jersey, being ordered to be prepared for his arrival.

Mr. Day, the celebrated blacking manufacturer, who died lately in London, has by his will, bearing date immediately after the marriage of his daughter with Mr. H. Clagget left to her a life interest in £4,000 a year, payable to her receipt alone, and £2,000 a year to Mrs. Day. These sums to go in equal divisions, after their respective deaths, to his nephews and nieces, whom he has appointed residuary legatees to his estate, amounting to £450,000; the business in Holborn is ordered to be sold.

Southey, the English poet Laureate, has sent a poetical contribution to the Knickerbocker—being his first appearance as a contributor to an American periodical.

The honors of war. In the hotel des invalids, at Paris, there were 3,200 old soldiers and 300 officers—the blind, withered and lame of the grand armies of France. Many of these old braves are fond reading, and an interesting spectacle is often witnessed in the library-room connected with the institution. There is one old soldier who can read very well; but having lost both his arms, he is unable to hold a book. There is another who has both his hands, but has lost his eyes. They were often seen together, the blind man holding a book, which the other reads aloud for the benefit of both.

The old heavy French diligences, which go along at the jog trot of some seven miles the hour—always safe by their solidity, and always behind hand by their ponderosity—are about to be exploded.—Lord H. Seymour, under the patronage of the French government, is about to introduce that perfection of travelling by horse flesh, a line of English stage coaches, and relays of English horses, between the French coast and Paris. Rail roads will soon supersede them all.

DOMESTIC CHRONICLE.

A coach made of the wood of the Constitution.—A beautiful coach has been built entirely of the wood of the old frigate Constitution, at Amherst, in Massachusetts. It is intended, as we are informed, for a new year's present to general Jackson, and was paid for by the contributions of several gentlemen of this city. It is now at Washington, packed in a large box from which it will be taken on new year's morning. [N. Y. Post.]

The Virginia house of delegates has before it a case of contempt. One of its members, Mr. Scott, of Powhattan, being, as he thought, insulted by a witness named Hopkins, who was testifying before a committee of the house, struck him—a struggle ensued, which the members present soon put an end to. Subsequently it was renewed at the door of the house, and thereupon both parties were taken into custody by the sergeant-at-arms. Mr. Hopkins is contesting the seat of Mr. Scott.

New banking institution. The New York Express of yesterday informs us that it is in contemplation by a number of wealthy individuals, of that city, to apply to the legislature for the privilege of banking: that they design to issue no notes, or if any, not of a less denomination than fifty or a hundred dollars, to be responsible in their private fortunes. Their business will be confined to receiving deposits and discounting notes after the English plan. This mode, adds the Express, will be generally acceptable to all parties.

The court of inquiry at Frederick, have adjourned, in order to give time for the arrival of witnesses and the arranging of documents, to 4th proximo.

The suit instituted against the Boston and Providence rail road company, by the United States seamen who were injured by two locomotives coming in contact some months ago, was to be tried on Monday at Dedham, before the court of common pleas. The passed midshipman, has laid his damages at $10,000.

Flogging to death at sea. The Boston Post states that captain Otis Taylor, of the brig Martha Theresa, has been held to bail in that city, for flogging John Wilson, one of his crew, so that he died.—Wilson, it seems, deserted during the voyage and was recaptured a fortnight afterwards, and seized up in the main rigging, and two dozen lashes were inflicted on his back by captain T. He was then put in irons; next morning he was again flogged, receiving a dozen each, from the 1st and 2d mate. He was again put in irons for a fortnight, and kept on bread and water. He became sick and died in about three weeks after the floggings. A heavy twelve tailed cat was used, he had his shirt on when punished. Captain T. obtained his bail, and was liberated from custody. [N. Y. Transcript.]

New article of furniture. A New York Yankee has invented an improved bee hive, which is said to have the appearance of and to be, in fact, a mahogany side-board, with drawers above, and a closet below, with glass doors, to be placed in the chamber of a house, and to be connected with the open air by a tube passing through the wall. The operations of the bees are clearly seen through the glass doors, and the honey is deposited in the drawers.

A Utica paper of Dec. 20, says—"Cox, the porter of the Oneida bank, who has been imprisoned for some time past, on suspicion of having robbed the bank, was called up before the grand jury last week, and after a full investigation was acquitted, the jury as we have been informed, giving him a certificate that there was no evidence against him."

The president of the United States has recognized Carlos Dudley Head, esq. as vice consul of the Oriental republic of Uruguay, for the port of New Orleans.

A resolution has passed the senate of South Carolina, authorizing a subscription of one million of dollars to the stock of the Charleston and Cincinnati rail road company.

The news of gen. Santa Ana, president of the United States of Mexico, being on his way to Washington, city is confirmed. He was at Plaquemine, on the Mississippi, on the 12th instant, and was to ascend the river the same day on his way thither.

We learn by the Indiana Journal, that a joint resolution has been introduced in the legislature of that state, opposed to the annexation of Texas to the United States. It has passed a second reading, and is expected to produce an interesting discussion when taken up for its final passage.

Dr. Bird, author of the Gladiator, &c. has been elected a member of the Dramatic Authors' society of London.

A United States frigate was seen on the 24th, sixty miles south of the capes of Virginia. The Potomac from the Mediterranean, and Brandywine from the Pacific are both daily expected.

The Bowery theatre in New York, lately destroyed by fire, has been rebuilt, and is to be reopened on Monday night next.

The brig Monrovia, captain Kelly, from Philadelphia, arrived at the port of Lagaira, on the 23d November, a distance direct of about 1,900 miles, in the remarkable passage of nine days.

The brig Boxota, captain Clear, which arrived at New York on Monday from St. Croix, performed her voyage in the remarkably short space of twenty-seven days! She made her passage out in 9, and home in 12 days.

The foot race in Augusta. From a gentleman, passenger on the rail road, we were informed that the foot race on the Augusta race course, for $3,000 aside, distance 50 yards, between Perret, a Georgian, and Day, a Kentuckian, took place on Saturday last, and resulted in favor of the former—beating Day by near six feet. The time, as near as our informant could recollect, 4 seconds. The course was crowded, and much betting on the result.

Chief clerk in the state department. Aaron Ogden Dayton has been appointed to this office, in the place of Mr. Dickens, chosen secretary of the senate.

The Tradesmen's bank of New York has declared a dividend of seven per cent. for the last six months, and the bank of America a dividend of five per cent.

The Harrisburgh Telegraph of Friday says: One track of the Harrisburgh and Lancaster rail road is now completed, with the exception of a short distance at the tunnel, and locomotives are expected to commence running on it to-day. This road makes the distance between this place and Lancaster three miles less than the turnpike, and will be one of the finest as well as the straightest roads in the union. Hereafter passengers will be able to travel to and from Harrisburgh to Philadelphia by rail road and by daylight. The tunnel will be completed early next summer.

THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS. In the present sheet we have published the speeches of Messrs. Peyton and Ripley on Mr. Wise's resolution relative to an inquiry into the administration of the executive departments: and will hereafter publish at least two more speeches on the same subject, one on each side, that a full and impartial record may be preserved.

MR. EWING OF OHIO. We regret to learn from the "Intelligencer" of yesterday, that this gentleman left Washington on Wednesday evening last in consequence of afflictive intelligence received from home.

MAJ. GATES. We also learn from the "Intelligencer" that among the business transacted in the executive session of the senate of yesterday, was the confirmation of major GATES to a re-appointment to his rank in the army, from which he had been stricken by the president of the United States, and subsequently nominated for restoration for the purpose of affording him the privilege of trial by a court martial.

ELECTORS OF PRESIDENT. It appears that several states have elected electors who are disqualified for that office in consequence of holding offices under the United States. Several are specified among the electors of New York, one among those of Massachusetts, and of those of New Hampshire, two or three, out of her seven electors, are said to be illegally chosen. The present is a most propitious period rigidly to enforce the constitutional provision, and we hope both parties will unite in doing so. Such a "purging of the polls" will not vary the result; and even if it would, it is due to ourselves and those who come after us to show our respect for the express declarations of the constitution, or we may establish a precedent of a most dangerous character.

The following is the provision of the constitution on the subject:

Article 2, sec. 1, ¶ 2. Each state shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of senators and representatives, to which the state may be entitled in the congress. But no senator or representative, or person holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

GEN. SANTA ANA arrived at Lexington, Ky. on the 29th ult. in bad health and will remain there until he is able to travel to Washington. At Louisville "some vandal threw a brick bat at him." This act is of the same character as the decisions of judge Lynch and equally worthy of the severest reprehension; for monster as he is, we have no right thus to punish him for crimes inflicted upon Texans, which their own government has pardoned; even if we were not restrained by the obligations of hospitality. His visit to Washington has caused considerable speculation, and will no doubt develop some interesting particulars in relation to the contending parties.

THE INDIANS. A letter from Fort Gibson, states that that post is completely encircled by Indians,—Creeks, Cherokees, Choctaws, Osages, &c. and that 12,000 more Creeks were expected from the south in a few weeks. To overawe this vast body of Indians there were only 260 men at Fort Gibson, and not all these fit for duty. All, however, was peaceful; but it manifests criminal negligence to leave that frontier thus exposed. Three regiments at least are required there instead of the mere handful of men in charge of the gallant commander of the fortress.

A correspondent of the Arkansas Advocate states that the emigrating Creeks are scattered along the roads in little predatory bands, killing hogs and stealing as they go. One company of Creeks, which numbered 3,200 when it started, had only about 2,000, the rest having fallen off into straggling parties.

MARYLAND. On Monday last Thomas W. Veazey, esq. was re-elected governor of Maryland for the ensuing year. The whole number of votes cast was eighty-one, of which Mr. Veazey received seventy.

On Tuesday last, Robert M. Tidball, esq. of Washington county, and Joseph S. Collman, esq. of Somerset county, were elected state senators to supply the vacancies occasioned by the resignation of William Price and Thomas King Carroll, esqrs. and on Wednesday Samuel Jones, jr. esq. of Baltimore, was elected a senator in place of John V. L. McMahon, esq. who had also resigned.

On Wednesday last the legislature, on joint ballot, re-elected the following gentlemen council to the governor by the votes attached to their names: Gwinn Harris 73 votes; Wm. F. Johnson 68; John McKenney 67; Nathaniel Williams 66; and William L. Jones 64. Mr. Harris having received the largest number of votes is president of the council.

DEPOSITE BANKS. By reference to our abstract of the proceedings of congress, it will be seen that the house of representatives has appointed a select committee to inquire whether the deposite banks have employed an agent at the seat of government to transact their business with the treasury department, &c. The committee consists of Messrs. GARLAND, PIERCE, of New Hampshire, FAIRFIELD, WISE, GILLET, JOHNSON, of Louisiana, HAMER, MARTIN, and PEYTON.

THE AGENT OF THE DEPOSITE BANKS. In the debate which took place in the house of representatives on Tuesday last, on Mr. Garland's resolution, with the amendments of Messrs. Harlan and Vanderpoel, relative to the deposite banks, their agent, &c. (see page 296) Mr. Peyton is reported, in the "Globe," to have said:

"That in consequence of the character of the agent alluded to, Mr. Taney, the former secretary of the treasury, would not recommend him as an agent of the deposite banks; but when the present secretary came into office, this individual was taken into the treasury department, and every facility granted him. Now he had fortified himself, and gentlemen were afraid to institute an investigation into his conduct. Mr. P. spoke at considerable length, and adverted with great severity to the course of the secretary in relation to Whitney's connection with the treasury department."

In consequence of the above remarks, Mr. Whitney published the following "CARD" in the Globe of Thursday last.

A CARD.

During the last session of congress, it became necessary for me to expose H. A. Wise of having stated, in the hall of the house, a BASE FALSEHOOD in relation to myself.

In the Globe of this morning it is reported, that Baylie Peyton, the Siamese companion of Wise for twelve months past in uttering falsehood and slander, said that, "in consequence of the character of the agent alluded to, Mr. Taney, the former secretary of the treasury, would not recommend him as an agent of the deposite banks." No one can mistake that it is myself alluded to by Mr. P.

I challenge Mr. Peyton to adduce a single particle of proof to sustain the above assertion; and for having made it without proof, I pronounce him A CALUMNIATOR, AND GUILTY OF UTTERING A BASE FALSEHOOD; this too, like Wise, while shielded by his constitutional privilege.

If any one who does not know me wishes to ascertain my character, I refer them to citizens of those places in which I have passed many years of my life.

R. M. WHITNEY.

FROM FLORIDA. The latest intelligence from the seat of hostilities is contained in the following extracts of letters from Gen. Jesup, which we find in the "Globe" of this morning.

Extracts from letters from general Jesup, dated

"HEAD QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE SOUTH,
Camp Dade, Dec. 17, 1836.

"The army under my command, consisting of the Tennessee brigade and Alabama battalion, with about three hundred regular troops, and five hundred Indian warriors, arrived in this vicinity last night. To-day I have had the Wahoo Swamp completely examined; not an Indian is to be found, and the friendly warriors are of opinion that they have all gone south. From the appearance of their trails they are supposed to have retreated soon after their last battle with the troops under the command of governor Call."

"HEAD QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE SOUTH,
Camp Dade, Florida, Dec. 18, 1836.

"Since I wrote to you yesterday, I have resolved, from a careful consideration of all the circumstances of the country, and the army, to place a depot at this place, leave a garrison of one hundred and fifty men to defend it, and with the remainder of the force under my command, to proceed down the Wythlacoochee, scouring the country on both banks to its mouth.

"By the movement proposed, I shall be able to drive out all the Indians who may remain on or near the river, to cover the frontiers, and ascertain the practicability of pushing steamers or other boats up to the forks.

"If boats can be brought up to that point, or within a day's march of it, the Indians must forever abandon their settlements in the cove and the swamps of the river.

"The Tennessee volunteers will continue with me until this movement be performed, though the term of service of many of them has expired, and that of all will probably have expired before it be accomplished.

"The prisoners whom I have taken, inform me that it is the purpose of Micanopy, Jumper and Abraham, to fly before the army, and avoid a battle; they will hide themselves in the dense hammocks and swamps of the everglades. Oseola has declared his intention to maintain himself as long as possible on the Wythlacoochee, and then fly to the south; but the prisoners say he will never surrender."

THE MONEY PRESSURE IN NEW YORK. The following is from the New York "Journal of Commerce" of Monday last, and exhibits a singular condition of things in the pecuniary transactions of the great metropolis. The restriction of the banks must have acted with great severity, but the manner in which it was overcome speaks volumes in favor of the resources and unity of the New York merchants. No one should say after such a trial that "they ought to break."

On Saturday several of the banks refused to receive merchant's checks on other banks in deposite. Immense sums therefore which are usually liquidated by entries on the books of the banks, had to be drawn out in bills. The consequence was, that some of the banks were exhausted of bills, although a special effort was made to keep up a supply by signing them as fast as possible. After all, in a good many cases, the teller was compelled to give due bills, for checks, which due bills, for the occasion, were of necessity passed as money, and deposited at other banks. The incident is of no consequence except, as illustrating the importance of that department of the currency called checks. They save the use of a vast amount of bank notes, and lessen immensely the dangers of bank transactions. The refusal to take checks in deposite as is usual, put the last strain upon the mercantile strength of the city, as it prevented all fiction in payments, and compelled every man to furnish real cash. We are happy to say that so far as we know, every man furnished the cash, and every engagement was fulfilled. The merchants have now been proved in all sorts of ways, and by quadruple powers, and stood the test. We hope they may soon be relieved from farther testing of their strength.

MARYLAND SENATOR. The vacancy in the senate of the United States, occasioned by the death of Robert H. Goldsborough, esq. has been filled by the election of Dr. John S. Spence, of Worcester county, who will serve until the 4th of March next, when Mr. Goldsborough's term would have expired.

SURPLUS REVENUE. According to the report of the secretary of the treasury to both houses of congress, (see page 297,) the balance in the treasury on the 1st inst. for distribution among the states is $37,469,859 97, being equal, Michigan included, to $127,445 10 for each electoral vote. Twelve states only have communicated their acceptance of the terms of the act, and to these transfer drafts are now issuing for the first quarterly deposit. The portion awarded to Michigan will not be paid until congress shall decide to admit her into the union—a bill for which passed the senate on Thursday last by a vote of 25 yeas to 10 nays.

DREADFUL SHIPWRECK. We learn from the N. York Commercial Advertiser of Wednesday last, that the barque Mexico, from Liverpool for New York, with one hundred and sixty-six passengers on board, went ashore on Hempstead bar on Tuesday last; and the wreck master, who had arrived in New York from the vessel, reports that only eight persons had reached the shore when he departed—the remainder, he thinks, must have perished!! The survivors are so severely injured by the frost as to be unable to give any intelligible account of the disaster. It is said the barque had no pilot on board—and that she had a signal of distress flying for several days!

DEATH OF MRS. DONELSON. With melancholy feelings we record the death of Mrs. Donelson, the beautiful and amiable wife of Andrew Jackson Donelson, late private secretary of the president. This most estimable lady went to Tennessee during the summer, and expected to return with her uncle on the 1st of October. For the most part, since the beginning of this administration, Mrs. Donelson has presided at the president's mansion; and all who have visited it know with what amenity of manners, with what engaging and unpretending kindness, she welcomed the guests to its hospitalities. She was destined not to share the affectionate farewell greetings with which the country is prepared to salute the close of the president's residence at Washington; with which, in all its private and social relations, she was identified. Mrs. Donelson was seized with a hemorrhage of the lungs at her home in Tennessee, shortly before the period fixed for her return. She rallied for a time, and hopes were entertained of her recovery; but a relapse, in the early part of December, hurried her to the grave on the 19th of the month. [Globe.]

IMPORTANT—if true! The New Orleans Bee of Dec. 26, says—

It was rumored on Saturday and Sunday on the authority of letters, we know not whence or by whom received, that the royal party of Mexico had declared the infant of Spain, Don Francisco de Paula, king of that fine country, that France and England had declared in his favor, and had furnished him with resources to work his way to the throne thus offered him, that four French ships of 74 guns are now off Pensacola, and were about to sail for the neighborhood of Vera Cruz, where another 74 had already arrived, and that these forces were to support the party about to declare in favor of the infant.

It is impossible for us to decide on the degree of credit that ought to be attached to this rumor.

MARYLAND AND THE SURPLUS. The following is the bill which passed the legislature of Maryland authorising the reception of that state's portion of the surplus revenue.

An act to authorise the treasurer for the Western Shore, to receive such sum or sums of money as shall be awarded to the state of Maryland, under the provisions of the act of congress, therein mentioned.

Section 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of Maryland, That the treasurer for the Western Shore be, and he is hereby authorised to receive from the secretary of the treasury of the United States, such sums of money as shall or may be awarded to the state of Maryland, as and for its proportion of the public revenue of the United States, which is to be distributed under the provisions of the act of congress, entitled, an act to regulate the deposits of the public money.

Sec. 2. And be it enacted, That the treasurer of the Western Shore shall be, and hereby is authorised to deliver to the secretary of the treasury of the United States, certificates of deposit for the sum or sums of money to be received by him for this state as aforesaid, which certificates shall be signed by the said treasurer, and in such form as may be prescribed by the secretary of the treasury aforesaid, shall express the usual and legal obligations and pledge the faith of this state for the safe keeping and payment thereof; and shall pledge the faith of this state to pay the said moneys, and every part thereof, from time to time, whenever the same shall be required by the secretary of the treasury for the purposes, and in the manner and proportions set forth and described in the aforesaid act of congress.

Sec. 3. And be it enacted, That if the said treasurer shall receive payment of the sum or sums of money to be awarded as aforesaid to this state, in checks or drafts on the Union bank of Maryland and Franklin bank of Baltimore, or either of them, he shall be and is hereby authorised to demand payment thereof. And whenever any sum or sums of money aforesaid shall be paid to the treasurer, it shall be his duty to deposit the same in the Union bank of Maryland, Franklin bank of Baltimore, and Farmer's bank of Maryland, in the following proportions—not less than one quarter nor more than two-fifth parts thereof in the Farmer's bank of Maryland, and the residue in the Union bank of Maryland and Franklin bank of Baltimore in such proportions as to the treasurer may seem proper, the whole to be held by said banks subject to the control of the general assembly.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT—By and with the advice and consent of the senate.

Charles E. Anderson, of New York, to be secretary of the legation of the United States to the court of his majesty the king of the French.

Theodore S. Fay, of New York, to be secretary of the legation of the United States near his Britannic majesty.

James A. Bayard, of Delaware, to be attorney of the United States for the district of Delaware.

Samuel S. Hall, of Arkansas, to be attorney of the United States for the district of Arkansas.

Jesse Miller, of Pennsylvania, to be first auditor of the treasury department.

James Whitcomb, of Indiana, to be commissioner of the general land office.

Edwin R. Wallace to be attorney of the United States for the northern district of Alabama.

Martin Gordon to be superintendent of the branch mint at New Orleans.

Joseph J. Singleton to be superintendent of the branch mint at Dahlhogne, in the state of Georgia.

James M. Strode to be register of the land office at Chicago, Illinois.

Gordon D. Boyd to be receiver of public moneys at Columbus, Mississippi.

Theodore J. Wilkinson to be receiver of public moneys at St. Stephens, Alabama.

Richard M. Carter to be receiver of public moneys at New Orleans.

James McKissack to be register of the land office at Fayetteville, Arkansas.

Matthew Richard, of Ohio, to be solicitor of the general land office.

DESTROYING THE CHEROKEES BY WHISKEY.

Governor Schley, Dec. 8, made an important communication to the Georgia legislature enclosing recent despatches sent express from gov. Wool, touching the alarming state of things produced among the Cherokees, by the shameful practice pursued by the whites of selling to them intoxicating liquors, particularly whiskey. This abuse is carried on to great extent at New Echota and its vicinity, and among the despatches is a remonstrance from the principal chiefs, petitioning the legislature to prevent the practice. Any person, by the small fee to the clerk, may obtain a license: gov. Schley urges the passage of a law totally prohibiting such licenses. Gen. Wool implores the governor to use his exertions to procure such a law, otherwise he fears the worst of consequences from the approaching assemblage of 1,000 Indians at New Echota, to meet the commissioners. The chiefs say their people are by the frequent potations of whiskey, becoming degraded to brutes.

STATISTICS OF CUBA. The annual table of exports from the ports of Havana and Matanzas exhibits the curious fact that in the last three years the quantity of coffee shipped to the United States exceeded the whole quantity shipped to Europe, by 4,666,000 pounds. The export to United States, during those three years, was 40,490,000 lbs. To all Europe, 35,824,000 lbs.

The improvements which have been effected in the affairs of the Island of Cuba under the wise and efficient management of governor Tacon may be seen by the facts exhibited in the following article: [Ball. American.]

Don Ramon de la Sadra in a late work on the political history and resources of Cuba, gives the following estimates of the population, &c. of that island: White males, 168,653; white females, 142,398; free males of color, 54,533; male slaves, 183,290; female slaves, 103,652. Total, 704,489. To this number may be added, 26,076 for the floating population possessing a transient residence on the island, making in all a population of 730,565 souls.

The reforms introduced into the island since 1825, have contributed greatly to its internal properity and to its foreign trade. The direct national importations which, in 1826 amounted only to the value of 2,046,765 francs, were increased in 1830 to more than twenty-five millions. The scale of duties established in the colony have tended greatly to promote its commercial advancement. On the produce of the country exported beyond the sea, they are only two per cent. and the extraordinary duty on coffee has been suppressed. In 1825, the deficit in the revenues necessary to the support of the government amounted to 7,500,000 francs; in two years afterwards, owing to the financial reforms adopted, there was an increase in the sum of the revenue amounting to 22,565,750 francs, while in 1830, the revenues of the island amounted to forty-five millions of francs, near twenty-five millions of which were consumed by the army and navy. 900,000 francs were remitted to the peninsula in 1831; in 1832, 1,700,000 francs; and in 1833, upwards of four millions, besides establishing a bank with a capital of 6,200,000 francs. The general receipts of the island are made up of 67½ per cent. duties on maritime commerce, 24½ interior contributions, 2½ retained on personal salaries, 1½ retained on ecclesiastical rents, 3½ in different variable items. The capital employed in the various agricultural and other pursuits of the island, may be estimated at about 2,250 francs for every individual inhabitant, or 8,800 francs for every individual of the free population. In England it is about 1,135 francs for each individual, and in France, 1,250 francs. The net revenue of the island is seven per cent. on the whole amount of capital, and the net produce is considered to be about one-half of the gross produce. The average general tax upon each inhabitant is 45 francs, or near 75 francs for each free inhabitant, while the local tax is 20 francs for the same class. The 700,000 inhabitants of Cuba pay to the state an annual tax of forty-five millions, and the population of Spain, if assessed at the same rate, would pay 700,000,000 francs; and the thirty two millions of France, would pay more than twice the sum they now do. Great improvements have been made in the police regulations of most of the towns and cities of the island, and Havana, formerly so noted for its robberies and frequent assassinations, has become one of the most peaceable and orderly cities of modern times.

THE WAR IN SPAIN. The following article, published in a London paper, has been compiled from the various official reports of the two contending parties in Spain. The reader will see at a glance, how small a portion of truth abounds in the bulletins on either side:

Madrid statements.

Number of Carlists killed in battle to the 1st of April, 1836, according to the Gazette of Madrid	280,535
Ditto from the 1st of April to the 8th of October	33,927
Prisoners in the former epoch	54,403
Ditto in the latter epoch	11,760
Total killed and prisoners	380,716

Guns taken in both periods	113,221
Battles gained	597
In which the enemy was entirely routed	270
Partially	227

Onante statements.

In 189 bulletins from September, 1834, to this day—Queenites killed	189,688
Prisoners	43,811
Passed over to the Carlists	42,536

Total killed, prisoners and deserters	276,453

So much for Spanish generals, armies, victories and official statements!

PROTECTION OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND AGAINST FIRE. The recent fire in the printing department within the bank of England, and the vast importance of there being a full assurance of safety for the enormous amount of securities and moneys deposited in this national establishment, may render the following account of the means of protection against any accident from fire, which the bank possesses within itself, interesting to the public generally. In the first place, the entire building is erected in manner cautiously designed to prevent the spread of fire. In every department are strong rooms for the nightly lodging of books, moneys, and securities, and closets within these rooms, which together with the rooms themselves, are deemed to be perfectly fire-proof. There is a nightly guard of 32 soldiers sent from the Tower, who have each his post within the building. There are besides, a number of the porters, of the principal clerks, and of other officers of the establishment, constantly resident within the walls of the building. A nightly watch of the confidential officers of the bank, who take turns in rotation, is rigidly required. A general survey of every department and office of the building is made by those gentlemen, who are on duty thrice in the course of every night—namely, at ten o'clock, at midnight, and at four o'clock in the morning. Occasional surveys of the more important apartments are made in the intervals between these stated times, of more or less extent, according to circumstances, and the degree of vigilance of the gentleman whose turn it is to keep watch. It was to this wise precaution that the timely discovery of the recent fire is to be attributed. There are seven very excellent fire engines kept within the bank, which are monthly inspected by the maker, and there is in every department a good supply of fire buckets. In each of the yards of the bank are capacious tanks, judiciously placed, and kept constantly filled with water. The only deficiencies seem to be, the not having two or three resident porters practically acquainted with the management of engines and the want of pickaxes, saws and crowbars, to tear up timbers, floorings, or partitions, which might catch fire.

Of the cause of the late fire, upon a careful resurvey, no doubt could exist. The aperture cut through the flooring by the workmen and which was supposed by the clerk of the works to have caused the fire, by the fall of some accidental sparks, was found to be wholly untouched by fire, so that no doubt can exist but the iron hearth had for many days past been allowed, by the accumulation of burning cinders, to become thoroughly "saturated with heat," and iron being a powerful retainer and conductor of heat, the strong beam that passed under the hearth and the ends of the girders which rested thereon, were gradually undergoing a process of decay from the constant action of heat, till at last they burst into a state of combustion. The property within the bank is wholly uninsured.

SETTLEMENT OF THE "RESERVE"—OHIO.

From the Western Reserve Chronicle.

Cantfield, October 25th, 1836.

DEAR SIR: I have been extremely anxious to obtain all the information in the possession of the first settlers, relative to the early history and settlement of the Reserve. Judge Atwater has written to me, at my request, and I know of no better method of perpetuating the facts he mentions, than to have the letter published. Very sincerely, yours,

E. WHITTLESEY.

Geo. Hapgood, esq.

Mantua, June 19, 1835.

Elisha Whittlesey, esq.

SIR: Agreeably to your request, I send you as much of an answer to your inquiries as my means of knowledge will at present permit.

The first surveying company came up the Mohawk river, from Schenectady, where it was said, one of the boatmen was drowned in ascending the river. I believe they had four boats, one of which was wrecked and lost on lake Ontario, the night when the boats ran by Fort Oswego, (then in possession of the British, and a few days before it was given up, by what is called "Jay's treaty").

A considerable portion of the men were hired in Ontario county, N. Y. and were not with the boats at that time. I was one of the latter, who came by land and drove cattle and pack horses. About a week was spent at Buffalo, to hold a council with the Indians. The principal chiefs of the Six Nations, and many others, were assembled. After many fine speeches had been made and interpreted, some presents given and accepted, the pipe of peace smoked, specimens of Indian dancing given, &c. the council broke up, and each one went his own way, or on their own business. The surveying party proceeded on, some in the boats and some by land; and all assembled on the peninsula of Presque Isle, on the morning of July 4th, 1796.

The day was fair and pleasant: the lake still and calm: the beach of the lake tolerably good for travelling; and the boats and land party arrived at the mouth of Conneaut creek a little before sunset. Having all arrived safe, and in good health and high spirits, it might be supposed all felt ready and willing to celebrate the 20th anniversary of our independence, in the best manner the circumstances would admit. Although late in the day, a suitable number of toasts were drank, salutes of small guns fired, and the day closed with general rejoicing and hilarity.

The party then consisted of forty-five men, two women and one child, perhaps three or four years old, a son of Mr. Gunn; and a negro man, Joseph Hodge, commonly called black Joe, who had been employed to come from Buffalo or Cataragus as an Indian interpreter. He stayed but a few days.

The names of the men, and the capacities in which they acted, were as follows: namely—Moses Cleaveland, agent; Augustus Porter, principal surveyor; Moses Warren, Seth Pease, Milton Holley, Amos Spafford, Richard M. Stoddard, surveyors; Joshua Stow, commissary; Theodore Shepard, physician; Joseph Tinker, principal boatman. Those who were employed and acted as common assistants were—Sam'l Agnew, Amzi Atwater, Elisha Ayers, Amos Barber, David Beard, Stephen Benton, John Briant, Shadrach Benham, Michael Coffin, Nathaniel Doan, Timothy Dunham, Samuel Devenport, Samuel Forbes, George Gooden, Francis Grey, Elijah Gunn, (with his wife and child), James Hacket, James Hamilton, Luke Hanchett, Thomas Harris, Samuel Hungerford, William B. Hall, Joseph Landon, John Lock, Asa Mason, Joseph McIntire, Ezekiel Morley, Titus V. Munson, Charles Parker, George Proudft, Olney F. Rice, Wareham Shepard, Amos Sottel, Job P. Stiles, (with his wife), Norman Wittcock.

A short council was held with the Missasagua Indians, then residing near that place, in which were explained the motives and intentions of the company. A large but rather uncouth storehouse was built on the wide sand beach, on the east side of the mouth of the creek, which was then covered with standing timber.

In a few days a party of surveyors, with their assistants, with pack horses, went and measured the Pennsylvania line from the lake to near where it was supposed the south line of the Reserve would be. Others followed on, a few days after. This point was ascertained by Mr. Seth Pease, who had conveyed a quadrant there for that purpose. It was done on the high lands south of the Mahoning, about half or three-fourths of a mile north of the present corner of the Reserve. That distance was accurately measured, and a large post set, which was supposed to be at 41 degrees of north latitude; the correctness of which, I believe, has never been disputed, and probably never will be. From that post, a line was run west, as accurately as could well be done with a common compass. This line was run, that season, twenty miles; and the four first meridians run to the lake. Mr. Holley ran the first, Messrs. Spafford and Stoddard the second, Moses Warren the third, and Messrs. Potter and Pease the fourth.

In this expedition we suffered some for want of provisions, and much by fatigue. The weather was generally dry, and in some instances water very scarce. I was with Warren's party: we were three times on short allowance of provision. It being my first campaign on that business, I thought it rather hard; but something new was every day to be seen, and our minds buoyed up with hopes of relief: and on the whole I never regretted my going; and was ready and willing to go on another when called for.

The parallels, or east and west lines, were nearly all run this season, north of No. 6, and some south of that, on the 9th, 10th and 11th ranges, to the lake or Cuyahoga river; and the north part of the meridians west of the 8th range, and east of the Cuyahoga river, were run to the lake—the lake shore traversed to where it was supposed the west line of the Reserve would be, near Sandusky bay—the Cuyahoga river traversed up a considerable distance—the village of Cleveland laid out, and a considerable part of the 100 acre lots in Cleveland and Newburg were run; and some division lines were run in Mentor.

The last of the surveying party left the Reserve on or about the 22d of October, leaving Mr. Gunn and family, and James Kingsbury's family (who had come there in August), at Conneaut. These families suffered for the want of provision and other necessities of life, as I believe, very severely. Mr. Job P. Stiles and wife were left at Cleveland.—Capt. Paine, now of Chardon, came there after we left, and staid with them through the winter.

The surveying party were very healthy, and no serious accident befel any one. We left the Reserve in as high spirits as when we arrived.

Of all this party, I was for several years the only one living on the Reserve. Mr. Ezekiel Morley came and settled in Chester two or three years ago. The most of them, I believe, are dead.

The survey into townships and some townships lotted, together with the equalization tracts, was completed in 1797: but this must be the subject of another communication, if done at all. I have hastily written the foregoing, and you will perceive it is not very correct as to style, language, &c.: but I believe it contains nothing but a simple narrative of facts. I am sensible that I have written many unimportant things, but such as they are, I cheerfully present them. I am yours, very respectfully,

AMZI ATWATER.

The surveying party were much in a habit of giving names to places and things. In some instances these names have been retained. Meander creek, and Musketoe creek, both emptying into the Mahoning in Weatherfield, were named by Moses Warren, esq. the former on account of its meandering course, on the third meridian which he run, and the latter on account of the numerous swarms of those little troublesome insects which in those days were the great affliction of woodmen. Tinker's creek, which empties into the Cuyahoga in Independence, was named after Joseph Tinker, the boatman, who claimed the honor, in imitation of great navigators, by right of discovery.

The small species of rattlesnakes, which were very numerous, and to us unknown, were called Missasagwas, after the resident Indians, which name I believe they have generally been known by to the present time.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF MARYLAND.

Executive department, Annapolis, Dec. 28th 1836.

Gentlemen of the senate,

and of the house of delegates:

In discharging, on the present occasion, the customary duty of submitting to you, at the commencement of your session, such matters of public concern as may seem to demand the consideration of the general assembly, we cannot refrain, in the outset of this communication, from congratulating you, and the people of the state at large, upon the restoration of peace and quiet within our borders; upon the harmony which prevails among our citizens; and upon the praiseworthy desire, manifested in every quarter, of uniting zealously and in the best spirit, for the advancement of the true glory and welfare of the state.

There is, in our opinion, no truth more obvious, or scarcely more important to be known and recognized in every well regulated government, than that the undue prevalence and excitement of the spirit of party are calculated to disturb the peace of society, and create serious and permanent evils in the body politic. This salutary lesson is exemplified in the history of all governments, but it is more particularly striking in those whose foundations are based upon republican principles. If it were necessary to travel beyond the limits of our own observation and experience to establish the truth of these remarks, we might show, that in the anarchy and consequent destruction of most, if not all the free governments of both ancient and modern times, an inflamed party spirit has been a most prominent and efficient agent. But it is not necessary to do so. In our own times—here—in our own state, and before our own eyes—have we witnessed the extreme to which the undue indulgence of the spirit of party leads. But, happily, in our case, the patriotism of the community was aroused to the dangers with which we were threatened, and the issue of the recent occurrences furnishes a practical illustration of the stability of free institutions, when supported by a patriotic and intelligent people.

In this connexion we would respectfully invite your attention to the proclamation and message which we had the honor to submit to the house of delegates, on the 25th ultimo, copies of which we herewith transmit to the senate. These documents exhibit the action of the executive, and the views entertained by us of the further measures necessary and proper to be adopted in relation to the extraordinary occurrences of which they treat. The more we reflect on this subject, the more thoroughly are we persuaded that your action concerning it, is a duty of the most weighty and responsible character, and we, therefore, earnestly hope that you will take into your serious consideration, without any unnecessary delay, our election and criminal laws, with the view to prevent the recurrence of any similar conduct in all future time.

Among the first acts which it will be necessary for you to perform, is the passage of such a law, as will entitle this state to the reception of her portion of the surplus revenue of the United States, under the deposit law of the last session of the national congress. It is probable that the sum which Maryland will be entitled to receive under that act, will not fall far short of a million and a half of dollars. The application of this large fund, will, therefore necessarily constitute a prominent subject for deliberation at your present session, as the whole amount of it will fall due before the next annual session of the general assembly.

The internal improvement law of the extra session in May last, having amply provided for work of this character, by authorising the negotiation of a loan of eight millions of dollars—the whole of which sum is appropriated to this most important object—(and which we think should not be diverted ed to any other), we beg leave most respectfully to recommend that the amount which may be received by this state, as her portion of the surplus revenue referred to, be invested either in the eight million loan, the stock of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, and the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, lately subscribed for under the internal improvement act, or, in some other permanent and profitable stock; and that the interest or dividends to be annually received therefrom, be applied to the general purposes of the state, until the treasury shall be relieved from the balance which has appeared against it for several past years, and be in condition to meet, from other sources, all demands against it; and that, thereafter, the said interest on dividends be appropriated to the advancement of education.

It is believed that the appropriation of the accruing interest upon said fund, for about three or four years, to the general purposes of the treasury, and the completion of the great works of internal improvement, in which the state has large investments—which may and ought to be effected in the same time—will relieve the state treasury from all difficulty, and leave it, thereafter, with ample resources, independent of said fund, to meet all the ordinary and necessary expenses of the government, and demands against it. And it will probably require about the same length of time, to mature and to get into operation, a general system of education commensurate with the increased means of sustaining it.

Of the importance of education, it is not necessary for us to speak in lengthened terms. That is a subject upon which we all harmonize in opinion. Confessedly the greatest blessing, and most secure palladium of a free people—their firmest reliance for the perpetuity of their freedom, and for the discomfiture and overthrow of those who would invade it—it must ever claim from their true representatives, and their real friends, the most efficient encouragement, whenever the means in their power shall enable them to extend it. We regard the present as the most auspicious crisis for the establishment of a general system of education throughout the state, which we think may, and should be so modelled, as that no one need forego its beneficial influences. It is not probable that any considerable portion of the surplus fund allotted to the states, will be wanted for many years to come, and we do not regard it at all certain, that it will ever be required by the general government, unless, perhaps, some extraordinary event, such as a foreign war, shall render the demand of a pressing and indispensable character. Unless some such contingency should happen, we are firmly persuaded, that its recall to the coffers of the United States' treasury, should be resisted by the representatives of the people of the states; and we have no doubt this will be done. Under these circumstances, any system of education, based upon the perpetuity of this fund, will be most likely to continue through a protracted series of years; and, in this light, it becomes a matter demanding the most serious consideration, and judicious arrangement. But, although the permanent continuance of this fund among the states, is a proposition which, in our opinion, may be relied upon with much confidence, yet it will be necessary that it should be so invested, that whenever its repayment shall be called for, it may be met with that promptness of execution, which should characterize the engagements of a sovereign state, and which is so indispensable to her character and credit. It was with a view to the attainment of this most desirable object, that we suggested the propriety of making provision for the annual outlay of the interest only; not deeming the expenditure of any portion of the principal, under the existing laws of congress, as proper or expedient.

Reform in the constitution of the state will constitute another prominent topic for your consideration; and permit us to express the opinion, founded upon mature reflection on the subject, that it is of the highest importance, that your present session should not be brought to a close, without the adoption of at least some leading measures bearing upon this difficult and exciting question. We had the honor of submitting some suggestions on this subject, in the message to the house of delegates before mentioned, to which we beg leave at this time respectfully to call your attention.

It has become our painful duty to announce to you the death of the honorable Robert H. Goldsborough, late a representative of this state, in the senate of the United States. This melancholy event occurred in October last, at his residence on the Eastern Shore. The distinguished character of the deceased; his many valuable public services; his singular urbanity and kindness in all the relations of private life; his superior intellectual endowments and high moral worth, had acquired for him a name among his fellow countrymen which will cause him to be classed and remembered with the purest and proudest which adorn the long catalogue of Maryland's distinguished sons.

It will be incumbent upon you to supply the vacancy, created by this mournful dispensation of Divine Providence, at as early a day as convenient, since the importance of a full representation from this state in the senate of the United States, during the residue of the present session of congress, when many deeply interesting questions are likely to be decided, is so obviously apparent. We forbore to exercise the power of making a temporary appointment of a successor, with which we were clothed by the constitution, because it was not probable, that a full representation in the senate of the United States, would be of much importance before your annual meeting, and because, without strong necessity, we were unwilling, by such appointment, to interfere with your unbiased choice in making a more permanent selection.

In compliance with the resolution of the last general assembly, No. 15, we appointed "one commissioner from each of the counties of the Eastern Shore of this state, to make a reconnoissance and survey, and an estimate of the cost of a rail road from some point or points in Cecil county, in connexion with one or more of the improvements in said county, and thence extending by a line, as straight as may be, nearly contiguous to and parallel with the western limits of the state of Delaware, to the southern extreme of Somerset county, with a divergent route through Worcester county, to the northern line of the state of Virginia, &c." We have not received any official report of the completion or extent of progress made in the survey of the route for said rail road, or of the estimate of its cost; but we have unofficially understood, that the survey of a route for the main line, and also an estimate of its cost have been completed, and will be reported as soon as the chief engineer, employed in making them can prepare his report, and the necessary maps and documents to accompany it.

On application to the president of the United States, as required by the charter of the Annapolis and Potomac canal company, we procured the services of Geo. W. Hughes, esq. one of the United States' corps of engineers, in making the necessary surveys for the route of said canal.

Mr. Hughes, in a communication to us, dated the 8th ult. states, "that the surveys and location of the canal are drawing to a close, and with favorable weather will be entirely completed by the last of next week." We have not since received any further communication from Mr. Hughes, but presume that his final report of the surveys, &c. will be made without unnecessary delay. In connection with this subject, we lay before you a copy of a communication from Mr. Hughes, and of the extracts of proceedings of the commissioners, and of the president and directors of the Maryland canal company, enclosed and mentioned in his communication, marked No. 3.

In pursuance of the authority conferred on us by the 8th section of the act, passed at the extra session in May last, entitled, "an act for the promotion of internal improvement," we appointed Chas. B. Fisk, esq. of the United States' corps of engineers, to survey the several routes of the Maryland canal company, by the valleys of the Monocacy and Patapsco, or by a route diverging from the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, at the mouth of the Seneca river exclusively within the limits of this state, and to perform the other duties prescribed by the said act." And the Maryland canal company, also, in pursuance of the authority conferred by the act aforesaid, appointed George W. Hughes, esq. another of the engineers of the United States' corps, "to act concurrently with the engineers appointed by us," in making said surveys, &c. as appears by a communication from the president of said company, a copy of which is herewith submitted, marked No. 4.

On the 20th day of July last, the aforesaid engineers made to us the report, of which the document herewith sent, marked No. 5, is a copy. Upon consideration whereof, and in pursuance of the requisition of the aforesaid act, we adopted the preamble and resolution, of which the document marked No. 6, is a copy.

The agreement of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, and of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, in general meetings of said corporations respectively assembled, to the several provisions of the act for the promotion of internal improvements, passed at the extra session of May last, so far as they are applicable to said corporations respectively, were severally communicated, under their respective corporate seals, and the signatures of their presidents, to the governor of this state within the time required by the said act.—The documents herewith marked Nos. 7 and 8, are copies of the said communications.

In pursuance of the act passed at May session last, entitled, "an act to authorise the governor and council to build a new tobacco inspection warehouse in the city of Baltimore," and of the supplement thereto, we contracted with John N. and William Murphy, building mechanics of the said city, for building a new warehouse on the vacant lot adjoining the state's tobacco inspection warehouse No. 8, upon the plan and of the dimensions referred to in said act, and we contracted for the purchase of the lot of land, adjoining said vacant lot, as required by the act aforesaid. By the communication from the commissioner of loans, of which the document marked No. 9 is a copy, it appears that the loan provided for by the above mentioned acts, to pay for the vacant lot and the erection of the warehouse, could not be obtained upon such terms as would have justified its negotiation, or, as it is evident, was expected by the general assembly.

Under these circumstances—a contract having been made for the erection of the new warehouse—and for the purchase of the vacant lot, as required by law—and no funds of consequence in hand or likely to be procured by the loan provided for as aforesaid—we had resort to the authority contained in the law of December session 1825, entitled, "a supplement to the act entitled, an act to establish state warehouses for the inspection of tobacco in the city of Baltimore," which places under our direction and control the net revenue arising from the inspection of tobacco as a fund for building warehouses. Under this last mentioned act, we have paid towards the erection of the new warehouse and for the said lot $4,070 21, all the net revenue arising from the inspection of tobacco in the treasury, up to 1st instant, and issued certificates of debt, chargeable upon the future receipts of said revenue, for $7,433 56 payable in six months, and for $2,500 payable in twelve months, bearing interest at the rate of six per centum per annum, in payment for the balance of the purchase money of the said lot, and towards the erection of the warehouse. And it will be necessary, from time to time, as the work progresses, to issue further certificates of debt, at such dates of payment as the inspection revenue will probably meet. The certificates which have been issued were cashed by the Union bank, as we presume that such as may hereafter issue, will be by that institution or otherwise, without difficulty.

The failure to obtain the small loan provided for to be applied to the erection of a new tobacco warehouse and purchase of an adjoining lot, and various other indications of an unfavorable state of the money market, as well in Europe as in this country, induced us to postpone the appointment of commissioners, which we were authorised to make, to negotiate a loan of eight millions of dollars, under the act of May last, for the promotion of internal improvement. Recent information induces us to believe that a favorable change has commenced, and that well grounded hopes may be entertained that the condition of the money market will soon be such that the eight millions loan may be obtained on terms within the limits of the said act. We have therefore recently appointed commissioners to negotiate it.

As required by resolution No. 55 of the general assembly, passed in May last, we appointed three citizens of Worcester county, commissioners "to make a reconnoissance and survey, and to estimate the cost of a rail road within the limits of Worcester county, from some point on the south line of the state of Delaware, through the towns of Beria, Newark, and Snow Hill, to some suitable point on Pocomoke river; and also to extend the reconnoissance and survey from the assumed point of Delaware, in as straight a line as may be, to the northern line of the state of Virginia, bounding Worcester county, with a divergent route to any one or more of the places therein mentioned, or to connect the said route with any other works of improvement authorised by this state, or the states of Delaware and Virginia, &c." And the said commissioners having, as authorised by the resolution in September last, made a requisition on the governor for the services of the state's engineer in making the reconnoissance survey, &c. we apprized the engineer of the requisition, and directed him to correspond with the commissioners on the subject. We received from the engineer an acknowledgment of our communication, stating that he would comply with our directions, and shortly be in readiness to attend to that duty. We have not received any report from either the commissioners or the engineer in relation to said survey.

We transmit herewith a copy of a communication from the president of the Baltimore and Susquehanna rail road company, with a printed copy of the ninth annual report of the president and directors thereof, which affords a gratifying view of the progress and prospects of that company in the highly important work of internal improvement in which they are engaged.

We have not received any official report from the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, or the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company of the progress of those companies the present year, in executing those great works, so vitally important to the commercial, financial and general interests and prosperity of the state; but we presume, of course, that such reports will be submitted to your consideration at your present session.

Such are the character and magnitude of those works, the immensity of the trade they are intended, and cannot when completed fail to attract to our commercial metropolis, and the deep financial interest of the state connected with them, that their speedy completion is a matter of such high and pressing importance as to demand from all concerned the most vigorous and energetic efforts to accomplish it.

In conformity to the 44th resolution of the last general assembly, directing the procurement of full length portraits of the late William Paca, Samuel Chase, and Thomas Stone, three of the signers of the Declaration of Independence from this state, we succeeded in procuring the services of John B. Bordley, a young and eminent native artist, who has executed the paintings in a highly creditable manner. These portraits may now be seen appropriately arranged in the senate chamber, by the side of that of the distinguished Carroll, and altogether present to the eye of the beholder a most interesting and impressive spectacle.

In compliance with the resolution of the last general assembly, in relation to the manuscript history of Maryland, by John Leeds Bozman, presented to the state by John Leeds Kerr, esq. we contracted with Messrs. Lucas & Deaver, of the city of Baltimore, for printing at least one thousand copies of that work; five hundred copies of which we reserved to the state, to be delivered by the said Lucas & Deaver within eighteen months, well bound in sheep, at $4 per copy.

The repairs of the public grounds around the state house have not yet been entirely completed. The new stone wall and iron railing appear to be executed in a substantial and workmanlike manner; and with the exception of the gates to be placed at the three entrances to the circle, this portion of the work may be said to be completed. There are some trifling improvements which remain to be done on the interior of the circle, such as removing rubbish and grading the ground, to which objects we think a small additional appropriation should be directed. After these repairs and improvements shall have been thoroughly consummated, it will be with you to decide upon the expediency of appointing a suitable person, with a small salary, to take care of the public grounds and other state property, and to keep them in suitable order.

Under the resolution No. 66, of the last annual session, we have caused to be transcribed the original journal of proceedings of the council of safety, for the years 1774 and 1776, and the original journal of the convention of 1774, and the correspondence and other papers connected with those interesting bodies, and periods of our history. By an inspection of this transcript, the reader will find that numerous highly valuable and interesting papers, have been thus preserved from oblivion. We have not been able to give but a cursory examination to the numerous other papers, recently brought to light. It will remain for the executive hereafter to determine upon a fuller examination of them, what portion, if any, ought to be transcribed, to carry out the views of the legislature, as expressed in the resolution on that subject.

The various other resolutions passed at the last session of the general assembly, and which we were directed to carry into effect, have received a due portion of our attention, and the most of them, we are pleased to announce, have been satisfactorily executed.

A communication from Robert Lemmon, esq. one of the auctioneers within the city of Baltimore, under the authority of the state, was received by us on the 23d day of July last, stating that a suit had been instituted against him, by the mayor and city council of Baltimore, for the recovery of a fine of $500, for not complying with their ordinance, then recently passed, for the regulation of sales by auction; and calling on us, (as the measure was an attack both on the law and revenue of the state), to direct our law officer to resist it at the state's cost. This request appearing to us reasonable and proper, we directed the clerk of the council to apprise Mr. Lemmon that it would be complied with, and by our direction the letter of which document marked No.

11, is a copy, was addressed to the attorney general.

We have not received an official copy of the ordinance of the mayor and city council of Baltimore, regulating sales by auction, referred to in the letter of Mr. Lemmon, nor any other evidence of their proceedings under it. But we have reason to believe that, in addition to the prosecution of auctioneers, for selling under the authority of the state, that the mayor and city council have licensed auctioneers, who are selling under their authority, in violation of the law of the state.

We have deemed it our duty, to submit this subject to your consideration, with the view to such further legislation as you may deem necessary for preserving the revenue arising from this source, and for maintaining and enforcing the state law.

We transmit herewith some claims for militia services in Cecil county, which, not having authority, under existing laws, to settle, we submit for your consideration.

Since the last session of the general assembly, we have received from the governors of the states of New York and Maine, copies of sundry resolutions passed by the legislatures of those states, in relation to slavery and abolitionism, which in conformity with the requests accompanying said resolutions, we herewith transmit for your consideration.

The indications from various quarters of a disposition to press upon the public attention the subject of slavery, with a view to its abolition, which have been occasionally manifested for many years past, have, within the last few years, assumed an aspect and importance vitally affecting the people of the states, in which a slave population exists to any considerable extent.

Whatever opinions may be entertained by others, or by us, of slavery, "in the abstract," the circumstances under which it exists in the states of this union, are such as to forbid a general emancipation, even if the desire to accomplish it were universal, whilst the present ameliorated condition and general treatment of slaves are such, as to leave the friends and advocates of emancipation no hope of bettering their condition generally, by the success of their exertions. It is believed that most erroneous notions on this subject, (particularly as relates to the condition and treatment of slaves), are generally entertained in the non-slaveholding sections of the country, and that it is the superficial and imperfect view taken of the matter, by such of the citizens of non-slaveholding states, as are actuated by good and humane intentions, that has caused the misguided zeal and efforts which have become so threatening in their consequences. They have looked principally to evils, (as they supposed them), to be remedied, without due consideration, or being, (from their local situations), qualified to form just conceptions of the many and various difficulties to be encountered, and dangers to be apprehended, in carrying into effect their wishes and views. We have no doubt, but that a large portion of our fellow citizens who have engaged in, and are zealously pursuing measures to effect a general emancipation of slaves are actuated by the best motives, and conscientiously believe themselves to be performing a sacred duty of humanity; but we are equally confident, that many of the most intemperate and noisy declaimers upon the subject, are influenced by very different motives.

We cannot permit ourselves to believe that it is the deliberate purpose of any respectable portion of the people of the United States, much less of the constituted authorities of the general or any state government, to infringe the rights of the states, where slavery exists, or of the citizens holding slaves; yet it cannot be denied, and ought not to be concealed, that opinions have been expressed as well in congress, as in, if not by several state legislatures, which look to the adoption of some measure by the general government upon this subject, which cannot be effected, but in violation of the rights and privileges of both: for it is a matter with which that government has nothing to do, and with which it can, in no manner interfere, without overstepping the bounds of its authority, and trespassing upon rights, and assuming powers never conceded to it.

We have deemed it our duty, at this time, to invite your particular attention to this exciting subject, and to express frankly, our views of its most vital importance, and earnestly recommend that it be distinctly made known, that we cannot recognize in any of our sister states, or their citizens, any right to interfere with our slaves; and that we unequivocally deny any authority in the general government to legislate upon the subject of their emancipation, or to disturb our rights of property in them, in any manner whatsoever.

It is confidently hoped and believed, that a temperate, yet firm and determined expression of the unanimous resolution of the slaveholding states, to adhere to and vindicate their rights on this subject, against all extraneous interference would have a salutary effect in awakening all calm, thinking and well intentioned abolitionists, (and without their countenance and aid, the evil intentioned would be impotent and soon cease their efforts), to such a deliberate reconsideration and thorough examination of the whole subject, in all its aspects and tendencies, as would induce them to cease their labors—fruitless of any good; but tending to much mischief, and to produce restlessness, dissatisfaction, inquietude and consequent insubordination of slaves, and vexation, alarm and increased rigor on the part of masters.

We are encouraged to entertain this hope, with much confidence, by the fact which we have understood, and believe to be true, that almost every intelligent gentleman, from any of the non-slaveholding states, who has left home friendly to the abolition cause, and travelled extensively in the south, has had his mind changed, and withdrawn his countenance and support from that cause. Such has been nearly the uniform result of becoming acquainted fully, in any way, with the true state, and general condition of slaves in the United States, and the various circumstances which render general emancipation impracticable, and the movements, and proceedings with that view irritating to masters, prejudicial to slaves, and altogether impolitic and unwarrantable.

Having thus, in a cursory manner, alluded to the various subjects, to which we considered it proper to direct your attention, we cannot conclude this communication, without the expression of our earnest hope that all your deliberations may be characterized by wisdom, moderation and firmness; and that they may redound to the interest, the prosperity and glory of the state. Maryland, at this moment, occupies a most conspicuous stand among her sisters of the union. She has witnessed the rapid strides to wealth and power, in most of the states, which have distinguished the last few years, and has nobly determined to enter the lists of competition. We need not dwell, at length, upon the advantages of her geographical position. They are such as must force themselves upon the attention of every individual, who bestows the smallest reflection on the subject. It is, therefore, the clearest dictate of a wise policy, and no less the duty of a prudent legislature, that these advantages, with which the God of nature had blessed us, should be made instrumental in advancing the power and welfare of the state. To effect these great and paramount objects, the internal improvement law of last May session was passed; and we cannot refrain from expressing it as our deliberate conviction, that the designs of that most liberal and beneficent act, will be successfully achieved, before the lapse of many years, should nothing occur to blight the animating prospects which we now enjoy. Upon the completion of the great works of improvement designed to connect the Chesapeake with the waters of the Ohio, a new era will commence in our state; an era of increasing population, and of agricultural, manufacturing and commercial prosperity, such as we have never yet known. Under these circumstances, we hope that no measures will be taken which might retard this auspicious event, but, on the contrary, that all will unite to hasten its approach, as all are deeply interested in its consummation.

We have only to add, gentlemen, that we shall be found ever ready to co-operate with you in any measures likely to advance the interests and welfare of the people of the state; and to communicate to you such information as may be required, on subjects pertaining to this department of the government.

With the highest consideration, we have the honor to be your obedient servants,

THO. W. VEAZEY.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

January 2. Mr. Preston of S. C. appeared in his seat.

After the presentation of resolutions and memorials, Mr. Walker to whom it was referred, reported Mr. Clay's land bill, with an amendment, striking out the whole bill save the enacting clause, and substituting another which restricts the sales of the public lands to actual settlers, and to them in small quantities, accompanied with many guards against its being evaded by speculators.

Mr. Hendricks, from the committee on roads and canals, reported a bill to continue the Cumberland and Ohio rail road through the states of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, for which object it appropriates $500,000, viz: $200,000 for Ohio, and $150,000 for each of the other two states.

Mr. H. also reported a bill to authorise the Ohio rail road company to locate a road through the public lands.

Also, a bill to complete the improvement of certain rivers and roads in Florida. [It appropriates $60,000.]

Also, a bill making appropriations to complete certain military roads in Arkansas. [It appropriates $75,000.]

Mr. Wright, from the committee on finance, reported a bill to remit the duties on goods destroyed by the great fire in New York.

Mr. Sevier reported a bill to ratify certain acts of gov. Pope in the location of lands in Arkansas.

Mr. King, of Georgia, reported a bill to carry into effect the 8th article of the treaty with Spain. All which bills received their first reading.

The senate, on motion of Mr. Grundy, postponed the intervening orders, and proceeded to the consideration of the bill declaring the admission into the union of the state of Michigan.

This bill, reported on Thursday last, from the committee on the judiciary, is in the following terms: A bill to admit the state of Michigan into the union upon an equal footing with the original states.

Whereas, in pursuance of the act of congress of June the fifteenth, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, entitled "an act to establish the northern boundary of the state of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the state of Michigan into the union, upon the conditions therein expressed," a convention of delegates, elected by the people of the said state of Michigan, for the sole purpose of giving their assent to the boundaries of the said state of Michigan as described, declared and established, in and by the said act, did, on the fifteenth of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, assent to the provisions of said act: therefore—

Be it enacted, &c. That the state of Michigan shall be one, and is hereby declared to be one, of the United States of America, and admitted into the union on an equal footing with the original states, in all respects whatever.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the secretary of the treasury, in carrying into effect the thirteenth and fourteenth sections of the act of the twenty-third of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, entitled "an act to regulate the deposits of the public money," shall consider the state of Michigan as being one of the United States.

After some remarks from Messrs. Calhoun and Grundy, Mr. Morris moved to recommit the bill to the committee on the judiciary, with instructions to strike out the preamble, which refers to the assent given by the late convention in Michigan to the boundaries prescribed in the act of congress.

A debate now arose which continued until the usual hour of adjournment; when, on motion of Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, the senate adjourned.

[We will publish an abstract of this debate hereafter. For a notice of the debate which ensued on the introduction of the bill see page 298.]

January 3. Amongst the petitions presented today was one, by Mr. Kent, from the corporation of Alexandria, praying congress to assume its amount of stock in the Alexandria canal, or to make an advance to the corporation in money to enable it to complete the payment of its subscription thereto;

Also, a petition, by Mr. King, of Alabama, from sundry citizens of Georgetown, praying the establishment of a new bank, with enlarged banking capital, for the District of Columbia, to be placed in Washington, with branches in the other cities of the District.

Mr. Crittenden, from the committee on claims, reported against a petition of the hon. John Forsyth, for compensation for injuries committed on his property by troops of the United States in Florida.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. King, of Alabama, having obtained leave, introduced a bill to encourage the employment of boys in the vessels of the United States.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the senate took up the bill regulating, in certain cases, the disposition of the proceeds of lands ceded to the United States by certain Indian tribes; which was read a second and third time, and, after a brief explanation by Mr. Wright, was passed.

A bill appropriating two millions of dollars for the expenses of the Indian war was also read the third time and passed.

The resolutions of inquiry heretofore submitted by Messrs. Hubbard, Morris, Wall, Hendricks, Walker, Linn, Rives, Davis and Ruggles, and heretofore published, were severally taken up and agreed to.

The senate then resumed the consideration of the bill for the admission of the state of Michigan into the union.

The debate on this subject was renewed, with great earnestness, and the senate was addressed at much length by Messrs. Ewing, of Ohio, Buchanan, Benton, Preston, Strange and Morris. In the course of the debate, and after candles were lighted, one or two unsuccessful motions to adjourn were made. Finally, a little before 7 o'clock, Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, renewed the motion to adjourn; and the yeas and nays having been demanded by Mr. Benton, the vote was taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Kent, King, of Alabama, Knight, Linn, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Preston, Southard, Strange, Swift, Wall, White—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Dana, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King, of Geo. Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wright—17.

And the senate adjourned.

January 4. The chair presented a communication from the secretary of the navy, with sixty copies of the Naval Register for 1837, for the use of the senate.

Also, a communication from the treasury department, informing the senate of the design entertained, and the measures adopted by that department, in relation to the surplus money in the treasury, with a statement of the amount of that surplus on the 1st of January, 1837.

[For the statement see proceedings of the house.]

Mr. Kent, from the committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill "for the erection of a hospital in the city of Washington." Read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Sevier, from the committee on private land claims, reported, without amendment, the bill for the relief of the heirs of Baron Bastrop and others, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Davis, on leave, introduced a bill to provide for the final settlement of the claims of the several states on the U. States, to interest on payments or advances made by such states during the last war.

Mr. Rives, on leave, introduced a bill authorising the secretary of the treasury to make certain advances to the secretary of the navy on account of the navy pension fund. Read twice, and referred.

Mr. Prentiss offered the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of constituting a board of commissioners, to be denominated commissioners of claims, whose duty it shall be to hear and examine all claims against the United States which may require the special legislation of congress, and report the facts proved, with their opinion thereon, to congress.

Mr. Hubbard offered the following, which was also adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for extending the provisions of the act of the last session, giving pensions to widows in certain cases, so as to embrace the widows now living of all soldiers and officers of the revolution who would have been entitled to pensions under the act of June 7, 1832.

The senate proceeded to the consideration of the unfavorable report of the committee of claims on the petition of hon. John Forsyth.

Mr. King, of Georgia, remarked, that this report embraced a very important question, as a great many claims of this kind were likely to come before the senate. He therefore moved that for the present the report be laid on the table; which was done accordingly.

The joint resolution introduced by Mr. Wall, authorising the library committee to procure the laws, votes, journals, &c. of the several states, for the use of congress, was taken up, and considered as in committee of the whole. It was then amended, on motion of Mr. Robbins, so as to take the sum necessary from the ordinary fund for the increase of the law library of congress—and then, on motion of Mr. Preston, it was referred to the committee on the library.

Mr. King, of Georgia, presented certain documents translated from the Spanish, having, as he stated, an important bearing on the subject of carrying into effect the 8th article of the treaty of 1819 with Spain. Ordered to be printed.

The senate proceeded to the further consideration of the bill for the admission of Michigan into the union; the question being on the motion of Mr. Morris to amend the bill.

After Mr. Morris had made a few supplementary and explanatory remarks, Mr. Bayard addressed, at large, the senate on the subject of the bill, and in opposition to the principle involved in the preamble. The question was further debated by Messrs. Brown, Niles and Crittenden, when the question was put on Mr. Morris' amendment to the preamble of the bill, and decided in the negative by yeas and nays, as follows—yeas 18, nays 23. So the amendment to the preamble was rejected. Mr. Southard then moved to strike out the preamble; but this motion was negatived by yeas and nays—yeas 16, nays 25. The bill was thereupon reported to the senate, when Mr. Calhoun moved to amend it by striking out the preamble, and inserting, as a first section, a clause repealing so much of the former bill passed for the admission of Michigan as required her assent to certain boundaries, and admitting her at once into the union. He expressed a wish to address the senate in support of the amendment, and thereupon moved an adjournment. Mr. Walker demanded the yeas and nays; which being taken, the senate refused to adjourn—yeas 13, nays 24. Mr. Calhoun thereupon, with some warmth, declined speaking to the amendment, but demanded the yeas and nays upon it; which were accordingly ordered, and, being taken, stood—yeas 12, nays 25. So Mr. Calhoun's amendment was rejected.

The question then recurring on ordering the bill to its engrossment for a third reading, Mr. White addressed the senate, explaining the grounds on which, though he had voted against the preamble, he should nevertheless vote for the bill. The question was at length (about 5 o'clock) taken on the engrossment of the bill, (in the shape of which it was originally reported), and carried by yeas and nays; yeas 27, nays 4, (a number of members having retired before the vote), as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Dana, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King, of Ala. King, of Geo. Knight, Linn, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Davis, Prentiss—4.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and the senate adjourned.

January 5. The chair presented the letter of resignation of the hon. Alexander Porter, of Louisiana, which was read.

After the reception of petitions and reports, which will be noticed when before the senate for a final decision upon them, and several resolutions of local interests Mr. King, of Ala. offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on finance be instructed to inquire into the propriety of authorising the secretary of the treasury to pay equitable commissions to the attorneys of persons the sums awarded to whom, under the treaty with France, were taken by debts due by them to the United States.

The chair presented a communication from the navy department, with statements in relation to clerks employed in that department.

Also, a communication from the same department, with a copy of a letter from the navy commissioners, relating to an examination of the waters of Narragansett bay, in accordance with a resolution of the senate at the last session.

The engrossed bill to admit Michigan into the union having been read a third time, and the question pending being upon its passage,

Mr. Calhoun spoke in opposition to the bill, characterizing it as eminently irregular in its principles, and revolutionary in its tendency.

Mr. Strange replied, chiefly in vindication of his own opinions in relation to this bill, and of the Baltimore convention.

Messrs. Buchanan, Davis and King, of Geo. also spoke on the subject of the bill.

The bill passed by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Dana, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Linn, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Kent, Moore, Prentiss, Southard, Swift—10.

The senate then adjourned.

[Mr. Speight, of North Carolina, appeared and took his seat on Thursday.]

Friday, Dec. 30. The speaker laid before the house a message from the president of the United States, transmitting a report from the secretary of state in obedience to the resolution of the 23d inst. calling for all information which may have been received in relation to the bequest of James Smithson, late of London, deceased, to found an institution at Washington for the diffusion of knowledge. [The report merely encloses letters from Richard Rush, esq. the agent, announcing his arrival in London, &c.]

A large number of memorials and petitions were presented and referred—after which the reports of committees were received. They chiefly related to private claims, and will be sufficiently noticed hereafter.

The speaker laid before the house a message from the president of the United States, transmitting a communication from the secretary of war ad interim, with certain accompanying papers from the engineer department, required to complete the annual report from that department. The message was laid on the table.

Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, moved to suspend the rules to enable him to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on public lands inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law the purchase of lands, at auction, with a view to forfeit them, and afterwards to obtain them at the government price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre.

Mr. W. called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules for this purpose, which were ordered; and, being taken, were, yeas 154, nays 38. So the house suspended the rules.

Mr. Lane, of Indiana, moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "committee on public lands," and inserting the words, "a select committee;" and also by adding at the end of the resolution the following words: "and also to inquire into the expediency of confining all sales of the public lands to actual settlers."

Mr. Lane said that, in offering the amendment, he had been actuated by a desire to bring this proposition directly before the house. No question had ever arisen which was of greater importance to the various interests of the country. It was important as regarded the manufacturing interest; it was important with reference to the surplus revenue; it was important in its reference to the currency and to mercantile transactions; and it was important as regarded the settlement of the whole western country. Any gentleman who had ever attended the sales of the public lands at auction, must see the necessity of putting a stop to the practice which had prevailed for a few years. Mr. L. here alluded to the practice of the agents of speculating companies who attended these sales bidding a little higher than the laboring man who had traversed the wilderness and settled down on these lands could afford, and thus depriving him of his purchase. By this process, the government made only a few cents more, and the hard earnings of the laboring man were thus rendered useless to him.—He had to buy lands at second entry, whilst the speculator, who had purchased the numbers which the actual settler intended to purchase, was residing in a distant part of the country. By adopting the course proposed by the amendment, Mr. L. said the proceeds of the sales of the public lands might be brought back to three millions per annum, being the amount sold in former years. He had great confidence in the committee on public lands. This subject had received the notice of the president in his last annual message, and had been referred to that committee; but he (Mr. L.) had understood that they were not able to agree on any definite proposition. For this reason, and in order that the final action of the house might be had during the present session, he had moved the change of reference from the committee on public lands to a select committee.

Mr. Boom, of Indiana, said he was not going to make a speech, but he rose to express his astonishment at the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana. He considered the amendment as a direct and unqualified reflection on the committee on public lands; and he repelled the reflection with indignation. The question of confining the sales of the public lands to actual settlers was made the subject of a part of the annual message of the president, which part had been referred to the committee on public lands. They had this very proposition under consideration; but whether they would be able to agree on a bill, he did not know. He was glad, however, that the proposition had been enlarged by the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Williams). If subject-matters of investigation properly belonging to the standing committees of the house were thus to be wrested out of their hands, he hoped the committee on public lands would be stricken from the list altogether.

Mr. Lane assured the gentleman from Indiana and the chairman of the committee on public lands that he intended no reflection by his motion; and said that if the chairman of the committee on public lands would give him an assurance that he would bring this subject forward in a definite shape he would withdraw his amendment. After some remarks from Mr. Dunlap in opposition to the amendment, Mr. Lane said he had just understood that a bill would be agreed upon by a committee of the senate embracing his views, and he, therefore, withdrew his amendment. The original resolution was thereupon adopted.

Mr. Vanderpoel moved a suspension of the rule, to enable him to offer a resolution that when the house adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next. The motion was rejected—ayes 95, noes 65, (not two-thirds). So the house refused to suspend the rule.

Mr. Harlan moved to suspend the rule, to enable him to submit a resolution that when the house adjourns to-morrow, it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next; which motion prevailed—ayes 127, noes 36.

And the question on the adoption of the resolution was then taken, and decided in the affirmative. So the motion to adjourn over from Saturday to Tuesday, was agreed to.

The house next went into the consideration of private bills in committee of the whole—after which the committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

The speaker communicated to the house from the secretary of the navy, a plan for the improvement of the navy yard at Pensacola, accidentally omitted in his communication yesterday, which, on motion of Mr. Jarvis, of Maine, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed; after which, The house adjourned.

Saturday, Dec. 31. After the usual morning business, the house proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Garland, of Va.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury communicate to this house, if within his power, the dividends and surpluses which were declared by, and the surpluses and contingent funds remaining in, the several banks in which the public money is deposited, for the years 1833, 1834, 1835 and 1836, severally.

To which resolution the following amendment had been heretofore offered by Mr. Harlan:

"And that he state also, whether the salary or compensation of an agent at the seat of the general government composes a part of the expenses of the said banks; the name of the said agent, and the several sums paid to him by the said institutions respectively."

The pending question was on the motion submitted by Mr. Hannegan, when the subject was last under consideration, to lay the amendments and resolutions on the table; on which motion the yeas and nays had heretofore been ordered, and, having been now taken, were, yeas 28, nays 141.

So the house refused to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. Gillet thereupon withdrew his amendment; and the question recurring on the proposed amendment of Mr. Harlan—

Mr. Cushman called for the previous question: which the house refused to second: ayes 71, noes 90. So the previous question was not seconded.

The question on the adoption of the amendment again recurring, Mr. Granger called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. Harlan hoped that the house would not oppose the adoption of his amendment. It had been stated again and again, both in and out of the house, that a certain person residing in this city occupied a room in the treasury department, the rent of which was paid by that department; that he communicated with these deposit banks, and that through him, under the frank of the secretary of the treasury, the correspondence of the banks was carried on. If there was such an agent, the people had a right to know it.

He (Mr. H.) did not pretend to assert whether there was such an agent or not; but he did say that the statements which had gone forth to that effect through the public press and other channels, was sufficient ground on which to institute an inquiry, and to call for a distinct answer from the secretary of the treasury.

The deposit banks, it was said, had realized large sums by means of the public money. Two or three years before the charter of the United States bank expired, these deposits were taken from that institution, the place pointed out by law for their safe keeping. What amount the government might have lost, he could not tell. But it was necessary the people should know what was done with their money, and whether any confidential agent existed, who, under the sanction of the secretary of the treasury, had the control of these institutions.

Mr. Garland, of Virginia, said that his only object in offering the resolution had been to ascertain what profits had been realized by these banks out of moneys deposited there, for which the government had no use. As regarded the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, it would be remembered that when the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise), at a former period, offered a resolution in a more extended form, asking for an inquiry into alleged abuses in the treasury department, he (Mr. G.) had voted for that inquiry, and he would do so again. But he could not regard the amendment now proposed as pertinent to the resolution. Still, he would vote for it. He would ask, however, were these deposit banks chartered by the government of the United States, or did they owe any responsibility to the government, except so far as they had entered into contracts? They did not; and if the banks thought proper to expend their money in the employment of an agent at Washington, or elsewhere, they had a right to do so, so long as they did not expend a dollar of the public money. If it could be shown that there was any improper connexion between R. M. Whitney, the individual so often referred to, or any other person, and the treasury department and deposit banks, he (Mr. G.) was willing to know the truth, and to convert the evil, if it existed. It had been charged that the friends of the administration wished to conceal hidden fraud and corruption. Let them meet the charges coming from a gentleman politically opposed to them; let him have as full an inquiry as possible; and although he (Mr. G.) could not consider the amendment as intimately connected with the resolution, still he would never close his eyes upon any fraud, corruption or mismanagement, come from what quarter it would; and he would never deny any inquiry which might lead to its detection. He did not believe that fraud or corruption could be discovered, but he was desirous to give the opportunity.

Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, expressed the gratification which he had felt in listening to the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Garland). Without reflecting on the motives of others, he (Mr. T.) thanked that gentleman for the manly and honorable course he had taken in this matter.

The subject of Reuben M. Whitney's connexion with the treasury was one of deep excitement in every part of the union. He (Mr. T.) had forbore to make any charges or insinuations, until he had evidence before him. Now, he desired that the evidence sought by the amendment should be procured, for it had a most important bearing on the whole subject. And he must be permitted to say that, if he did not raise the cry of democracy so loudly and so constantly as some men, he was yet democrat enough to have confidence that the people of this country would do what was right, when they understood what was right; and any opposition to this investigation would come with an ill grace from those who professed themselves to be the friends of the people. He wished to know what was the nature of R. M. Whitney's connexion with these banks, and what compensation he received. Let the suspicions which were abroad be either put down or confirmed. Whatever this individual's connexion might turn out to be with the banks, he (Mr. T.) believed it to be an absolute autocracy; he believed that the "sic volo, sic jubeo" of R. M. Whitney placed money in the banks and took money out of them. He believed such to be the fact, though he did not know it; and if R. M. Whitney had this power, was it not all-important that the people should know it? He (Mr. T.) had nothing to say about his character; but he desired to know whether R. M. Whitney was not influenced by donors from these banks; whether it was true that he received fifty thousand dollars a year, as had been stated. A bank which had a million of the public money on deposit, which was yielding $60,000 per annum, could readily afford to pay a part of the compensation named. He (Mr. T.) thought his suspicions that such a sum was paid would be confirmed. In any event, he desired to submit the case to the American people, with a full knowledge of all the circumstances. He hoped the gentlemen opposed to him would meet him fully in this instance. If all was fair as it should be, and as he trusted it might prove to be, let the friends of the administration have all the benefit which would result from the refutation of the charges.

Mr. D. J. Pearce said he had voted to lay the resolution and amendment on the table, because he was opposed both to the one and the other.

He was in favor of any resolution directing inquiry into any department of the government where, in the nature of things, it was proper the inquiry should be made. He considered the whole proposition as a work of supererogation. He would vote for the resolution if any gentleman who viewed the subject in a different light to himself, would put it in a proper shape. If the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Harlan) wanted a committee appointed on the part of the house, to ascertain whether the secretary of the treasury had assumed banking privileges; whether R. M. Whitney was stationed here as the agent of the deposit banks, with a view of giving him privileges above other individuals, and of receiving from the secretary of the treasury a protection which the secretary could not correctly confer upon another man, nor legally upon him, (R. M. W.) if, in short, the question was to resolve itself into one of malfeasance or malversation in office, he (Mr. P.) was willing, for one, that the committee should be raised, that the gentleman from Kentucky should be at the head of it, and that he should fully investigate all charges, so far as they can be made against the secretary of the treasury.

But suppose that Reuben M. Whitney was the agent of the deposit banks. He was not an agent under any act of congress, or under any power which the secretary of the treasury could exercise. He was the agent by virtue of a contract between him and the deposit banks. What right had the house or the secretary or the treasury to ask these banks if they had an agent, or what compensation was given to him? They might answer the question if they thought proper; and, if they did not think proper to answer it, the house would be no wiser by adopting this resolution.

It had been said that R. M. Whitney was seen in this city, sometimes in his office, sometimes reading newspapers, and, because he was so seen, the house was to adopt a resolution making these formal inquiries from the secretary of the treasury. So far as any thing could be brought to bear on the secretary of the treasury, shewing an improper connexion between him and Reuben M. Whitney, or any other individual, he (Mr. P.) was willing to go for an inquiry; but as to these roving investigations, these inquiries, he had expressed his opinion against them; he believed that no benefit was to be derived from them by the American people, and that their only effect would be to agitate the public mind. So much (said Mr. P.) for Reuben M. Whitney, who (Mr. P. apprehended) was one day to become a great man, on the ground that those who were great were indebted for their elevation more to their enemies than their friends; and who, but for the fictitious consequence which he had gathered from the thousand rumors which had been circulated against him, might have glided on to his grave with the contemptible insensibility of an oyster, so far as congress would have had any thing to do with him.

But as to the resolution itself. When did the bill by which these deposits were regulated become a law? At the last session of congress, he believed. These banks, would, no doubt, do what they had contracted to do under the deposit bill of the last session. They were under contracts with the secretary of the treasury—contracts entered into subsequent to the passage of that bill, and to the requirements of which they had conformed. But the resolution of the gentlemen from Virginia (Mr. Garland) goes back to the years 1835 and 1836.—What right had the secretary of the treasury to call for this information? What control could he exercise over the banks, independent of what was contained in the contract under the deposit bill? Would the banks condescend to comply with such requirements? And, if not, of what avail was the resolution, or what benefit could result from its adoption?

He saw no reason why the secretary of the treasury should make inquiries into these banks, rather than into any other banks, in order to know their surplus on hand. There was evil to be apprehended from the surplus on hand in all the banks, but this was the result of the banking system. If the object of the resolution really was to confer benefit on the public, then let the inquiry be extended to all similar institutions in the country. If congress was to legislate at all, let them not legislate for the few, but for the whole. Let them legislate for the people, for the hewers of wood and the drawers of water, for those men who suffer, and are made to suffer, in consequence of these institutions.

Mr. Trucey said he could see no objection to the resolution, nor any substantial objection to the amendment. Could any gentlemen object to a simple call for facts in possession of the department, where it was deemed important by every member that they should be in possession of congress? The gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. Pearce) had inquired, why not as well call for this information in relation to all the banks? He (Mr. T.) would answer. By a law passed at the last session of congress, and, by the course of the department under that law, contracts had been entered into with these deposit banks; and, as a preliminary to the formation of these contracts, the banks were required to put the department in possession of certain information in relation to their condition and business.—For this reason he (Mr. T.) would limit the inquiry to these banks. With other banks congress had nothing to do. He would, therefore, vote in favor of the resolution and also of the amendment. A certain agent in the treasury department had been alleged to be in this city performing certain acts.—The house had already received a communication from the treasury department stating that that individual had no connexion with that department. He had a connexion, for aught Mr. T. knew, with the deposit banks, and, so far as he was aware, there was no impropriety in their employing such an agent. But if these banks had communicated facts to the treasury department in relation to that agent, which it was important for the house to know, let him communicate them.

The house did not ask for any information which these banks were not required to give by virtue of their contracts. They asked for information, so far as it was in the possession of the department. He was for light; for fair investigation and inquiry; and so far as it could properly be done, he would examine and sift the departments to the bottom. It was not for the house, nor for the legislature, to refuse inquiry into any department. This was not an inquiry; it was a proper and legal inquiry into a public department, not necessarily involving the supposition that any thing was wrong. He hoped the inquiry would be allowed, and he appealed to the house to adopt the resolution, and thus throw open the door to discovery, if any thing there was to discover.

Mr. Vanderpoel submitted the following amendment to the amendment of Mr. Harlan:

"And whether the treasury department has any agent or attorney to correspond or communicate with said deposit banks, in relation to the public deposits; if so, who is such agent or correspondent; what compensation is allowed to him, and by whom is such allowance made or paid."

Pending which, the hour having elapsed, the house, on motion of Mr. E. Whittlesey, passed to the orders of the day, being the consideration of bills on the calendar of private business.

The house suspended the rule to enable Mr. Thomson, of Ohio, to offer the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the use of this hall be allowed for an exhibition of the pupils of the New England institution for the education of the blind, under the direction of Doct. S. G. Howe, on Tuesday next, at half past 10 o'clock A. M. for the space of one hour.

The remainder of the session was spent in the consideration of bills for the relief of individuals; among them was the bill for the relief of the heirs of Louis Durett, which was read a third time, but a final decision postponed until Friday next.

[This bill proposes to release to the heirs of Durett, sixty arpens of land in the city of Mobile of great value.]

Tuesday, Jan. 3. After the presentation of petitions, Mr. Ingersoll, from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill to provide for the support of the military academy of the United States for the year 1837; which was twice read, and committed to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

Mr. Yell, from the committee on public lands, made a report, in pursuance of the resolution of the house of the 20th December last, accompanied by a bill to revive, in part, the provisions of an act entitled "an act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands;" approved June 19, 1834; which bill was committed to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

On motion of Mr. J. Q. Adams,

Resolved, That the committee on revolutionary pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of restoring to the list of pensioners, for services in the revolutionary war, the names of all persons who were entitled to and obtained pensions under the act of 18th March, 1818, but whose names were afterwards stricken from the list, and have not since been restored, for the single reason that they were not in indigent poverty.

Mr. Harlan presented the joint preamble and resolution of the legislature of Kentucky, for the passage of a law compensating the troops called into the service of the United States, in virtue of an order from gen. Gaines to the governor of Kentucky, which troops were destined for Camp Sabine, but disbanded by the order of the president of the United States.

The resolutions offered by Mr. Gillet on the 30th of Dec. relative to the obstructions to the navigation of the Passaic river, and for the improvement of the mouth of Black river, were taken up and agreed to.

The speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of the navy, in accordance with the act of congress of May, 1836, transmitting a statement of the expenditures made from the contingent appropriations for the navy from the 1st day of October, 1835, to the 30th day of September, 1836.

The speaker also laid before the house a communication from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting the following statement:

Statement of the payments made to the states of Ohio, Indiana, Alabama, Missouri, Illinois, Mississippi, Louisiana and Arkansas, out of the five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of land within their respective limits; prepared in pursuance of a resolution of the house of representatives of the 26th December, 1836.

States.	Proportion of 5 per ct. pd.	Am't paid.

Treasury department, register's office, Dec. 26, 1836, T. L. SMITH, register.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the following resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Garland, of Virginia:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury communicate to this house, if within his power, a statement of the dividends and surpluses which were declared by, and surpluses and contingent funds remaining in, the several banks in which the public money is deposited for the years, 1833, '34, '35, '36, severally.

To which Mr. Harlan had offered the following amendment:

"And that he state also, whether the salary or compensation of an agent at the seat of the general government composes a part of the expenses of the said banks; the name of the said agent, and the several sums paid to him by the said institutions respectively."

To which amendment, Mr. Vanderpoel heretofore offered the following amendment:

"And whether the treasury department has any agent or attorney to correspond or communicate with said deposit banks, in relation to the public deposits; if so, who is such agent or correspondent; what compensation is allowed to him, and by whom is such allowances made or paid."

The house was addressed at length by Mr. Peyton; after which, Mr. Garland proposed to modify his resolution by adding thereto the following:

Resolved, That a committee of nine members be appointed whose duty it shall be to inquire whether the several banks employed for the deposit of the public moneys have all or any of them, by joint or several contract, employed an agent to reside at the seat of government to transact their business with the treasury department; what is the character of the business which he is so employed to transact; what compensation he receives; whether said agent, if there be one, has been employed at the request or through the procurement of the treasury department; whether the business of the treasury department with said banks is conducted through said agent; and whether in the transaction of any business confided to said agent he receives any compensation from the treasury department, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Thereupon Mr. Harlan withdrew his amendment, (which carried with it also the amendment to the amendment, offered by Mr. Vanderpoel).

Mr. McKay offered the following additional resolution to the first resolution of Mr. Garland, which Mr. G. accepted:

Resolved, further, That the secretary of the treasury report the actual amount of public moneys each of said banks has held on deposit on the first day of each quarter in the aforesaid years respectively, together with any other information which will show what proportion of said dividends and surpluses has been derived by the said banks from the use of the public moneys. Also, as far as can be ascertained, what have been the dividends and surpluses of an equal number of other banks than those that have the public moneys for the last two years.

And the question on the original resolution of Mr. Garland was taken and carried. And the question on the modified resolution proposed by Mr. McKay, was taken, and also carried.

The question then recurring on the additional resolution of Mr. Garland in relation to the existence of the agent for the deposit banks, &c.

Mr. Chambers called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and being taken, were, yeas 199, nays none.

So all three resolutions were adopted by a unanimous vote.

The house proceeded to the special order of the day, being the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Wise, providing for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the administration of the executive departments, &c.

A debate followed, in which Messrs. Pickens, Dunlap and Peyton participated, and a report of which will appear hereafter.

And, on motion of Mr. Robertson, without taking the question, the house adjourned.

Before announcing the adjournment, the speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of the treasury, in the words following, to wit:

Treasury department, Jan. 3, 1837.

SIR: I seize the earliest occasion to inform congress of the measures adopted by this department since the 1st instant, in compliance with the 13th section of the act regulating "the deposits of the public money."

The balance in the treasury on that day, which was subject to be apportioned among the different states, has, on the principles of the act, as construed by the attorney general, and explained in my last annual report, been ascertained to be $37,468,859 97.

The division of this sum, in detail, among the several states, may be seen in the document annexed, (A) and, including Michigan, equals $127,445 10 to each electoral vote.

In consequence of the proceedings of the last convention in Michigan, and the views expressed concerning them by the president of the United States, is his recent message communicating those proceedings to congress, together with the provisions of the bill now pending in one house on this question, the department has supposed her situation so far changed since November as to justify the assignment to her of a share of the public deposits, subject, however, entirely to the future decision of congress upon the propriety of this step.

The payment of the share assigned to Michigan will, therefore, be postponed till some expression of opinion shall be given by congress, which may either sanction its being made to her in the same manner as to the other states, or require its division among the other states in addition to the sums which have already been appropriated to them.

Twelve of the states have communicated their acceptance of the terms of the act, and accordingly transfers, equal in amount to the first quarterly deposit required under the law, are now issuing in favor of their respective agents.

Which is respectively submitted,

LEVI WOODBURY, sec. of the treasury.

Apportionment among the several states of the public money remaining in the treasury on the 1st January, 1837, excepting five millions of dollars.

Wednesday, Jan. 4. On motion of Mr. McKay, Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting or regulating by law the practice of officers of the army being employed in the service of individuals or incorporated companies, and receiving compensation from them during the time they hold their commissions.

On motion of Mr. Holsey,

Resolved, That the committee on Indian affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the granting of patents to assignees or holders of contracts of purchase of creek reservations, which have been certified by the agent, and approved by the president under the third article of the treaty with the Creek tribe of Indians, concluded at Washington, on the 24th day of March, 1832.

On motion of Mr. Johnson, of Kentucky, Resolved, That the committee on public lands be instructed to inquire into the propriety and justice of making an additional appropriation of land to satisfy the warrants in scrip which have been issued, and which may hereafter issue, in virtue of the laws and ordinances of the United States and of the state of Virginia, for services in the army of the revolution; and that the committee further inquire into the propriety of authorising the secretary of the treasury, in cases where scrip may have been and shall be issued, and all the heirs and others interested therein shall not appear or join in receiving the same, to issue to those who shall appear or join, or their attorney or attorneys, their proper portion, reserving in the treasury the portion due to those who do not appear or join as aforesaid.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. Owens, lies one day under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to furnish this house with a detailed statement of the number and names of the officers in the regular army of the United States who have resigned their commissions within the last twelve months, and the dates of said resignations; the number and names of the officers who have applied for and obtained furloughs within the same period of time, the date of said furloughs, and the reasons for granting the same; and the number and names of the officers who have refused to comply with the last general order of the president of the United States, requiring the officers of the army to join their regiments, and the reasons for such non-compliance; and any other matter connected with this subject that he may deem important to the public interests.

The following resolution, presented by Mr. Montgomery, lies one day under the rule:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to inform this house what quantity of public lands belongs to the United States in each state and territory, and their aggregate amount; what has been the whole cost attending their purchase and management up to the 1st December, 1836, designating the amount of each of the various heads of expenditure, with the dates at which the lands have been acquired; also, that he inform the house what amount of land has been surveyed and offered for sale in each of the states and territories, the amount which has been sold at public sale, the amount purchased at private sale, the probable amount that has been purchased by speculators, the amount that has probably been taken for actual settlement, the amount that will probably bring the government price or more, what amount will bring less than $1 25 per acre and over 75 cents per acre, what amount will bring 75 cents and over 50 cents per acre, what amount will bring 50 cents and over 25 cents per acre, what amount will bring 25 cents and under, and what amount will not sell at any price; also, the amount of cash paid into the public treasury, and disbursements made therefrom annually since 1790 inclusive.

Mr. Howard, from the committee on commerce, reported the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee on foreign affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of revising the acts of congress relative to foreign missions.

The speaker presented a communication from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting the report of the register and receiver of the land office for the southeastern district of Louisiana, made to that department under the act of congress of February, 1835, "for the final adjustment of claims to lands in the state of Louisiana," together with a communication from the commissioner of the general land office, touching the validity of the claims therein mentioned.

The speaker also laid before the house a communication from the treasury department, submitting a report, in compliance with the resolution of the house of representatives of the 10th July, 1832, directing the secretary of the treasury to lay before this house at the next and each successive session of congress, copies of statements and returns, as far as he is able to do, showing the capital, circulation, discounts, specie deposits, and condition of the different state banks and banking companies.

Mr. C. Allan offered the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas congress has heretofore made donations of the public lands for the purpose of internal improvement and education,

To the state of Ohio,	-	1,737,838 acres.
Indiana,	-	1,012,592
Illinois,	-	1,712,215
Missouri,	-	1,181,948
Mississippi,	-	733,244
Alabama,	-	1,216,450
Louisiana,	-	920,053
Territory of Michigan,	-	599,973
Arkansas,	-	996,338
Florida,	-	947,724

in the aggregate amounting to eleven million fifty-seven thousand six hundred and eighty-five acres:

And whereas each of the United States has an equal right to participate in the benefit of the public lands, the common property of the union;

And every wise and good American having agreed in the opinion that the cause of general education is indissolubly identified with the cause of general liberty:

Therefore, to do equal and exact justice to all the states, to aid in diffusing among the rising generation intelligence enough to comprehend, and spirit enough to defend, their rights, and thus to elevate the national character and insure the perpetuity of our free institutions—

Be it resolved, That a select committee of one member from each state be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the justice and expediency of making to each of the thirteen original American states, together with each of the states of Vermont, Maine, Kentucky and Tennessee, such grants of the public lands, for the purposes of education, as will correspond in a just proportion with those heretofore made in favor of the first named states and territories, and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise. But, to avoid the objection of one state holding land in another, the committee is directed to insert a clause in the bill which they may report, providing that the grants to be made thereby shall be subject to sale under the laws of the general government now in force, and that the proceeds arising therefrom shall be paid over to the states entitled to the same.

Mr. Hall, of Maine, moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "select committee to consist of one member from each state," and insert "the committee on public lands," but withdrew his motion after some remarks from Mr. C. Allan in opposition to it.

Mr. Vinton moved to amend the resolution by adding thereto the following:

Resolved, That the said inquiry extend to all the states, and that the said committee be further instructed to inquire into the expediency of inserting a clause in said bill to pay said new states the value of the improvements made by them on the public lands, or to pay to them the amount the public lands would have been assessed for taxes, if they had been private property.

A debate now ensued between Messrs. Vinton, C. Allan, Briggs, Parker, Johnson, of Louisiana, (who moved to amend the resolution by extending its provisions to all the states in the union), Claiborne, Ashley and Mann, during which Mr. Claiborne, of Mississippi, moved to amend the amendment by adding as follows:

"And provided that no such grant shall interfere with, or be located on the claim or improvement of any actual settler on the public lands."

After some remarks from Mr. Ashley, in favor of referring the resolution to the committee on public lands, Mr. Jarvis moved the previous question, but the house refused to second the call. Mr. A. Mann, after contending that this proposition was nothing more than the old proposition for the distribution of the public lands in disguise, expressed his opinion that the preamble to the resolution was intended to deceive, and said, if in order, he would move to strike it out. The speaker said the motion was not now in order. Mr. Mann gave notice that, when in order, he would renew the motion. Mr. Cambreleng said that he thought it would be better to dispose of one resolution at a time, and for this purpose he would move that the house proceed to the orders of the day; which motion prevailed.

The house resumed the consideration of the resolution of Mr. Wise, and the amendment thereto pending, proposing an inquiry into the executive departments.

Mr. Robertson addressed the house until the usual hour for adjournment, when he gave way to a motion to adjourn, and the house adjourned.

Thursday, Jan. 5. After the presentation of petitions and reports

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the treasury, containing a statement of the causes which have prevented the execution of the ninth article of the treaty of 1819, with Spain, and the two acts of congress passed in relation thereto, furnished in compliance with the order of this house of the 26th of December; which letter was referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the navy, transmitting a list of the names of the persons employed as clerks in the navy department during the year 1836, with the compensation of each. Laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. Hall, of Maine, it was resolved that the committee on engrossed bills be now appointed.

Some business of minor importance was next transacted, when the house resumed the consideration of the resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Chilton Allan relative to the public lands, with the amendments of Messrs. Vinson, Johnson, of Lou. and Claiborne, of Miss. Mr. Harrison, of Mo. addressed the house at length in opposition to the resolution, and with a view to show that the preamble was entirely erroneous in the assumption which it contained, that the grants to the new states were gratuitous for which no consideration had been received. He denied the position; and maintained that the states accepted the land, not as a gratuity, but under a compact entered into under the ordinance of 1787, by which compact the new states, in consideration of the grants, had surrendered one of the greatest attributes of sovereignty—the right to tax the public domain within their limits.

Mr. Hannegan was of opinion that no practical good was to be obtained by the continuance of the discussion, and moved to lay the whole subject on the table. Mr. C. Allan called for the yeas and nays on that motion, which were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 95, nays 99. So the motion to lay the subject on the table was rejected.

On motion of Mr. Garland, of Va. the house proceeded to the orders of the day.

The house resumed the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Wise, together with the pending amendment of Mr. D. J. Pearce, providing for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the administration of the executive departments.

Mr. Robertson concluded his remarks, and the house was addressed by Messrs. Hannegan and Hamer. Mr. H. had not concluded, when he gave way to a motion for adjournment; and on motion of Mr. Anthony, the house adjourned.

DÉBATE ON THE ADMISSION OF MICHIGAN.

In the senate December 30, 1836.

Mr. Grundy, from the committee on the judiciary, reported a bill for the admission of the state of Michigan into the union; which was by consent, read twice. (See page 294.)

Mr. Grundy moved that the bill now receive its third reading; it was but short; the facts of the case were well known; and, if any senator wished further information, he stood ready to give it, so far as it was in possession of the committee.

Mr. Ewing objected to the bill's receiving its third reading at this time. It was far too important in its character to be hurried through the senate in this manner, without time to look at or consider it.

Mr. Calhoun joined in the objection. He had not, he said, looked much at the question involved in the bill, nor was he acquainted with the facts of the case; but, assuming them to be as had been stated in the president's message, this was one of the very gravest questions ever submitted to the senate. It was certainly one which required to be maturely considered, and carefully weighed. He wished more time for reflection; first, that he might more accurately ascertain what the facts were; and, secondly, that he might weigh them in his mind with the care they demanded. He presumed others were of like mind: and, with a view to ascertain the wishes of the senate, he would move that the farther consideration of the bill be postponed, and that it be made the order of the day for that day week.

Mr. Grundy did not object to allowing gentlemen a reasonable time, but thought the day named too distant. There was one good reason why the bill should receive an earlier consideration: the distribution of the deposits was to take place soon after the first day of January next, and it was desirable, if the bill was to pass at all, that it passed early enough to admit the state of Michigan to receive, with her sisters of the confederacy, her due proportion of the public moneys; but if the whole subject was put off, as had been moved, the passage of the bill might be so far delayed as to render this impossible. This, surely, was a strong argument for as early an attention to the subject as possible. As to the facts of the case, they were detailed in the president's message, and in the documents which had been reported with the bill: he was fully aware that they presented a case, in regard to which the judgments of gentlemen might widely differ, but the facts themselves were few, and might soon be told. In June last, congress had passed a bill declaring that, on certain conditions therein set forth, the new state of Michigan should be received into the union: one of which was that certain boundary lines should be assigned to the state; and another that a convention of the people of Michigan, convened for the express purpose, should express their assent to these conditions, and agree to come into the confederacy on the terms prescribed. The act contained no directions as to the manner in which such convention should be called. A convention was ordered by the legislature of Michigan; which met, and concluded to reject the conditions of admission, and communicated such dissent to the president of the United States. On farther reflection, however, without any particular form of legislation, the people themselves had since spontaneously met in their primary assemblies, and called a second convention, by which body it had been agreed to accept the conditions of the law, and thus to enter the confederacy. It was since ascertained that from 5,000 to 6,000 votes for this latter convention had been cast for the same members who had formerly decided to refuse the terms of admission, and from 8,000 to 9,000 in favor of men of a different opinion. This, he believed, was about as correct a statement of the facts of the case as could be obtained by greater delay. The question was certainly open as to the validity of the acts of this latter convention, on which, no doubt, there would be a diversity of opinion; but as to the facts there could be no dispute. It would appear, on examination, that although a majority of the people of Michigan had, at the date of the first convention, been opposed to accepting the terms of admission, yet, at the time the last was held, an overwhelming majority had been in favor of the measure. When these facts should be found and admitted to be as stated, Mr. G. should give his views as to what ought to be the consequence. But he was anxious that the law should be passed in time for Michigan to get her proportion of the public money. The secretary could not make the distribution on the first of the month, as all the returns would not then be in, but he might probably be in circumstances to do so within ten days thereafter.

Mr. Calhoun said that no senator was more anxious that the new state of Michigan should be received into the confederacy than himself, or could be more willing that she should obtain her due proportion of the public money placed in deposit with the several states. He desired to interpose no unnecessary delay, and would vary his motion so as to propose that this bill be made the order for Tuesday next. (Monday, he presumed, would scarce be a business day, and many of the members might be absent.) According, however, to the statement given by the gentleman himself, there was at the bottom of this subject one of the gravest, the very gravest questions which could be agitated; so grave, indeed, that important as he conceived the deposit act to be, he could almost prefer that their respective proportions of the surplus fund should be withheld from all the states, than that a bill like this should rashly be passed. He wished, he repeated it, more time for reflection.

Mr. Morris said that although he was one of the committee who had reported the bill, yet he did not concur in the preamble as reported. He did not, indeed, doubt that Michigan ought to be admitted into the union, and should rejoice at her admission. But, as the chairman had correctly stated, the act of congress providing for her admission, made it conditional, and required her previous assent to the condition, that assent was to be made known to the president of the United States. Now, the assent of the people of Michigan had not yet reached the president at the date of his last communication, and therefore congress did not officially know the fact. The first question was, whether the senate was competent to declare the act of the last convention a valid act. The law required that a convention should be called for the express object of expressing assent or dissent to the conditions of reception. Now the senate had learned from the president's message that the people of Michigan had assembled in a convention called by their own legislature, and had declared their dissent, and had communicated such dissent to the president. But, after this solemn act by a convention legally called, it seemed that there had another convention been gotten up without any authority of law, and on the acts of this body the present bill was founded. It involved questions of the highest magnitude. Mr. M. went on to express his opinion that the doings of the latter convention could be no guide for the legislation of congress, who ought to act just as if no such body had ever met. He was of opinion that the third section of the admission law, which required the previous assent of the people of Michigan to conditions presented by congress, was an imposition upon that people; but the correct mode would now be to repeal that act, and to receive the state at once. The whole law had proceeded on the hypothesis that there was an unsettled boundary line between Michigan and the state south of her; but as one of the senators of that state, he considered the question of boundary as fully settled. He was willing to admit Michigan, but not on grounds which were unfounded in fact. He gave notice that he should, when the bill came up for consideration, move to strike out the preamble; it was intended as a key to the bill; but it was calculated rather to mislead than to guide to the true principle on which the bill was founded. It was possible that, on further reflection, he might change his mind; but such were his present impressions.

Mr. Grundy said that the committee, when draughting the bill, had also taken under consideration that view of the subject presented by the senator from Ohio; and if, on Monday, the senate should concur in that view, no regard would be had in the bill to the late convention accepting the terms of admission, and thus the object of admission would be attained. But it was on this ground that Mr. G. preferred the preamble, that Michigan could then never claim as a state what congress had thus decided against. And, as there was an inveterate controversy between Michigan and Ohio, he thought it the better way to bind Michigan, so that under no pretext could she set up a claim to a section of country belonging to Ohio. If the preamble should be stricken out, the subject would be more open to controversy than if it should be retained. Mr. G. believed that, by the preamble, Michigan would be estopped from coming forward and claiming any thing. It was merely on this ground that he was in favor of retaining the preamble. But, to obviate objections, he was willing that the bill should be postponed, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. Buchanan said he was aware that the present was not the proper occasion to discuss the merits of the bill which had been reported; nor did he purpose to enter on its discussion; but, as other gentlemen had briefly stated their opinions on the subject, he would in like manner state what was his own view of the matter. He did not consider the subject of the bill as peculiarly grave or difficult, save as it was always a grave question whether a new state should be received into the union. The language of the admission act, which had passed last year, was very plain to him, so much so, indeed, that he had expected the president would have issued his proclamation at once, without referring the question to congress for decision. Mr. B. here quoted the act, and observed that it contained no provision requiring any legislative action on the part of Michigan to authorise a convention of the people. It would have been improper that it should. He insisted it was perfectly competent for the people of that territory to hold a convention spontaneously, without any application to the legislature about the matter; and if they had done so, the only question was whether such convention had decided to accept the conditions of admission which congress had (very properly in his judgment) required. He believed it had; and the case was therefore very plain. He understood there had been more votes, by 2,000 on both sides, given in this latter than in the first convention; and no matter how many unsuccessful attempts had previously been made, if their consent had at last been given, there was an end of the matter; they were clearly entitled to admission. He should not enter on the argument, but merely throw out his opinion, which he should be ready, at the proper time, to enforce with what little power he might command.

Mr. Ewing concurred with his colleague (Mr. Morris) in the opinion that the last convention held in Michigan was altogether illegal and unauthorized. He saw in it nothing which was entitled to be called a convention of the people. He was also opposed to the preamble of the bill. He had not examined the bill itself, and could not say what might be his opinion of it should the preamble be stricken out; but how much soever it might operate as an estoppel to the new state of Michigan from ever hereafter mooting again the vexed question of her boundary line, he was not in favor of having that estoppel effected by what he considered a mere fiction. (Mr. E. quoted the admission act to show the conditions of admissions). Now did any one suppose that it was a fulfilment of this condition for the people to rise up in their primary assemblies, without legal organization or civil authority, and declare their assent to the conditions of admission? Was society thus to be reduced to its elements, and was it to act without social organization? The act of congress had recognised no such principle; it had recognised the principle of social organization; and to hold the validity of the acts of such an assemblage as had come together under the name of a convention of the people, was, in his judgment, so strange as to amount almost to an absurdity. Interested or not, he thought, in all fairness, the estoppel effected by such an act of assent ought not to be accepted and held binding. It was based upon an act that was wholly void. It was said, indeed, that a majority of the people had voted; but where was the evidence of any regular social organization in the convention? What guaranty did congress possess that it had been convened according to the forms of the constitution? Who voted? Who notified the people at large of the time and place of meeting?—Did the people all consent to such time and such place? It was, at least, not probably they did.—The people of this country were in the habit of looking to some regular and recognised authority in all their proceedings. A, B, and C, in a particular county declaring that they would meet to consider this public question, did not lay the basis of a convention. How had the election of members of the convention been conducted? Who had been the judges of election? had they been sworn? if so, their oath must have been extra-judicial. And who had been permitted to vote? It had been said that there were two thousand more votes given on either side than in the first convention. That that number of votes had been counted he did not doubt; but where was the evidence that they had been given? No warrant, or qualification of voters, had been alluded to. Mr. E. had no objection to the admission of Michigan, but let it be done regularly, and in a proper manner; and let nothing like trick be practised upon the people of the new state, by an estoppel improperly obtained against their claims.

Mr. Morris said he was very thankful for information that would show the ground on which the parties stood in the discussion. He understood the gentleman (Mr. B.) thus: that all which was required of the people of Michigan was that they should choose a convention, and that such a convention should assent to the act of admission. The gentleman even went further; if one convention had failed, the people might choose another, and so go on ad infinitum. This doctrine (Mr. M. thought) went directly to dissolve the whole elements of society, and to destroy all the obligations of law. It amounted to this: that if an act of congress should be passed for the punishment of an offence, which act required a judicial investigation, the people might, notwithstanding, rise in an original assembly, and themselves inflict the punishment.

Again, if Michigan had adopted a constitution, it was bound to abide by that constitution. But this proposed act of congress would give the people of Michigan the power to amend and add to that constitution. Mr. M. thought that doctrines of this kind ought not to be tolerated. And if such an original convention was proper, how was it to be created? Was one county to notify another, or one individual another; or how was it to be done? If the people of Michigan might act in this irregular way, then so might the people of any of the states, and all government and law would be thus already dissolved into their original elements, and the whole fabric of our institutions would be reduced to a shadow. And the fault would not be so much in the people of Michigan as in this proposed act of congress. Mr. M. thought much mischief would follow the passage of the bill with such a preamble. It would be establishing by congress the doctrine that we are not to be governed by law, but by popular frenzy. When the legislature of Michigan passed the law authorising a convention, was there any objection made to that law? But why pass the law, if the people might rise in an original convention? It was such a convention that at least accepted the terms of admission—a convention which, as the president had informed us, was got up without law; and the president had therefore not issued his proclamation of admission. It seemed to Mr. M. that all this was a wide departure from the constitution and laws of the country; and he should, therefore, at the proper time, move to strike out the preamble.

Mr. Buchanan regretted that, in expressing a mere general opinion, he had unintentionally given rise to the present discussion. The senator from Ohio, who had just taken his seat, had stated the ground he had taken in such strong terms, that Mr. B. supposed that if an angel from heaven should attempt to convince him of the contrary he would labor in vain. That honorable senator had discovered that Mr. B. was a great latitudinarian, and that, if the principles he had stated should once be admitted, every thing would run to confusion. The people, it seemed, would rise, and not only legislate for themselves, but execute justice also! (He presumed by Lynch law). But he denied the justice of any such inferences from his doctrine. By what authority had the first convention been held? Not from any power given by the act of congress to the legislature of Michigan to pass a law calling a convention. Why, then, had such an act been passed? Clearly from the necessity of the case. Michigan had been acting as a sovereign state, and congress had been treating with her touching her admission into the union. It had been very proper in the legislature to pass such a law; but the convention assembled under it had proved ineffectual. Congress had acted wisely in not requiring any act of the legislature to give validity to the convention. The sovereign people of the state of Michigan had a right to do, in this matter, just what they should please to do. And even had the legislature refused to pass a law calling a convention, the people would still have possessed the right to meet in their primary assemblies, and make their wishes known to the legislature. He admitted that congress should first be satisfied that the convention had acted in a regular manner, and had actually concurred in the conditions of admission. But, when this was proved, it was no longer a matter of favor to receive the new state. It was her right to come in. He should not go into the argument at this time; when the bill came up he should be happy to meet the two senators from Ohio in its discussion.

Mr. Benton said it was impossible that any question could arise about the admission, on which every gentleman had not already made up his mind. The subject had already been 4 or 5 years before congress. Mr. B. insisted that the question was a mere question of right, a right which existed four years ago, but which had been met at the threshold, and fought inch by inch, till, at the last session of congress, the friends of the admission had determined to sit it out. The admission had been resisted in a manner unknown to the history of the country. And now it was to be put off till Monday, when the senate had rather occasion to sit at night in these short days; and the nights would be necessary for the discussion of this question. If all the questions brought forward should be discussed, they might begin with Adam, who had but one woman to govern, and enter into the history of original conventions. There was no necessity of postponing till Monday. All the time would be little enough for them to get rid of what was pent up within them almost to bursting on this subject. But if postponed, then, when Monday should come, Mr. B. would come and sit down in his chair, and would camp on this ground till Michigan should be admitted.

The discussion ended by making the bill the order of the day for Monday next.

SPEECH OF MR. PEYTON, OF TENN.

Upon the resolution of Mr. Wise proposing a select committee of investigation, and Mr. Pearce's motion to amend the same. December 15.

MR. SPEAKER: I was, at first, somewhat surprised that the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. Pearce) should be found in opposition to this investigation. That gentleman was once the zealous advocate of rigid scrutiny into all abuses committed by public functionaries. In an elaborate speech, upon this floor, he once sustained an investigation similar to the one now proposed by my friend from Virginia, (Mr. Wise). I allude to the case of the Wiscasset collector. But, sir, the gentleman announces the fact that he has changed. He was then opposed to general Jackson—violently and bitterly opposed to him—and he manifested that opposition in every conceivable way, and upon every subject that arose. But having now become a Jackson man, he has undergone, it seems, a complete political transformation. And what a change! his old principles discarded—his mental vision in total and disastrous eclipse, he has closed his eyes upon fraud, and speculation, and plunder!

But, sir, has it come to this, that the gentleman from Rhode Island is put forward as the champion of Andrew Jackson? Has that distinguished citizen already sunk so low that his fame and reputation are committed to the keeping of such hands?—Oh, spectacle, mortifying and humiliating, to the honest friends and original supporters of Andrew Jackson! those who fought with him, and voted for him! who advocated his first election upon principle, and who, unlike the gentleman, yet stand up the dauntless advocates of the same principles?—What must they think, how must they feel, when they are informed that the president's reputation as a statesman has fallen into the custody of that gentleman, who, formerly a violent, loathed and detested assailant, has thrown himself into the current of the president's popularity, strong enough to bear even him along, and is now become his pretended fulsome eulogist and defender?

But, sir, to the gentleman's objections, or rather his pretended objections, to the proposed inquiry.

He has given a striking specimen of the cunning and tact of the sect to which he belongs, by the issue which he has made up—a false, hypocritical issue. What is it? Why, forsooth, that it involves the president's veracity! that it will be, does the president speak the truth when he says that all the officers are "honest" as well as capable! and that he, good tender-hearted man, cannot endure to hear any thing which infringes, in the slightest degree, upon the veracity of that high functionary. Under this false and fraudulent issue the gentleman takes shelter, and expects to escape all inquiry, all investigation. Is argument required to expose a position so monstrous? Will not every high-minded man in the nation look upon it with scorn and indignation? Sir, I deny and denounce this as that false issue which has so long been the shield of the party, and behind which they always skulk at the slightest approach of danger. The president says that they are honest, and the gentleman says you are not to prove them to be rogues, because that would be to make out the president a liar. What a position!

Did the president write the paragraph in his message, laudatory of these officers, which the gentleman himself admits is unusual in such a document, and which, I am sure, has no precedent or parallel? No, sir, not one word of it, and he does not know, at this moment, that it is there. What is it, sir, which these gentlemen, so able and so honest, have introduced into the message, and now claim that it is evidence of so high and sacred a nature that it cannot be examined or impeached? Here it is:

"Before concluding this paper, I think it due to the various executive departments to bear testimony to their prosperous condition, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce in all of them a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business; and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation."

Did Andrew Jackson write this sweeping certificate of moral character for these gentlemen? No, sir, no. I plead non est factum. It is not his deed. They have fraudulently smuggled it into his message, to evade scrutiny into their conduct. Instead of stifling inquiry, it is of itself a cause of suspicion. I say, sir, that the president did not write it; in support of which avowment, I have evidence satisfactory, at least, to my own mind, and such as should be made known to this house, to the country at large, and to posterity. It should thus be made known, in order to shield the name and fame of the president from that imputation which, in all time to come, would attach to them, in consequence of this flagrant abuse of the confidence reposed by him in others. The committee on the part of the senate, which, according to usage, was appointed to wait upon the president at the commencement of the session, and inform him of the readiness of congress to receive the very message in question, found him extended on a sick couch, scarcely able to raise his hand. On the eve of their departure, he urged the senator from Tennessee (Mr. Grundy) to come back soon, and talk with him; that he was lonesome, wanted company, and wished to have his friends about him. The senator (alas, that it should be necessary for him to invoke the attendance of friends, and of such friends!) did return, and remained with the president more than an hour, during which time he never alluded to the subject of politics. He spoke of dying, of the Hermitage, of his hope that he might be spared till he could reach it in the spring. His thoughts were with his heart, "and that was far away." dwelling upon other and doubtless holier meditations than writing eulogies upon public functionaries, whose conduct he was in no situation to examine, and who, if they were honest, needed not his testimony to the fact.

But the gentleman from Rhode Island has another objection to the mode of proceeding proposed by my friend from Virginia. He says that it is unnecessary, because, by the standing rules of the house, the investigation into all such matters is enjoined, as a duty, upon the committee of ways and means. The rule alluded to by the gentleman reads as follows: "It shall be the duty of the committee of ways and means to take into consideration all such reports of the treasury department, and all such propositions relative to the revenue, as may be referred to them by the house, &c. &c. to examine into the state of the several public departments, and particularly into the laws making appropriations of moneys, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws, and also to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the departments, and the accountability of their officers." And yet the gentleman, in a subsequent part of his argument, contended that the exercise, by the house, of such a power as is hereby enjoined upon one of its standing committees, would be a disfranchisement of the heads of departments! An ex parte trial and conviction according to the rules of the common law! The rule referred to by the gentleman shows the sense entertained by the house in relation to the necessity of such investigations as the one proposed into the state and condition of the several departments, with a view to the rigid accountability of public officers, and the legal disbursement of the public moneys.

But, sir, is the committee of ways and means the appropriate committee to make such examinations? Look at the past. How long have complaints of malversation in office been ringing in the ears of gentlemen? Look at the formation of that committee. Its chairman (Mr. Cambreleg) labors under a political, if not a legal, disability to institute and conduct them with efficiency. Dare he move in such a cause? No, sir; he would seal his fate forever. But, if that committee were forced by the house into the investigation, with what hope of success could we rely upon it? The head of each department would hand over to the chairman of that committee such a statement as he might choose to send here.

Why, sir, it would be like the trial of R. M. Whitney. Reuben has been tried, and, as you will be glad to hear, acquitted, since the last session.—But how tried? Not by a committee of this house? No, sir, he was tried on the other side of the Alleghenies, while the witnesses and the prosecutor were a thousand miles off. He was tried at Jonesborough, Tennessee, before the president of the United States; the prosecutor not my friend from Virginia, (Mr. Wise), but one John Kennedy, who prosecuted Reuben so handsomely, that he has since been rewarded by an appointment. Reuben was arraigned before the president in a large crowd, the charges against him so drawn up that they could all be answered in his favor without touching the true issues which involve his guilt or innocence. They, in effect, asked the president—is Reuben a saint, or is he a sinner? "He is a persecuted patriot, sir; persecuted on account of his opposition to the United States bank." "There!" said they, "do you hear that?" and the shout, hurra for Reuben, was loud and long. But, sir, the gentleman chose to wander from the subject before the house, and carry this political war into Tennessee. This is contrary to the policy of his state during the late war with Great Britain. She then had a higher regard for state lines and state sovereignty: her patriotism was only commensurate with her small limits.

He represents the president as going to the Hermitage on private business, and seems to justify all which his party attempted to achieve by the president's visit to Tennessee. A private visit to the Hermitage! They scarcely gave him time to shake hands with the old family servants at the Hermitage. He was hurried from place to place, dragged along through dust and heat to public meetings, at towns and villages, and cross roads, and country stores; carried through Tennessee and Alabama; brought back, and taken through Kentucky, by the way of Cincinnati, to Washington. The friends of Mr. Van Buren resorted to every art to excite and induce him to take an active part in the election; and they now talk of a private visit to the Hermitage! Sir, I was told this morning, as I entered the capitol, that some one of the members from Tennessee denied certain facts which every one there knows to be true. I hope, sir, that no such denial has been made. But, if it has, I stand ready to meet the gentleman, and maintain the truth of those facts any where. The president assailed me for the course which he said I had pursued in relation to the bill which contained the appropriation to carry into effect the Cherokee treaty, before he left the city, which complaint he frequently repeated on his way to the Hermitage. At Knoxville, a gentleman produced the Globe newspaper, which showed that I had voted and spoken in support of that measure. But it had no effect, for he continued to speak of it as he had done before. At Sparta, he denounced my friend from Virginia (Mr. Wise) as a liar. At the house of Mrs. Sanders, in Sumner county, Tennessee, he stated that my colleague (Mr. Bell) "told twenty lies in one speech, and knew them to be lies at the time;" and that Peyton was a greater liar than Bell. In passing through the district of my colleague (Mr. Forester), his very able speech at the last session of congress having been mentioned, the president stated "that any man could get as good a speech as that written at Washington for five dollars." When asked how Mr. Huntsman was, in relation to political parties, "He's on the fence," said the general, "and no one knows which side he will fall." The constituents of another one of my colleagues inquired, "Well, general, what do you think of our representative, Mr. Shields?" "Oh!" said he, "he's of no account, sir, no account; turn him out, and send some one in his place who is of some account." I have repeated these things, sir, not on account of any pleasure they afford me, but because those very gentlemen who were the cause of these exhibitions are now denying them. Let any man deny this statement who dare.

But the gentleman from Rhode Island calls upon us to take "the bull by the horns," "to move an impeachment against the president at once"—says that "he is accountable for the acts of his ministers, and any attack upon them is in effect an impeachment of him." This is strange doctrine to me, sir. We wish to rope these calves, and drag them bleating as they go from the treasury, for they have been sucking too long already; and the gentleman says no, "take the bull by the horns." Move an impeachment against the president, indeed! He accountable, criminally accountable for the want of integrity on the part of his ministers! Was there ever any thing more impudent than this? Because general Jackson is a patriot, does it follow that Reuben M. Whitney is any thing but what the world knows him to be? Because general Jackson is an honest man, does it follow that Amos Kendall, and all the other "hirelings," as he calls them, are honest too? This, sir, is the doctrine of the party—the doctrine of men into whose hands the government of the country has fallen. But, sir, the gentleman, in thus shuffling himself under the protecting mantle of the president, but displays the usual tact of the party to which he belongs. They are all patriots, if the president be a patriot. They are all honest men, if the president be an honest man. Sir, let me put a case in common life to illustrate this doctrine; one which every farmer will understand. Take any man of seventy years of age, put him on a farm with sixty hands to control, give him a full crop, corn, tobacco and small grain; can he manage them so that no part of the crop will suffer? Suppose his foremen are faithless and roguish, that they are detected marauding the country of nights, taken with their pigs and turkeys, their chickens and potatoes, upon them, could they plead the virtues of their master as a justification of their crimes? Could you not Lynch them without meaning to inflict blows upon the good old man whose confidence they had abused? There is no man amongst them who can stand one moment upon his own merits. No, sir, they have crowded and huddled together under the mantle of general Jackson, until that is not broad enough to cover them; they have worn it threadbare, stretched and torn it into tatters. You may occasionally get a glimpse of Van's bald pate popped out here, Amos's sharp face there, Felix's red eyes yonder, Blair's shank at one place, and Reuben's pockets filled with treasury receipts at another; and now, sir, we have the gentleman from Rhode Island squealing around like an odd pig, for whom there is no teat, hunting a place to crawl in at. Now, sir, what I wish is, to strip the Jackson mantle off these gentlemen, and let them stand up for themselves.—Every one knows that no gentleman upon this floor has any motive, any wish to make an issue with general Jackson; that he cannot be the object of this resolution. His course is run, his day is past, his power is in other hands, and we wish to hold those gentlemen accountable for the manner in which they exercise it. There has been no investigation into the departments, which we propose to examine, for the last eight years. We wish to see a settlement of their accounts at the bar of the public, and the balance fairly struck between them and the people. They may be honest, very honest; if so, it is due to themselves that they show it. It may be otherwise, and, in that event, it is due to the country that we should have a committee of the house to show that. How is it proposed that they shall come to trial? Upon the certificate contained in the message, and upon that alone. The gentleman himself admits that these sweeping certificates are unusual. I detest the whole system of certifying which pervades every department of the government, and can be traced from Reuben M. Whitney up, (I believe you cannot go from Reuben down). Yes, sir, a coward, who shrinks and runs from an adversary whom he has injured, will get a certificate of his courage to use upon the stump; a traitor will get a certificate of his patriotism; a rogue of his honesty; and a perjured witness of his veracity; and if you attempt to fix upon either of these his true character, he will ensconce himself behind his certificate. We ask permission to go into the various departments, and see what their true condition is.

But, says the gentleman, that is equivalent to an impeachment of the president, for here is his statement that all is well; "that there is no just cause of complaint from any quarter;" and the argument is, that if you find just cause of complaint, it will show that what the president has said is not true, and, therefore, if you do not mean to attack the president, there must be no examination whatever. We hold these officers, whose conduct we propose to examine, to be trustees, and we have reason to believe that they have abused their trust, and abused the confidence of the president, and demand that they shall give an account of their own conduct to the representatives of the people, and are met at once, and told that you are putting the president upon his trial; it is an impeachment against him; make out your specifications and summons him to the bar of the senate. All we ask, sir, is, that the representatives of the American people shall send a committee and examine the archives, records and papers of their own government, in any and all of its departments, and make their report of the facts to this house. We propose no criminal prosecution against any one, but an investigation into the condition of the departments, and the honesty and fidelity of the public agents, and this the gentleman calls disfranchisement under the common law. He was eloquent and extravagant in his eulogiums upon the heads of these departments; he spouted their praises in poetry, and I suppose he means they shall live in song and story. He says the secretary of the treasury has not slept upon his arms. No, sir, he has not slept, and the party should feel under the highest obligations to him, for he has so contrived as to make the treasury and the public lands a powerful auxiliary to Mr. Van Buren in the late election. By the celebrated treasury order, which he issued, requiring specie in payment for the public lands, with an exception in favor of the citizens of the states in which those lands are situated, he in effect offered a bribe of one hundred dollars a head for votes in the states of Mississippi, Arkansas, Missouri and Michigan, which was then looked upon as a state. For, sir, at the sale of public lands in Mississippi last fall, specie was worth at one time twenty per cent. and, while the citizens of Tennessee, then considered in rebellion against Mr. Van Buren, were required to pay this enormous tax, the citizens of Mississippi, a doubtful state in the election, were exempt from it. At government price, three hundred and twenty acres of land would cost the Mississippian four hundred dollars, while the Tennessean, for the same quantity, was compelled to pay the sum of five hundred dollars, from the necessity he was placed under by this order of raising specie. And, sir, this was not confined to the poor and needy, but extended to the nabob with his hundreds of hands, and thousands of bales, while the specie was extracted from the most indigent and meritorious Tennessean. This, sir, is what I call high-handed oppression on the one side, and wholesale bribery and corruption on the other. Philip of Macedon never made a more unblushing use of money to corrupt and enslave the people of Greece. This secretary must be entitled to the praise, and something more substantial still, to a portion of the spoils of the party. The gentleman alluded, also, to the visit of the secretary of state, (Mr. Forrest), to Georgia, which he calls unfortunate; true, his visit was unfortunate; and of the visit of the secretary of the navy, (Mr. Dickerson), to New Jersey, which was also unfortunate. He seems unwilling to give them any credit for well meant exertions, and "wishes to God they had staid at home." This appears rather ungrateful, as they used every effort to rally his shattered forces—that he was openly electioneering for Mr. Van Buren. Amos, too, if I was correctly informed, made an excursion for a like purpose, into New England. I am sure that I saw it stated that he had his face lithographed and copies sent through the country, so that those who could not see "the divine original, might at least gaze on love's counterfeit."

But, sir, the gentleman assumes another ground in defence of these "ministers" as he calls them. He says the appointment of this committee would amount to a disfranchisement of those officers whose conduct it is proposed to scrutinize, by denying to them a trial according to the strict rule of the criminal law. This principle holds only where a man is on trial for crime. All laws are to be liberally expounded, so as to detect fraud, but strictly construed when you come to punish a criminal. The gentleman goes too fast; he leaps to the conclusion, leaving us at the beginning of this matter; while we are commencing the development of fraud and corruption, which the law abhors, he anticipates the awful result which may be brought about, and is appealing to your sympathy on behalf of the culprit. Now, if he will be patient, we will go on with him, and in due season we will lean to the side of mercy, and acquit wherever there is reasonable doubt. This is strange doctrine to come from that side of the house. These officers are the trustees of the people, and accountable to the people. They have been long in office, and are about entering upon a new lease; and now, when called upon to make an exhibition of their fidelity and ability, their friends upon this floor raise the cry of disfranchisement and summary punishment. I deny and utterly repudiate this doctrine. Sir, in private life, no one denies the right of a principal to look into the conduct of his agent. What would that principal think of an agent who would shut his books and say, I claim protection under the criminal code; you cannot examine these books, lest it may lead to a prosecution against me? What honest man would not say at once he was guilty? What judge would sustain the objection for an instant? Take the case of a guardian: a motion is made in court, a committee is appointed, and he is brought forthwith to a settlement; could he object on the ground that the examination of his accounts might develop crime, and lead to punishment? And, sir, have not the American people the same power over these keepers of their treasure, and guardians of their constitution, laws and liberties, which a court of justice can exercise over the guardian of an estate, and the children who own it? Sir, because investigation may lead to such a discovery, it does not preclude investigation altogether. The gentleman's fancy seems to be haunted by the idea of criminal prosecutions and penitentiary punishments. Well, sir, his fancies may be realized; he may know something calculated to excite his alarm: it may lead to that, and I would not be surprised if, in some instances, it did; but we move no impeachment, no indictment, no presentment at this time. We merely ask that this house, as the great inquest of the nation, shall inquire into the state of the departments, and upon a report of facts, by a committee, it will then be able to determine what steps are proper to be taken. If crime is developed in any quarter, then it will be the proper time to bring offenders to trial, and they shall have all the benefits of the strict rules of common law, and criminal law, and the benefit of clergy likewise. Sir, there is something "rotten in Denmark," or we would not have this resolute and continued opposition to all investigation which is calculated to show mismanagement on the part of agents and officers of government. At the adjournment at the last session of congress there were pending motions and resolutions, calculated to effect objects similar to those contemplated by this resolution, and they were all smothered by the party to which the gentleman belongs, and, I believe, with his assistance. The gentleman dreads a select committee, while he is willing to go to trial upon the certificate of the president, and seems to have full confidence in the result if the matter be entrusted to the committee of ways and means. Yet, sir, he is alarmed at the idea of a select committee, and says it will be a "fault-finding, censorious committee." Have the gentleman and his friends any thing to dread in the appointment of this committee? Is the speaker subject to the suspicion of doing injustice to any of the party in the appointment of committees? Sir, is it not a matter of absolute certainty that a majority of this committee, if appointed, will be composed of the friends of these officers? Cannot those gentlemen meet their own friends without fear and trembling? Is there not virtue and talent in this house sufficient to guarantee protection to the innocent, as well as to ensure the detection and exposure of the guilty? Are gentlemen willing that it shall be understood, and go abroad to the country, that they cannot face such a committee, composed of gentlemen of the highest honor and purest principles, even though they are their own friends? And these, too, are the men in whose hands the government of the country is placed, and who claim to be above suspicion, beyond the power of this house, fortified upon all sides by the ramparts of the president's certificate.

There is one other position assumed by the gentleman from Rhode Island, which is quite original, and merits particular attention; it is this, sir, that the direction given at the last session to the bill commonly called the executive patronage bill is conclusive as to the views of this house upon the subject of executive patronage. And he seems to draw an inference that the house then gave its sanction to all that had been or would be done in the way of executive patronage, in all its departments. What are the facts in relation to that case? A gentleman from York (Mr. Mann) on the 25th of February, 1836, moved "that said bill be referred to the committee on the judiciary." My colleague (Mr. Bell), moved "it should be referred to a select committee," and, pending these motions, a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Dringdale) moved "that the executive patronage bill be committed to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union," which motion took precedence of the others and prevailed, and there the bill has slept ever since. The question of executive patronage was not taken up for consideration afterwards; and now the gentleman contends that the house having failed to act upon the subject, it was therefore against the bill, and in favor of executive patronage, to the fullest extent. Sir, during the last summer, in Tennessee, I endeavored to inculcate this doctrine so far as to hold a majority of this house accountable for its failing to act upon this as well as some other important questions, but this doctrine was controverted by you and your friends. How would it hold upon another great question—the question of amending the constitution of the United States so as to secure the election of president and vice president to the people at all events, and under all circumstances? For the last two sessions of congress this has been a leading question, and afforded a fair opportunity for the party to show their zeal in carrying out the measures of general Jackson. I, and the friends with whom I act, have ever been in favor of that measure. At the session before the last, soon after it was known that judge White was a candidate for the presidency, and while we were urging the house to take up the resolutions upon that subject, the present speaker (Mr. James K. Polk) made a speech, in which, after professing a willingness to go for the measure, objected to acting upon the subject then, alleging a want of time, and also some imperfection in the resolutions. I followed in a few remarks, in which I urged the importance of a speedy action on the subject, and reminded the speaker of his former course in relation to the matter, and, though he spoke against us, he voted with us to take up the resolutions. His friends, however, took their cue, and followed his precept instead of his example, and the resolutions were postponed. At the last session of congress the same subject came up, with no better fate than before. It was with great difficulty we could get a report from the committee at all. They all professed to be in favor of the amendment. Oh! yes; but they seemed to agree to differ as to the mode of effecting it; and, at last, when the report came in, it took the same direction with the executive patronage bill, or something like it. We could not bring the gentlemen to a vote on either. And is it to be understood, now the election is over, (I know that it would not have been admitted before), that all those who voted to give those important measures the go-by are to be set down as voting against them? If so, how do the party stand upon the great leading measures of gen. Jackson's administration? If we call upon gentlemen to walk in the footsteps of the president upon that oft repeated, but never heeded recommendation in regard to the election of president and vice president, are we to be told that the house has already decided that question against the president's recommendations, by refusing to vote on the question? Are we to be told, if we propose to limit executive patronage, that the house has already decided that question in the same manner, and has sanctioned the full extent to which executive measures have been recently carried? And, sir, what is that extent? It is sufficient, if not checked, and grows into a settled precedent, to rivet chains upon us and our children forever. Such a precedent will authorize a president to make the nomination of his successor a cabinet measure, issuing his proclamation calling a convention to confirm that nomination, and denounce, in advance, all who dare oppose the nominees before or after the convention acts, as "assailing public virtue, and opposing the right of the people to govern." For, sir, this has been done in the late nomination of the "government" candidates, as they are called in the English journals. Was that ticket so remarkable for its party and virtue that, to oppose it, was to assail the virtue of the people? Mr. Van Buren had promised to walk in the footsteps of general Jackson, and is, consequently bound in due time to nominate his colleague (colonel Johnson) for the presidency, order a convention to ratify his nomination, take the field, and secure his election by the use of all the ways and means in the power of the executive.—This, sir, is the extent to which executive patronage has already gone, and which the gentleman contends has beforehand been sanctioned by this house. This, sir, is what I deny. Whatever this house may be destined to do, it has not come to that yet.

Sir, I was not prepared for such doctrines, and I must say that I was not prepared for the opposition to the proposed investigation. I had hoped that gentlemen would have become ashamed of screening these officers, who, instead of running to gen. Jackson for certificates of moral character, should be the first to demand an investigation. But, sir, will the people of the United States be satisfied forever that they shall shrink from responsibility, hold up gen. Jackson's character as their shield, and thereby escape a scrutiny of their conduct? If they have acted honorably, we wish them to show it; if those suspicions, so common, so universal, are groundless, we wish the country to know it. Innocence never seeks for safety in flight, in concealment, but rather courts investigation, and defies scrutiny. How can gentlemen reconcile innocence with this trembling and shrinking—this shielding themselves under the numerical strength of their friends in this house? This was their course at the last session of congress. Remember, sir, what fatality attended every effort to obtain a committee of investigation then. Recollect the extraordinary and obstinate protection extended to that darling treasury-pet, R. M. Whitney. Let it also be remembered that the committee on Indian affairs unanimously recommended an inquiry into the abuses of that bureau, which would have developed the causes of the late and present Indian wars in the south. That committee reported a resolution authorizing any two of its members to prosecute the inquiry by taking testimony for the information of the house at this session. But, sir, this resolution reported by a committee, a majority of whom were in favor of Mr. Van Buren, was rejected in the House. The citizens of Georgia and Alabama petitioned and implored the house to investigate that subject, alleging the most unheard of frauds and abuses. Upon this application the vote stood: ayes 77, noes 77, a tie, and the speaker gave the casting vote against the investigation. Sir, men high in favor, and high in office were suspected. The agent of the government, John B. Hogan, gave the department official information of the greatest outrages practised upon the Indians which were ever perpetrated upon any people, savage or civilized. He was very soon removed, or rather promoted, from Indian agent to be collector at the port of Mobile. And yet, sir, we have no account of prosecutions, convictions and punishments which have followed his disclosures. Why, sir, those speculators, or rather Indian robbers, would find an old chief upon his patrimonial estate, where the chiefs and kings of his race had lived for centuries before him, with his slaves and his farm around him, smoking his pipe amidst his own forest trees, spurning any offer to purchase his home; and they would bribe some vagabond Indian to personate him in a trade to sell his land, forging his name, and the first intimation that he would have of the transaction would be his expulsion by force from his house! This was common, and not only so, but, under the pretext of reclaiming fugitive slaves, the wives and children (of mixed blood) of the Indians were seized and carried off in bondage. The famous Ocoola himself had his wife taken from him, and that, too, it has been said, by a government officer, and was chained by this same officer to a log. Sir, what else could be expected but that these scourged, plundered, starving savages would glut their vengeance by the indiscriminate slaughter of the innocent and helpless families of the frontier, whose blood has cried to us in vain? This has caused the Florida war, which has produced such a waste of treasure, the loss of so much national and individual honor, and of so many valuable lives! This has called the gallant volunteers from my own state, and from my own district, who have traversed a thousand miles to fight the battle of strangers—to contend with a savage foe, while drinking those stagnant waters, whose malaria is death, many of whom are left in the wild woods of Florida, where "the foe and the stranger will tread o'er their heads," while their fellow soldiers are far away, happy at home with their friends and families. One—ah! sir, any one of those noble youths who now sleep under a foreign sod, was worth more than the whole army of plunderers who have caused the mischief. And yet, sir, such men as these were shielded at the last session of congress by the casting vote of the speaker. And now, according to the argument of the gentleman from Rhode Island, the house has sanctioned all they did.

I think, sir, it is time for this course of things to cease. It is time for the people to know something of the conduct of those in whose hands the public business is entrusted, and who really administer the government. They have been behind gen. Jackson long enough. I was present when Mr. Van Buren took his position there. It was a striking display of that paternal care which the president has extended over Mr. Van Buren. In the spring of 1834, the president, Mr. Van Buren, and a few other gentlemen, I amongst the number, rode out to the Washington course to witness a trial of speed, (an amusement of which I am very fond, and for which the president had not altogether lost his taste at that day.) It was a trial run between the celebrated Busris and Emily. The horses were brought on the course, all was calm and quiet until the rider of Busris mounted, when the old courser began to rear and plunge; this seemed to stir the mettle of Old Hickory; he reared upon his stirrups and took command; "hold him," (said he to the boy), "don't let him run against the fence." "You must break him of that, sir," (to the trainer), "I could do it in an hour." Turning to me, he said, "take your stand there," (pointing to a position on the side of the course), "there is but one place from which a horse can be correctly timed." I took my station with lever in hand. "Now," said he, "come up, and give them a fair start." At this moment he discovered the vice president, who had come up and taken his position near me; he exclaimed with great emphasis and earnestness of manner, as he flashed his eye from the excited animals to the vice president, "Mr. Van Buren, get behind me, they will run over you, sir." It would have done you good to see how natural and easy it was for Van to slope off behind the old chief. And, sir, there he has been ever since. Old Hickory would not get out of the way for us to run over him: if he had given us a fair chance, on any stretch or turn during the whole race, we would have run over him or made him fly the track. But, sir, we have got him on the repeat; the general will be out of the way; he is no game horse, and we will make a case of him on the repeat. I do not complain so much that the president has fallen in love with Mr. Van Buren, but I claim the privilege of falling in love with whom I please; and this, sir, is the last privilege which will ever be surrendered by man, or woman either. But, sir, Mr. Van Buren is in love with the president, too; and he accidentally found it out. The manner of this discovery is somewhat curious. I do not know this to be true, but it was much talked of and universally believed in this city. Mr. Van Buren was in conversation with a lady, an intimate friend of the president, amiable, interesting and remarkable for communicating to him whatever she thought would be agreeable for him to hear. Mr. Van Buren said to this lady "that he had been reading much, and thinking deeply of late, upon the characters of great men, and had come to the conclusion that gen. Jackson was the greatest man that had ever lived in the tide of time; that he was the only man among them all who was without a fault." The fair friend of the president was delighted. "But," said he, "whatever you do, don't tell gen. Jackson what I have said. I would not have him to know it for the world." You see, sir, that he was afraid she might forget it, and therefore thought it safest to jog her memory. But sir, he might have saved himself that trouble, for the excellent lady flew to the president, and told him all that had passed. "Ah! madam," said he, with tears in his eyes, "that man loves me; he tries to conceal it, but there is always some way fixed by which I can tell my friends from my enemies." Now, sir, Van was like the Frenchman, (though I want it distinctly understood that I differ with him about this, as well as about many other things.) A Frenchman began to write his deed thus: "Know one woman by these presents." "Why," said the other party, "do you not put it know all men by these presents?" "Vell," said he, "is it not de same ting? If wone woman know it, will not all de mens find it out?"

In reply to general Ripley, of Louisiana, Mr. Peyton said: Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Louisiana has charged me with assailing the president's measures, and to that cause he ascribes the excited state of feeling under which he spoke while in Tennessee. My opposition to the measures of the president, I defy that gentleman to point to one of the great measures of general Jackson's administration which I had not supported, unless he claims the election of Mr. Van Buren as one of those measures. If so, I did oppose that measure, and will ever be found in opposition to such an executive measure. But, sir, has any man the boldness, the hardihood, whatever may have been his motives of action, to avow such a doctrine upon this floor? The gentleman speaks of Tennessee in connexion with "the ingratitude of republics," and expresses a "hope that the people of that state will yet learn to appreciate the character and services of gen. Jackson." This charge against Tennessee, of ingratitude to the president, is not original with the gentleman, (gen. Ripley). It has been adopted by him from the lowest source—it issued from the dark caverns of the Globe. What, sir! the people of Tennessee learn to appreciate the character and services of Andrew Jackson! Look at his history—when he first crossed the Alleghenies, a beardless stranger, with his knapsack upon his back, his rifle on his shoulder;

no power, no patronage then, sir, with nothing to recommend him to our pioneer fathers but a congenial spirit. How did they receive him? With open arms they took him to their bosoms. They conferred upon him all the honors, all the offices known to their laws and constitution. And, sir, their sons have stood by him in every crisis, in every peril of his subsequent life. Look back, sir, upon the highway of his fame, and you will find the bones of a Tennessean mouldering upon every field of his glory. And the gentleman hopes that Tennessee will learn to appreciate his character! It is true, sir, that in the late presidential election Tennessee early took her stand. She planted herself upon those principles for which she had battled by the side of gen. Jackson; and there she proudly stands yet, firm, fixed and immovable. She was not to be driven from the ballot-box. She could not, she dare not yield her principles, and surrender up her liberty, at the command of any man. But, sir, I wish to set the gentleman right upon another point. He contends that the house, in adopting this resolution, will do gen. Jackson injustice; that we who advocate it have already done him great injustice. Is it in this manner that every inquiry, every investigation is to be strangled in its infancy, under the pretext of inflicting injury upon gen. Jackson? Why, sir, we have to legislate upon this subject under the terrors of "expunge." Yes, sir, the gentleman has announced to the house that if this resolution is passed it will be expunged. The Lord save me from an expunging house as well as an expunging senate. I have witnessed, with loathing and disgust, the operation of that process in the senate. I have seen the great expurger (col. Benton), in the grim majesty of his expunging power, lashing, with the whip of scorpions, abler and honest men than himself to the work, flogging them on to make war upon the constitution of their country and the journals of the senate; and I have shuddered when I saw it. But I saw, sir, last winter, a disposition manifested by the party, I am sure I did by some of its leaders, to encourage him in his mad scheme of waisting the surplus revenue, that he might batter out his brains against the walls of his own fortification system, and thereby save them the trouble of knocking him on the head. Sir, he will never rise under the weight of that stone and mortar, from the mud and quicksands into which they have plunged him. Sir, I hope never to see this house scourged by so rude and barbarous a despotism. I hope that heaven has for us in store a better fate. "Expunge," sir! expunge what? We propose to look into the conduct of your "hirelings"—to examine the dark deeds of your Whitneys and your Kendalls, and have "expunge" flung in our faces. But are we, the representatives of the American people, to falter in our duty, and cover under the iron sceptre of some expunging hero who is to rise up amongst us? And, sir, if we but touch one little twig of this great Jackson tree, which overshadows the land, and stretches its branches throughout the continent, we are charged with an assault upon its trunk, and expunge is instantly proclaimed. No, sir, we wish to brush off these sap suckers, who have been drawing from that body its vitality. We have to approach them as boys kill woodcocks, by whipping round old Hickory, and I have always advised the mildest measures, the use of limber switches, so as not to hurt him. There was something in the gentleman's manner, and the tenor of his remarks, which seemed to appeal from me to the people of Tennessee, and to threaten me with their displeasure. Sir, the boldest representative upon this floor is far behind the spirit of that people in their unshaken purpose of asserting their rights and maintaining their freedom. A cruel war has been waged against Tennessee, but she has met the crisis as became her character: she has met the mercenary legions unawed: she may be crushed, but not conquered: she may fall, but if she does, it will be at the shrine of the constitution, in the grave of public liberty. And, sir, I will go down with her: I would not survive her fate. I am willing to go home and meet my people; I have nothing to fear from them: their kindness and partiality towards me have always been far beyond my merits. But, sir, the injustice done to general Jackson by supporting this measure: what is it? We demand an investigation into the agency of Reuben Whitney; we ask for an inquiry into the condition of the treasury. We require that there shall be a full investigation into all the departments, and into the conduct of the whole army of public officers, who have been engaged in this business of the succession—this trampling under foot of laws and constitutions. We wish to know from whence came this money. Where is the source of their corruption? Where is the mint from which they can send their hireling editors through the country, poisoning the fountains of intelligence amongst the people? How is it that our army in Florida has been neglected, and left to suffer for want of supplies, while it was within a few days' sail of New Orleans? Men starving, horses sinking under them in the swamps—all, all, sir, in consequence of gross and criminal neglect somewhere. Was it that our high functionaries were too busily engaged to think of the army—too full of Mr. Van Buren to cast a thought on Ocoala—too busily engaged in electioneering to think of the gallant men who were fighting the battles of their country? It is in behalf of men whose conduct has been such as this, that the message volunteers a laudatory certificate. Sir, I deny the authenticity of this message. General Jackson never gave that certificate. They have written it themselves, and obtained the signature of his name. And yet, with such a testimonial in their favor, they shrink from the proof—they shrink from inquiry. Let us have the proof, sir, and then we will see whether they are honest or venal, corrupt or immaculate. Sir, I do not say they are corrupt: that is just what I wish to find out. I want a strict and impartial investigation. It is lawful, it is usual, to make such inquiries. It is surely right to investigate our own affairs—to examine into the deeds of our own agents. This is our right, it is our duty, and cannot do "injustice" to any one. I protest against the issue which the gentleman from Louisiana has joined. It is not a question between general Jackson and this house: his person and conduct is one thing, and the persons and conduct of these officers is another. I hope that no attempt to crush this investigation on such an issue will succeed; and, sir, let us hope that no American congress will ever be found ready to expunge an order directing an investigation into the department. No, sir, this will never be the case, so long as a shadow of our liberties remains.

SPEECH OF MR. RIPLEY, OF LOUISIANA, IN REPLY TO MR. PEYTON, OF TENNESSEE.

MR. SPEAKER: Had this been a proposition to inquire in the condition of the department of state, of the treasury, of the navy and war departments, and the general post office, with a view to investigate abuses, if they exist, no person would be more willing to join in the inquiry than myself. No individual would be more anxious to enforce the responsibility of subordinate officers. There are none who will go farther to ferret out any malpractices: and, if they really exist, to punish them with the high constitutional power of this house. Had the resolution for inquiry had these objects solely and honestly in view, I should have been the last to oppose it. But, sir, the president is constitutionally responsible for the whole of the executive department; the various radii of its powers concentrate, as well its responsibilities as its honors, upon him; and when I take these circumstances into view, and consider also the spirit in which this debate has been conducted, the position of the president cannot be observed without exciting our share of sympathy. Shall we, at a moment when his connection with the people of the United States is about to terminate forever, and all the aspirations of ambition are to be dissolved by age, infirmities and sickness; when the consciousness of his high and devoted services, which we all know he must possess, and the enthusiastic affection of the American people were about to cheer the evening of his life, and to guild his expiring lamp, is it right or proper for the representatives of the people whom he has succored and saved, to cut off this departing solace, and to embitter his last days, by adopting a resolution, which, if adopted, will sanction an opinion of this house, that corruption and Andrew Jackson have been coupled together? Will they do this without some specific charge—without some definite allegation, sustained at least by the endorsement of one individual in the house who will be willing to give his name to posterity as the author of the allegation? In the speech of the honorable member from Tennessee, marked with so much wit and pungency of satire, the allegations are made against Andrew Jackson as the object who is to be convicted of the corruption which is so broadly insinuated in the resolution to exist in the executive department. I am not willing to exercise the high constitutional powers of this house in the least degree in sanctioning such an allegation.

General Jackson, after a life spent in the service of his country, is about retiring from the elevated position he holds as presiding executive officer of these states, at an advanced age, and worn down by the labors spent in that service. He is now, sir, on the bed of sickness, which may prove his bed of death. God grant that it may not; but that he may live many, many years amongst that people whose rights he has so bravely and honestly defended, and whose prosperity, under the successful administration, has excited the astonishment of the whole civilized world.

What, sir, is the relation that Andrew Jackson bears to the representatives of the people of the United States? From the period of your revolutionary war to the present moment, he has been the lofty, indefatigable defender of his country. In war and in peace, on the battle field and in your councils, his exertions, his toils, and unceasing energy and integrity, have done as much as any other man, not excepting your Washington in the field, and your Jefferson and Madison in the cabinet, to elevate the character of this republic, to advance its prosperity and to preserve its peace. His name has been a tower of strength, and under his administration the character of an American citizen, as was that formerly of a Roman citizen, a passport throughout the world. Ay, sir, in foreign lands, wherever your star spangled banner displays from the high and giddy mast, the character of our republic, under the ægis of the lofty virtues of the president, has that wall of strength that feels ever conscious of the protection of a great and powerful nation. And would you, sir, would this house, after a life thus spent, and which impartial history is about to take charge of for the benefit of his country; would they at the eve of his long life, so worthily spent in all that is patriotic and virtuous in the public service; would they pursue him with insinuations that corruption, with its blighting mildew, has found entrance into the bosom of Jackson's more than Roman virtue? If this house institutes the inquiry, it sanctions the charge, and will they, without any specific allegations, just at the close of general Jackson's career, hold the fatal chalice to his lips, which should poison and embitter with the stings of ingratitude the evening of his life? We have had no precedent to justify such a measure.—Party spirit has raged and misrepresented all your presidents during their term of office, but they have passed and are passing off the stage, all with the award of official and personal integrity. Some have not been re-elected by the people, but against them no charge of corruption is found embodied in the annals of the country. Nor does any American citizen, at even this lapse of time, impeach their integrity: no one charges him with wilful or wanton corruption, while administering the affairs of the commonwealth. The only allegations made against them, as they quit the scene of their labors, of their glories and their services, were that a distinguished member, formerly from Virginia, accused Mr. Jefferson of retiring with a political falsehood in his mouth; and an equally distinguished member from Massachusetts moved his solitary vote to impeach Mr. Madison. I have no doubt, sir, after the excitement of party was over, both of these gentlemen regretted these allegations. The charges never have, and never will affect the great patriarch of liberty, the author of the Declaration of Independence, or his equally illustrious friend, the founder and champion of our constitution.—The one unfurled to the world the principles of popular government; the other, more than any man, connected liberty with law—secured an equality of political rights, by securing to society the fruits of labor. Wherever oppressed man rises to resist the oppressor, the declaration drawn up by Thomas Jefferson is invoked. Wherever constitutional law is appealed to, to secure those rights, the political writings of James Madison form the pure fountains of living water, which diffuse liberty and tranquility amongst the nations. Together, locked hand in hand, they are working their silent way, and they have planted that school of political liberty, of which this republic may arrogate to itself, through their exertions, they being the founder.

Republics have been accused of being ungrateful. Aristides was ostracised for being called the just, and Themistocles banished after saving his country from desolation. The authors of these acts have not transmitted their names to posterity. How keen would be the reproaches of the history of the last two thousand years, how withering their infamy, if they had not escaped by this silence of history. General Jackson has been doomed to meet the same ingratitude, after preventing the dismemberment of our republic, after rescuing the fair and fertile fields of the state which I have the honor to represent. There, sir, helpless age and tender youth, and all the charms of refinement and beauty, were protected by his hand. There, sir, was effected one of those signal deliverances of a people which has already caused the plains of New Orleans to rank with Marathon and Plataea, reflecting all its bright liberty upon the army of liberty that fought under him, and sending all its glowing light throughout the world to elevate the character of this republic. Sir, almost at the moment this was effecting, and while painting, history, poetry, music and sculpture were giving greenness to his immortality, the senate of the United States were denouncing him in the Seminole war. Sickening with the same feelings that were pained at hearing Aristides called the just, the detractors of Andrew Jackson loathed the beau ideal of his character. Again, during the panic, that same body have impeached and condemned him without a trial, for an alleged violation of the constitution of the United States. How, sir, have the people met these charges? They have almost by acclamation elected him president on each occasion. They have rallied to defend him. Where, sir, is his accusers? I ask again, where are they? And, sir, permit me to predict that if the present resolution passes, it will only reflect disgrace upon the present house of representatives. The people will come to the rescue, and expunge the resolution from this house, as I trust there are about expunging a former one from the senate. The whole future history of the country will hold up in proud relief their old chief sans peur and sans reproche, and the ingratitude of this house in pursuing him with the arduous charge of corruption, even upon the bed of sickness and of death, when I do not believe there can be a member here who conscientiously believes that Andrew Jackson ever was, in thought, word or deed, unfaithful or inimical to the interests of this country.

I regret that the honorable member from Tennessee should have been so excited by a warm election contest, as to urge, upon such trivial grounds as he has alleged, so grave an inquiry into the corrupt conduct of the executive departments. The state of Tennessee has been reared under the fostering and paternal care of Andrew Jackson. He has done more than any other man to elevate and form its character. Intelligent, chivalric, patriotic and virtuous, they will be the last portion of the people of the United States to sanction allegations, either personal or as the constitutional head of the government, against their veteran chief. Those brave men who followed his banner through the Creek nation and on the plains of New Orleans, with the citizen soldiers of Kentucky, Mississippi and Louisiana, are not to prove so recreant to Andrew Jackson, and so unfaithful to themselves, as to embitter the remnant of his days with so unjust an accusation. And what are all the allegations that the honorable member adduces to justify the exercise of the high constitutional power of this house? That the president, in a conversation with a friend, had remarked that Mr. Bell, another member from Tennessee, had stated lies about him, and that, "Peyton could tell twenty lies to Bell's one." Now, sir, what were the facts in the case? The honorable members from Tennessee at the last session had indulged in pretty severe censures upon the president's administration. In conversation with his neighbors, according to this statement, in naturally vindicating himself, he had pretty warmly recriminated. I think the language that he made use of, as is usual on such occasions, must have undergone, in the course of its gossip, some version before it reached the ears of the honorable member; for it is not the language of that delicate and manly bearing which all know mark the character of Andrew Jackson. At any rate, is a mere controversy in an election, where the president and the honorable members from Tennessee, in the exercise of their constitutional rights, supported different candidates, to be the basis of an inquisitorial examination on the part of this house into the conduct of the executive department.

Again, the honorable member alleges that this house refused to institute an inquiry into frauds that were perpetrated upon the Indians of Alabama by the citizens of that state in the sales of their lands to individuals. When that resolution was introduced into the house, I had the honor of proposing an amendment to it, referring the subject to the president of the United States. The motive for this amendment was, that this house had no constitutional power to order the investigation by their authority; and, if it had been done, it would have been one of the most fatal precedents to the rights of the states. It was alleged that the Indians had been swindled out of their reserved lands, in many cases, by residents of Georgia and Alabama. Of course, if offences had been committed, as I know of no law of the United States providing for such cases, they were common law or statute law offences against those states, not cognizable by the United States tribunal. In a case where the state of Alabama secures a speedy trial by jury, and the cross examination of witnesses, would any person arrogate to this house the power to send its committee to make an ex parte investigation, to hold up its citizens as malefactors without being heard, without the privilege of counsel, and the cross examining of witnesses? Suppose, sir, that, in obtaining the charter of a bank in a neighboring state, respectable citizens should be accused of fraud and bribery, an offence that is punishable by the common law of that state, does this house, sir, possess the power to trample upon state rights, and send its committee of inquisition into the halls of the state legislature, to hunt up ex parte testimony as its basis, and to hunt down all that is respectable and venerable in the character of its citizens to condemn them unheard without grand jurors or petit jurors, and draw up a withering report that would blast them as far as our language extended before they had an opportunity of defending themselves?—If this power had been exercised by the original resolutions of last session, like the Council of Ten at Venice, or the Holy Inquisition of Spain, it would have sung the requiem of public liberty, and broken down the whole penal jurisdiction of the independent states. And I feel peculiar personal consolation in being the means of arresting the progress of a measure so fraught with disastrous consequences. The subject was referred to the president, who was directed to investigate into the cases of fraud. From the character of the agent employed by the president (General Hogan,) I feel confident, from my knowledge of the man, that the duty has been faithfully attended to; and if, as the honorable member suggests, he has received the collectorship of Mobile, it cannot have been conferred upon a more deserving or more intelligent citizen, or one who has more gallantly defended his country during the gloomiest period of the late war.*

The honorable member has also referred to the secretary of the treasury as being embraced in the general allegation of corruption. Sir, the lofty character of Levi Woodbury is too well known to this house and to this nation, to require any comment from me. Born, reared, and educated amidst the granite mountains of my native state, his stern and sterling virtues had already carried him to the highest honors of New Hampshire, when in the midst of the panic battle, he was called to the arduous duties of the treasury of the United States. New England may justly feel proud of the high character which he has reflected back upon his native land. And let me ask, what inducement to corruption can there be on the part of Levi Woodbury? There has been no specific charge against him; not a whisper of prejudice that he has done any thing to forfeit his exalted character. He is affluent in his personal situation, with every thing to make him happy in domestic life; and, above all, principles of the most stern and unbending integrity are interwoven with his nature. The only allegation insinuated against him is, that, in the exercise of his duty imposed by a law passed by this house, he is compelled to transact official business with the agent of the deposit banks. That agent is no officer of this government; we have no constitutional power over him. He has been assailed by the severest epithets of party. He has been employed by the deposit banks, many of them in opposition to the administration, to attend to their business with the treasury. For my own part, I do not learn any specific charges with which he is accused. And I have no doubt that the president, when he gave him the character which the honorable member states that he did at Jonesborough, came to the honest and conscientious conviction that such a torrent of anathemas from the opposition in this house, assailing the character of this man for more than four years, would have annihilated him had not his reputation been founded upon the rock of integrity. High sounding epithets and bold denunciations cannot, thank God, blast the character of any American citizen, unless they are accompanied with specific allegations and specific proofs. On the contrary, they raise in the generous minds of the American people that spirit of sympathy for unmerited persecution which is sure to protect its intended victim, and roll back the current upon the author.

I feel, sir, that I should have but unworthily discharged my duty as a representative of Louisiana, had I not raised my voice in opposition to this resolution. Whatever may be the personal or political predilections of my constituents, gratitude to Andrew Jackson for the inestimable benefits he has conferred upon the citizens of our state is an almost pervading sentiment. It is, like the vestal flame, guarded with intense care, and faithfully transmitted from one generation to another. As the 8th of January revolves its annual rounds, so often does the hoary veteran who shared in the memorable campaign repair to the grass-worn hillock which marks the battle field, and recite the eventful story to his children. Often are time and space annihilated, and the years of his pilgrimage recalled to the desperate conflict; and in those rural fetes, which none knows better how to grace with refinement and beauty than the gallant Frank of our sunny clime, the revered name of Andrew Jackson is never forgotten, and the choicest of heaven's blessings are invoked upon the patriot's head.

FOREIGN CHRONICLE.

The "Napoleon child." On the iris of the eyes of a child, who was lately exhibited in Oxford street, London, the following inscriptions are seen.

Left eye.	Right eye.
EMPEREUR.	NAPOLEON.

The eyes of the child are of pale blue, and the color of the letters is almost white, and appear like rays. This effect is accounted for by the child's mother having gazed intently upon a five franc piece of Napoleon's, given to her by her brother previous to his departure on a long absence, when she was in a particular situation.

Coals. The following is said to be the annual amount of coals raised in England and Wales, under the different heads of consumption:

By the population,	20,804,570 tons.
Iron furnaces,	3,000,000
Manufactories,	4,550,000
Steamboats,	3,000,000
Exported,	615,925
Total,	31,970,495

Mr. O'Connell has announced his plan for a reform in the house of lords. It is that the king shall create a large batch of peers, for the purpose of carrying the bill—an increase to 800 he thinks will be enough—and then the people to select 150 from this number, as the permanent peerage. How the selection is to be made, we are not informed.

Slavery in America. Mr. George Thompson, the abolitionist, has been lecturing in Manchester. We perceive from the report of one of these lectures in the Manchester Guardian, that the abolition cause is making rapid progress in America. We extract the following—There are 700 societies, 64 lecturers on emancipation and the national society are in treaty for 16 more. Instead of there being here and there a minister on the side of abolition, afraid to show himself, fearing that his church might eject him, there were now 2,000 ministers of every denomination, in its favor. There are 150 newspapers which, if not exclusively devoted to the cause, now entertain sound views on the subject. At one meeting of the anti-slavery society at Charleston, South Carolina. 15,000 dollars were collected.

This scoundrel, Thompson, is not content, it appears to interfere with the relations which exist between the states, but he must propagate infamous falsehoods. Fifteen thousand dollars raised by an anti-slavery society in Charleston! We know not which most to admire—the folly or the infamy of such an assertion.

M. Malibran, ex-husband of the celebrated singer, died recently in Paris. At the time of his marriage to Miss Garcia, he was engaged in mercantile pursuits in New York, but shortly after failed. He was old enough to be Miss G's father. Madame Malibran has left a fortune of $110,000 to her son by De Beriot.

By a late arrival from Algiers, intelligence has been received of the final dissolution of Abdel Kabber's little army, and his own retreat from before Oran. A valuable commerce was already springing up between the ports of the now French colony of Algiers, and those of Morocco, the exports from the former being principally French manufactures and products!

The price of bread was raising in London. The price of the quarter, (four pound) loaf, best quality, is now 10½ pence sterling. Inferior quality, 8½d. The rise in three weeks has been 2d per loaf.

Parliament was expected, (according to rumor), to meet a month earlier than usual.

The provincial papers contain numerous notices of incendiary fires. Numbers of hay ricks had been destroyed in the neighborhood of Windsor, and barns, &c. in many other places.

Frazer, of the Magazine, has brought an action against Mr. Berkeley, for the brutal assault committed on him by the latter, and laid his damages at $30,000.

A large subscription has been made by the literati of St. Petersburg, in aid of the fund for renovating the tomb of Shakspeare at Stratford.

Dexterity of the camel. A thick cherry stick, with a cross at the end of it, serves to guide the animal; a gentle tap on the right side of his head sends him to the left, and on the opposite makes him turn back again to the right; a knock on the back of his neck stops him, and, a few blows between his ears, brings him on his knees, if accompanied by a guttural sound, resembling, as the Arabs say, the pronunciation of their "Khe;" to make him move quicker, it is necessary to prick him with the point of a stick on the shoulders. They fall so naturally into military figures that it is difficult to conceive that they do it with direction. [Maj. Skinner.

French commerce. The director of the customs has just published a statement of the trade of France with her colonies and other foreign countries, of which the following are the results:—In 1834, the gross amount in value of the imports was 729,104,336 francs; in 1835, the sum was 760,726,696f. The merchandise brought into consumption in 1834 was estimated at 503,983,048 francs, and paid for duties 101,395,997 francs; in 1835, the articles consumed amounted to 520,270,533 francs, and the duties to 102,512,926 francs. The exports, in 1834, of merchandise of every kind, were 714,705,038f. of which the portion of French goods was 509,992,277f. In 1835, the general exports amounted to 834,422,218f. among which French merchandise was estimated at 577,613,863f. During 1834, the number of ships which entered the ports of France was 10,089, and the departures 9,304. In 1835, the arrivals were 10,361, and the departures 9,486. The transit duties, in 1834, amounted to 123,750,328 francs, and in 1835, to 158,467,406f. The premiums on exports amounted, in 1834, to 9,272,221 francs and in 1835, to 9,403,486 francs.

George Coleman, the younger, who for many years enjoyed the emoluments of the office of "licenser" of plays, is dead. His dramatic works have been very successful, and it is stated that the play of the "Mountaineers" produced him upwards of £12,000 sterling. Charles Kemble, whose daughter "Fanny" made such a sensation in certain circles in this country a short time ago, has been appointed to the vacant office, the salary of which is $2,500 per annum.

The oppressed Poles. The Russian government has published a list of one hundred and forty-two noblemen, of the government of Wilna, whose property is confiscated, for having taken part in the revolution of Poland.

Rice has made the song of "Jim Crow" so popular that it is sung at the corner of almost every street in London. America is certainly fulfilling the prophecy that she would teach lessons to Europe, when we see the dramatic hemisphere in England monopolized, as it is at present, by two of our native stars—one the conceded luminary of high tragedy, the other the ne plus ultra of the Buffo school. DOMESTIC CHRONICLE.

A revolution in naval warfare. A correspondent of the National Intelligencer alludes in the following positive manner, to an extraordinary invention of which we had already heard some vague rumors:—"It is very probable that it will not be long before the whole system of naval warfare will be changed. The ingenious R. L. Stevens, of Hoboken, has invented a shot which is hollow, and is filled with some kind of fulminating powder, which is ignited by the compression of air when it strikes the sides of a vessel, and, on its explosion, as has been proved by experiment, will tear all to atoms! This system, when perfected, will supersede the use of first rate men of war; for two shots from a sloop of war would as easily destroy a 100 gun ship as a gun boat. Sloops of war would, therefore, be the class of vessels most required; and our waters are sufficiently deep for this purpose."

Extraordinary experiment. Professor Locke of the medical college of Ohio has invented a thermo-electric instrument of such delicacy and power that by the electricity generated by the warmth from a touch of the finger, a magnetic needle eleven inches long and weighing one and a half ounces, suspended like a compass needle, is not only deflected but made to rotate rapidly and repeatedly round.—This is the more surprising as the electric conductor does not touch the needle but passes one-fourth of an inch from it. Perhaps so much motion has never before been produced by so little heat. A description of the instrument may be expected in Silliman's Journal. [Cincinnati Republican.

Kentucky exports. A friend residing near the Cumberland road has sent to the editor of the Frankfort (Ky.) "Commonwealth" the following statement of the number of horses, hogs, mules, beef cattle and sheep, that have passed through the turnpike gate during the years 1835 and 1836.

In 1836.	In 1835.
Horses, 5,525	Horses, 4,716
Mules, 2,200	Mules, 1,951
Hogs, 68,000	Hogs, 60,187
Beef cattle, 2,265	Beef cattle, 2,487
Sheep, 1,725	Sheep, 1,200

Gen. Gaines arrived in Baltimore on Monday last from Norfolk, on his way to Frederick, Md. to appear before the military court, now in session there.

We find in the Richmond Whig the following notice of the gallant old general's advent into that city, and also of his public appearance in the hall of the house of delegates.

"Major General Gaines, of the United States army, visited the house of delegates yesterday, and by invitation of the speaker, took a seat on the front bench of the house. The general was in full uniform, and wore the sword voted to him by the general assembly on the 12th of February, 1818.

The small pox has prevailed to some extent in Richmond, Va. for several months past, but is now on the decrease.

Indiana. A convention of the citizens of Indiana, south of White river, was held at Jasper on the 14th ultimo, with the view of memorializing the Indiana legislature in relation to appropriations for the benefit of that section of the state. A committee from Illinois, composed of Geo. Flower, T. Hinde, and Mr. Steroan, made a report explaining the nature of the charter of the Mt. Carmel and Alton rail road, and urging the co-operation of Indiana in extending that road to Ohio river. The convention appointed committees to petition the legislature for a charter for a rail road from Mt. Carmel to the Charleston and Ohio rail road. There can be no doubt, that such a charter will be readily granted.—The only difficulty will be in obtaining the necessary funds. Indiana will doubtless act, in reference to this subject, with her usual wisdom and liberality.

Ohio legislature. Considerable excitement prevailed among the members of this body at our last dates, in consequence of a charge, brought by Mr. CUSHING, a member of the lower house, from Clark county, against S. S.—Mr. CUSHING charges Mr. S. with having attempted to bribe him by offering him $1,000 for his influence in obtaining the passage of a law making an appropriation to connect the waters of Lake Erie and Muskingum river through the valleys of the Killbuck and Black rivers. Mr. S. admits that he proffered the money, but intended it as a present "for extra services in collecting facts and arguments, and advancing the main object by diffusing the requisite information." Mr. CUSHING laid the subject before the house, who arraigned Mr. S. for a "breach of privilege," but no decision had been reached at our last advices.

The Cumberland (Md.) Advocate states that the new bridge over Wills' creek, on the national road, has been completed. The Advocate says the national road between Cumberland and Wheeling is now one of the finest roads in the world, and is travelled over in each direction, daily, by four full lines of stage coaches crowded with passengers.

Erie canal. It has been resolved to enlarge this canal which is now too small for the vast amount of transportation proceeding to and from the west.—The New York "Star" thinks it will be a failure if brought to Albany and says—We hope local interests will not interfere to prevent the good results which may be expected from that great work. While the overslaugh exists, and the numerous sand bars and islands in that neighborhood, trade must be forever checked and injured by delays. It is well ascertained, that by leading off the Erie canal, from between Fort Hunter Creek and Schenectady, to intersect the navigable waters of the Hudson river below the above named sand bars and islands, a canal of the dimensions now contemplated will cost less money and be of more value to the state than enlarging the present Erie canal from the above point to Albany, besides saving about 15 miles in the distance. This will always give a good navigation from one end to the other. We hope the western people will look at this subject; they are very much interested in it both at the west and south. In this city we are constantly worried and injured by the impediments and delay at the overslaugh.

State of Georgia. Late on Saturday night, the 24th ult. the legislature of this state adjourned sine die, after a session of 48 days.

A commencement has been made by the legislature on the vital subject of internal improvement. By this act, the rail road to be constructed is defined, (to connect the Tennessee river with the interior of Georgia), and annual appropriations made for its completion. For this year three hundred and fifty thousand dollars are appropriated; sixty thousand of which are specifically designated for the necessary surveys.

The legislature of Connecticut has closed its extra session. It was called for the purpose of making provision for receiving and disposing of the proportion of the surplus revenue falling to that state.—The bill passed upon the subject appropriates the money to the towns, one-half the proceeds to be applied to the support of common schools—the remainder to the disposition of the town authorities.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 20.—Vol. I.]

BALTIMORE, JANUARY 14, 1837.

[Vol. LI.—Whole No. 1,320.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

Our abstract of the proceedings of congress, though occupying more than the usual space, will be found exceedingly interesting. In the senate Mr. Ewing's resolution rescinding the treasury order, has been referred to the committee on public lands, after an animated discussion; and in the house of representatives the whole tariff question has been thrown open by the introduction of a bill from the committee of ways and means, through its chairman Mr. Cambreleng, to reduce the revenue to the wants of the government; or to reduce the tariff ten per cent. in six months on all imported articles, and one-half of the excess over twenty per cent. at the end of the six following months; and the other half on the 30th of September 1838—being a reduction in eighteen months, which, under the compromise act, would have been made in five years and a half.

We have not time to notice this monstrous proposition in an appropriate manner. If, however, it is seriously intended by the chairman of the committee of ways and means to press it upon congress, it is time that the country should be aroused to the danger which threatens it. For we verily believe, if this bill becomes a law, and it may through that vile party machinery which effects such metamorphoses in the principles of politicians, it will utterly prostrate every manufacturing interest in the country, and cause ruin and desolation in all quarters of the land. The remarks of Mr. Lawrence are not the ravings of a distempered imagination, but the sober convictions of an enlightened judgment; and the friends of the protective system should heed them, or the evil days may come when they expect them not.

DREADFUL DISASTER. In a subsequent page we have published an account of the wreck of the barque Mexico, briefly mentioned in the last "REGISTER." It is, indeed, a heart-rending event well calculated to excite our sympathy for the hapless beings who met such a horrible death, and the few and bereaved survivors who passed through the most agonizing sufferings. In behalf of these latter the humane are actively exerting themselves, and all that can be done to mitigate their sufferings will soon be accomplished. The dead, too, have received every testimonial of respect, and we learn that such bodies as were not claimed by their relatives were interred in a lot adjoining the burial ground of the Methodist church at Near Rockaway, which had been purchased by the inhabitants of Hempstead for that purpose. In this honorable procedure the ladies of Hempstead took a most becoming part—for they not only provided the materials, but many of them assisted in shrouding the bodies in the habiliments of the grave.

There is, however, another duty enjoined upon the people of New York, which requires instant action. A thorough and searching investigation of the causes of this and other similar calamities almost in the harbor of that city; and, if it can be proven that the pilots have been remiss in their duty, hanging about taverns and eating houses of that city instead of watching on the coast, the whole batch should be dismissed and new ones appointed, neither too rich nor too lazy to follow their vocation, except in gentle gales upon a summer sea; or failing to do this, destroy the monopoly, and leave the profession open to all who have skill and experience. Such a measure is not only called for by the strongest appeals of humanity, but it is due to the interests of the city; for if human beings are to be sacrificed by hundreds in that harbor, as in the case of the wreck of the Bristol and the Mexico, without the appliance of some strong corrective, it must follow that the harbor of New York will be more dreaded than the ocean, and passengers and merchandise seek another haven.

And yet another! The British ship Tamarac from Liverpool, having on board 4 cabin, and 113 steerage passengers, and crew of 26 men, arrived off Sandy Hook, on Saturday afternoon last, and laid off and on, waiting for a pilot until Wednesday morning, when she struck the bottom about three miles east of Fire Island light house. She now made every signal of distress by firing guns, &c. until daylight, when she got out her boats, and sent one with a line ashore. This boat swamped near the beach. The launch was nearly filled with passengers, who, with the assistance of the people on shore, succeeded in getting safe to land. Till 5 o'clock in the afternoon the time was passed in landing the remaining passengers and crew, and we are happy to add, all got safe on shore, except an infant, who perished from exposure to the cold. The passengers saved nothing but the clothes they had on. The ship and cargo, it is supposed, will be totally lost.

FROM FLORIDA. General Jesup, after his unsuccessful pursuit of the Indians, returned to Tampa, where he was at the last accounts uncertain what to do. It is said, however, that he is constructing a depot at Dade's battle ground, and will return thither, whence he will make excursions to the south; in which direction all the trails from the Wahoo Swamp wended.

The Tennesseans were discharged at Tampa. Three hundred arrived at Mobile on the 5th inst. the residue, one hundred and six, took passage from Tampa for New Orleans. The Mobile Advertiser on noticing the squalid appearance of the brave troops which arrived there, says—The reflection that these troops, so gallant, high spirited and fine looking when they were mustered into the United States' service, in the Creek nation last summer, should go to Florida, and there suffer as they have done, and then return, looking as they now do, is indeed humiliating. We understand that but about two-thirds of the brigade will ever return to Tennessee! And that, of the five hundred fine horses they had when they arrived in the Creek nation, seventy-five only are left.

A detachment of troops consisting of 220 men, under the command of lieutenant-col. Arrington, left Mobile on the 6th instant, in three transports, for Tampa Bay.

The Frederickburgh Arena states that lieutenant-col. Karney, major Fauntleroy, captains Bean and Gordon, and lieutenant Hamilton, of the 2d dragoons, passed through that town last week, on their way to Florida, to join the detachment of that regiment ordered to the seat of war.

The U. S. artillery and dragoons at Fortress Monroe, have embarked for Charleston.

A letter from an officer of the army, dated Gary's Ferry, Dec. 28, says—

"Brevet major Childs leaves here in a few days for Fort Drane, with 120 infantry recruits, and the friendly Indians, who have resuscitated here. The dragoons and captain Mellon's company are daily expected here from Old Point.

"An expedition under the command of colonel Sanchez, consisting of a portion of captains Hanson's, Curry's and Freemuth's mounted companies, and a number of volunteers, have marched for the south. They will proceed to Tomoka, and probably to Mosquito. They will be absent several days.

"This is the first movement that has been made towards that quarter since April last. No white man has been at that place since the South Carolina militia left it."

THE INDIANS. It is stated in the Columbus (Geo.) Herald of the 3d inst. that the Creeks have again committed depredations and murders. It appears that a party of five, whether stragglers from Florida or of those in Alabama waiting to be emigrated is not known, besieged the plantation of Dr. Battle of Cowaga creek, and after killing one white man and two negroes, burned the dwelling and out houses. It is also stated that there is but one little company left at Fort Mitchell—a force entirely inadequate to check or chastise the aggressors.

BURNING OF THE TREASURY. We learn from the "Intelligencer" of yesterday that in the case of Richard H. White, who has for several days past been undergoing his second trial in the circuit court, now in session in Washington, on an indictment for burning the treasury building, in March, 1833, the jury went out on Thursday at about one o'clock and had not returned a verdict when that paper went to press.

Some additional testimony was produced on the second trial of great interest; and we will, as soon published, present our readers with a report from the Intelligencer, the reporter of which has taken minutes.

Harry White (brother of R. H. W.) is now undergoing a trial on an indictment for the same crime.

FORT GIBSON. The first of the following paragraphs from the Arkansas Gazette of the 20th ult. will be hailed with pleasure by every friend of the army in the country. Fort Gibson is, beyond question, the most unhealthy post within our borders, and has been kept up at a sacrifice of human life greatly exceeding the advantages which have resulted from its location. How the government has so long resisted the representations of the army, is to us a matter of surprise; for we believe that all officers who have visited it, or known its effects upon the constitution, have but one opinion of the deleterious effects of the climate, and view it as the "grave yard of the army."

"Colonel Carney, majors Boon and Smith, of the United States army, have been for some days at Fort Gibson, and in the west; their business is the selection of the new site, nearer to our boundary, for the station of the government troops.

"John Ross, the celebrated Indian chief, has been for several weeks past, among the western Cherokees, for the purpose it is said, of getting up a delegation from them to join the delegation from Georgia, to proceed to Washington city, for the purpose of inducing the government to renounce Schermerhorn's treaty, to which, it is averred, they never gave their consent.

"Tuck-e-batch-i-had-jo, with his body of Creeks, two or three thousand strong, has stopped above Pott's it is said, and will go no farther, until it suits him. He says he is west of the Mississippi, and there is no power to compel him to proceed."

SANTA ANA. We are authorized to state that a letter was received yesterday by Mr. PINCKNEY, of South Carolina, dated the 2d instant, at Lexington, (Kentucky), from BARNARD E. BEE, esq. one of the Texian escort of SANTA ANA, in which the writer informs him of the arrival of the general at that place, on his way to the seat of government of the United States. He is represented as having suffered from serious indisposition on his journey.—His lungs are said to have been affected "by the transition from a warm cabin to the coldness of travelling on horseback, which he was obliged to do in crossing the country." On his arrival at Lexington medical aid was immediately procured. His physician, (Dr. DUDLEY), at the date of the letter, considered him convalescent, and it was expected he would be able to resume his journey on the 5th. The party, accompanying the general were anxious to reach Washington with all possible rapidity in the confident expectation that "great good will result from the move he has made." What that "move" is, the letter does not state. No explanation is given of the specific object for which he has undertaken this visit to our government. General Bravo's proclamation had caused no mischief in Texas. Doubtless, preparations are making by Mexico for another struggle, but the Mexicans cannot stand a winter campaign, and the writer has no doubt that before the spring all will be well. SANTA ANA travels in an accommodation stage, as he would be unable to sustain the severity of travelling at night. He is said to be courteous, intelligent, and dignified. Considerable inconvenience has arisen from the necessity of conversing with him by means of an interpreter. But it was remedied, as far as possible, by ALMONTE, who is said to manage the intercourse between the general and his escort tolerably well. [Nat. Int.]

At the latest accounts Santa Ana was travelling in a private conveyance from Lexington to Washington city.

GEORGIA. The legislature of this state has decided, after much discussion, to place the surplus revenue, as it may be paid to the state, in the Central bank, to be loaned out as other funds of that institution.

DELAWARE SENATOR. The hon. Thos. Clayton, chief justice of the superior court of Delaware, has been elected to the senate of the United States, in place of the hon. John M. Clayton, resigned.

It is said that the hon. John M. Clayton, will be appointed chief justice of the superior court.

ILLINOIS SENATOR. R. M. Young, esq. has been elected a senator of the United States from the state of Illinois, for six years from the 3d March next, in the place of Mr. Ewing, whose term of service will then expire.

TRANSFER DRAFTS. In the present sheet we have published the report of the secretary of the treasury to the senate of the United States, transmitting statements of the transfers of the public moneys, in obedience to a resolution of that body passed on the 20th ult. The tabular statements are too voluminous for publication; the general result, however, of the operations of the treasury department are exhibited in the annexed statement, copied from the New York Journal of Commerce.

Statement showing the amounts of public money on deposit in the banks of each state on the 20th of June and the 19th of December, 1836; as well as the proportion these amounts bore at each period to the sum to be deposited with such state under the 13th section of the deposit law, including Michigan, and taking the sum to be deposited with the states at $37,000,000.

DOMESTIC EXCHANGE IN NEW YORK. "The committee of the board of trade, appointed for the purpose of ascertaining facts in regard to the current rates of domestic exchange, as charged by the several banks of this city, beg leave to report, that the following rates were recently charged by the following banks, of which four are deposit banks.

	Merchants.	Mechanics.	America.	Manhattan.	Phoenix.	State.
On Richmond, 1 pr ct. 1	1	1	1	1	2	3
Petersburg 1	1	1	1	1	2	4
St. Louis 0	3	3	4	5	0	7

Natchez 2½	2½	2½	4	5	0
Vicksburg 2½	2½	2½	4	5	0
Tennessee 2½	2½	2½	4	5	0
Mobile 2	2	2	4	5	7
Kentucky 2½	2½	2½	4	5	0
Ohio 2	2	2	3	3½	4	0
Georgia, 1½	1½	1½	2	2½	2½	30

Florida 2½	2½	2½	4	5	0
Illinois 0	0	0	4	5	0
Newark, } N. J. 0	0	0	0½	0
Elizabethtown, }

In addition to the banks above mentioned, the committee have ascertained that other banks have also had transactions in exchanges at the same or very similar rates. It will be noticed that there is a great discrepancy in the above rates, which is to be accounted for by the fact, that those banks which name the lowest rates, do comparatively little in exchanges, although when applied to they quote the terms specified. These rates, oppressive as they appear, are aggravated (when paper is lodged for collection), by the excessive delay which takes place, in many cases, after payment has been made before the funds are passed to the credit of dealers by the banks."

BANK DIVIDENDS. A commercial friend has favored the editors of the New York Mercantile Advertiser with the following statement of the amount of dividends recently declared by the following institutions in that city, and which amount lies unemployed in the banks, the time of paying it to the stockholders not having yet arrived. A large portion of this amount belongs to our citizens.

Life and Trust,	1,000,000	6	60,000

In addition to the above there are dividends from various southern and western banks—a large proportion of whose stocks are owned here—and of which the dividends cannot be estimated at less than $300,000.

PAR OF EXCHANGE. The pertinacity with which people adhere to old modes of computation, is surprising. This devotion is particularly observable in all the quotations by merchants and brokers of the price of bills of exchange on England. Simply because our congress in the year 1792, in order to establish a rule for its own particular convenience, whereby sterling money should be reduced to dollars and cents in the estimate of ad valorem duties at the custom house, declared that for such purposes a pound sterling should be the equivalent of $4.44, many people have taken it into their heads, that there is some law of nature that establishes that proposition. So far from this being the case, the pound sterling which was formerly represented by the quantity of gold contained in a guinea, less the one and twentieth part, (the guinea being twenty-one shillings) and is now exactly represented by the existing sovereign, has at no time within the last twenty years been of so low a value as $4.44. All computations of exchange therefore, that have assumed $4.44 within that term, as the par of exchange for a pound sterling, have been erroneous.—It is true, that as regards practical results, it does not much matter where the starting point lies. As regards the facility of forming estimates, however, there is a decided advantage in having the computed par to correspond with the real par, in order that the departure from the equilibrium above or below, may be rendered more manifest. If the nominal par of exchange corresponded with the true par, the expression above par and below par would convey an idea of the true operations of commerce, which the want of this identity completely destroys. Every body in this country has an interest in knowing the course of its foreign trade, and the rate of exchange is the key which regulates all the great operations of commerce, and communicates to bankers that whole some service as to the expansion of their issues of which they often so much stand in need.—But where shall we find this par? it may be asked. This question would have been more difficult to answer three years ago, than it is at present.

Congress, in the year 1833 altered the law fixing $4.44 as the custom house par for the computation of duties to $4.80, in consequence of having ascertained that that sum in silver was about as near to a pound sterling in gold, for the time being as near as could be ascertained. No certain mode, however, of determining the true par existed prior to the new mint regulations of May, 1834. By the laws passed in that month, the British sovereign of full weight is declared to be the equivalent of $4.87½ of American gold coins, and consequently that sum in gold is the true par of exchange. According to the ordinary mode of computation, which assumes $4.44 and an endless fraction of a dollar as the par, a premium of 9 per cent. would make a bill cost $4.88, which is so near $4.87½, that for all practical purposes, it will be sufficient to recollect, that, when exchange is quoted in the newspapers at any rate less than 9 per cent. above par, it is really below par, and the fact of its being below par, is the reason why coin does not now go to Europe. TRADE OF BALTIMORE. The following extracts are taken from the last annual communication of the Mayor of Baltimore to the council of that city:

"The imports during the fiscal year, ending on the 30th Sept. amounted to the sum of $7,554,322, being an increase over that of the preceding year in the sum of $1,726,969, thus exhibiting the pleasing result of an increase of our commerce with the interior of nearly 23½ per cent.; showing, with the increase of the preceding year, that our imports during the two past years had increased more than fifty per cent. The total value of exports during the same period amount to the sum of $3,672,753, being less than that of the preceding year in the sum of $251,106, owing, in part, to the failure of the two last crops of grain.

"The consequence of the failure is, that from being great exporters of flour from our own wheat, we are now importers of wheat in very large quantities. "The coasting trade has increased in full proportion with that of the foreign, and is estimated to exceed it in value.

"I have procured from the collector of the customs, as illustrative of our navigation, a statement, showing the number of vessels which have been entered in this port during the same fiscal year from foreign ports, which shows that there had been entered, during the period mentioned, 55 ships, 169 brigs, 116 schooners and 2 sloops; a decrease from those of the preceding year of 7 ships, 51 brigs and 61 schooners. There have been built during the past year 2 ships, 8 brigs, 19 schooners and 3 steamboats; in all, 5,534 tons, being an increase of 730 tons over that of the preceding year.

"I mention with pride and pleasure, as exhibiting the just character of our shipbuilders, that, of those, 1 ship, 8 brigs, 16 schooners and 8 steamboats have been built for other ports of the union or for foreign countries."

THE LAST DREADFUL SHIPWRECK.

From the New York Courier and Enquirer, Jan. 5.

The information we give below has been derived by our reporter from the captain of the shipwreck vessel, and from persons on the spot where the ship came on shore. He reached town from the scene of the disaster at an early hour this morning, having been despatched by us thither, as soon as the news of the horrid catastrophe reached us:

The barque Mexico, captain Winslow, sailed from Liverpool on the 25th of October last, having on board a crew consisting of twelve men and one hundred and four passengers, in all one hundred and sixteen souls. She made the Highland lights on Saturday night last at 11 o'clock, and on Sunday morning was off the bar, with thirty or more square rigged vessels, all having signals flying for pilots, but not a pilot was there in sight. The Mexico continued standing off and on the Hook till midnight, and at dark she and the whole fleet of ships displayed lanterns from the yards for pilots. Still no pilot came. At midnight the wind increased to a violent gale from the north west, and the barque was no longer able to hold to windward, and was blown off a distance of some 50 miles. At this time, six of the crew were badly frost bitten, and the captain, mate and two seamen were all that were left able to hand and reef the sails.

On Monday morning at 11 o'clock, standing in shore, they made the southern end of the woodlands, when she was wore round and headed to the north under a close reefed main top-sail, reefed fore-sail, two reefed try-sail, and fore-stay-sail. At 4 o'clock the next morning, the mate took a cast of the lead, and reported to captain Winslow that he had fifteen fathoms water. Supposing from the soundings, as laid down on the chart, that, with this depth of water, he could still stand on two hours longer with safety, the captain gave orders to that effect, and was the more induced to do it, as the crew were in so disabled a state and the weather so intensely cold, that it was impossible for any one to remain on deck longer than half an hour at a time. The event has shown that the information given by the mate, as to the depth of water, was incorrect; his error probably arose from the lead line being frozen stiff at the time it was cast.

Fifteen minutes afterwards the ship struck the bottom, twenty-six miles east of Sandy Hook, at Hempstead beach, and not more than a cable's length from the shore. The scene that ensued on board, we leave to the reader's imagination. For one hour and three-quarters she continued thumping heavily without making any water, the sea, however, breaking continually over her. Her rudder was now knocked off, and the captain ordered the mainmast to be cut away. The boats were then cleared, the long boat hoisted out and veered under her bows with a stout hawser, for the purpose of filling it with passengers, letting it drift within reach of the people who crowded the beach, then hauling her back again, and thus saving the unfortunate people on board; but this intention was frustrated by the parting of the hawser, which snapped like a thread as soon as the boat was exposed to the heaving surf. The yawl was next got alongside, and stove to pieces almost instantly. At 7 o'clock the same morning the ship bilged, and filled with water. Orders followed from the captain to cut away the foremast; and that every soul on board should come on deck. In inexpressible agony, they thus remained until four o'clock in the afternoon, when a boat was launched from the beach, and succeeded in getting under the bowsprit of the wreck. This boat took off captain Winslow and seven men, and succeeded in reaching the shore with them in safety.

The attempt, however, was attended with such imminent danger, that none could be induced to repeat it. And now, the horrors of the scene were indescribable. Already had the sufferings of the unhappy beings been such as to surpass belief. From the moment of the disaster, they had hung round the captain, covered with their blankets thick set with ice, imploring his assistance, and asking if hope was still left to them. When they perceived that no further help came from the land, their piercing shrieks were distinctly heard at a considerable distance, and continued through the night until they one by one perished. The next morning the bodies of many of the unhappy creatures were seen lashed to different parts of the wreck embedded in ice. None, it is believed, were drowned, but all frozen to death.

Of the one hundred and four passengers, two-thirds were women and children.

It is but justice to the people on shore to say, that every thing which human beings could accomplish to save the unfortunates was done that their means permitted. The only boat which boarded the vessel was hauled a distance of ten miles, and was manned by an old man and six others, four or five of whom were the old man's sons and grandsons. For thirty-five years he has been living on the sea shore, during which he has rendered assistance to numerous wrecks, and never before has he or his comrades shrunk from the surf; but, in addition to violence on the present occasion, such was the extreme cold, that a second attempt to rescue was more than they dared venture; it would have inevitably proved fatal to them.

IOWA COPPER MINES.

Lancaster, Dec. 27, 1836.

In reply to your inquiries in relation to the Iowa copper mines, recently discovered in Wisconsin territory, I will give a brief geographical and statistical view of that country from my own observations, and information derived from unquestionable sources.

The Iowa copper mines are located about one mile from Mineral Point, and thirty-five miles from Galena—embracing four hundred acres of land; in which copper has been discovered at various points, in great abundance. It is found eighteen inches from the surface of the earth, and increases in value and quantity with the depth of the pits.

The great road and mail route from Galena to Green Bay, via Fort Winnebago, passes through Mineral Point, and a rail road has been projected and an appropriation made for its survey from Milwaukee on Lake Michigan, to some point on the Mississippi near Galena, which passes through the mines. There is attached to the mineral tract, which is undulating prairie, nine hundred acres of woodland, covered with a heavy growth of the best timber, for the business of smelting.

It is, I understand, proposed to form a stock company in the city for the purchase of these mines. I believe, from my knowledge of the western country, that they present one of the best opportunities to capitalists to embark in speculation, yet offered in Philadelphia. The real value of the mineral cannot be computed—but from the quantity and quality of the ore, which has been tested by science, it may be considered the most important mineral discovery in the United States. Copper ore found so high on the Mississippi river is a matter of great consideration. A furnace is now in blast, and it only requires the erection of rolling mills, for which every facility is afforded, to supply the Upper Mississippi and Missouri with this article, without the immense cost of transportation, on that extensive ascending navigation; and then there is a safe descending navigation, on the unobstructed bed of the Mississippi, for the surplus manufacture, to New Orleans, or to the out-let of that great national canal, a distance of two thousand miles.

It is a fact, now generally known, that no lands produce better wheat than those of the mineral region of Wisconsin. I have seen as fine crops on the prairie lands in fields surrounded by the miner's shafts, as I have ever seen grow in Pennsylvania, upon the best cultivated farms, tilled by the best farmers in the world. There is a body of land, extending from Green Bay to the Mississippi, embracing the country of Fox river, Winnebago lake and the mineral district, which I believe to be unsurpassed in fertility and depth of soil. The lakes and the Mississippi are now struggling for the mastery, and both points are filling up with an industrious and enterprising population so rapidly, that Wisconsin must enter the union as a state, within two or three years. The material advantage to the lake country is its supply of lumber—the government, very properly, gave the new settlers the advantage of procuring pine from saw mills, erected on lands occupied by the Indians, but which could not be purchased—and thus they could erect comfortable buildings with ease and economy. But this favor has not been extended to the people of the Upper Mississippi, where pine is very scarce; except on lands yet occupied by the Indians, and the consequence is that the poor settler finds it very difficult to erect a comfortable dwelling, as pine boards are selling from forty to seventy dollars per thousand feet, and a sufficient supply cannot be found. The demand for lumber is very great and daily increasing, in consequence of the numerous towns springing up on the Mississippi and its tributaries—and the unebbing tide of emigration swelling upon the rich lands of the great valley.

I will give you a description of Bellefontaine, Davenport, Prairie du Chein, and other points, concerning which you inquire in another letter. In the mean time, I have no hesitation that the "Iowa copper mines" offer attractions rarely to be met with in any country. Truly, your friend,

S. C. STAMBAUGH.

ADMISSION OF MICHIGAN INTO THE UNION.

In senate, Monday, January 2.

Mr. Grundy moved that the previous orders of the day be postponed, for the purpose of considering the bill to admit the state of Michigan into the union.

Mr. Calhoun was opposed to the motion; the documents accompanying the bill had but this morning been laid upon the tables, and no time had been allowed for even reading them over.

Mr. Grundy insisted on his motion. Of one point he was fully satisfied, that Michigan had a right to be received into the union; on this, he presumed, there would be but little difference of opinion, the chief difficulty having respect to the mode in which it was to be done. There seemed more difference of opinion, and he presumed there would be more debate touching the preamble than concerning the bill itself; but he could not consent to postpone the subject. Congress were daily passing laws, the effect of which pressed immediately upon the people of Michigan, and concerning which they were entitled to have a voice and a vote upon this floor, and, therefore, the bill for their admission ought to receive the immediate action of the senate. As to the documents, they were not numerous. The gentleman from South Carolina might readily run his eye over them, and he would perceive that the facts of the case were easily understood. Indeed, there was but one of any consequence, respecting which there was any controversy. When the senate adjourned on Thursday, many senators had been prepared and were desirous to speak although the documents were not then printed. It was the great principles involved in the case which would form the subjects of discussion, and they could as well be discussed now. He thought the senate had better proceed. One fact in the case was very certain; there had been more voters for the members to the last convention than for the first. How many more was a matter of little comparative consequence.—The great question for the senate to consider was this: what is the will of Michigan on the subject of entering the union?

If this could be decided, it was of less consequence whether the bill should or should not expressly state that the last convention, and the assent by it given, formed the ground of the admission of the state.

Mr. Calhoun here enquired whether the chairman of the committee was to be understood as being now ready to abandon the preamble? If the judiciary committee were agreed to do this, he thought all difficulty would be at an end.

Mr. Grundy replied, that, as chairman of the judiciary committee, he had no authority to reply to the inquiry, but, as an individual, he considered the preamble as of little consequence, and he should vote for the bill whether it were in or out. Michigan ought undoubtedly to be admitted, and all the consequences would result, whether the preamble were retained or not. He had received no authority from the committee to consent that it should be stricken out. For himself he was settled in the belief that congress possessed full power to prescribe the boundaries of a territory, and that when that territory passed into a state the right remained still the same. Congress had already established the boundary of Ohio, and that settled the question. He never had perceived the necessity of inserting in the admission bill the section which made the assent of Michigan to the boundaries fixed for her by congress a prerequisite to her admission, because the disputed boundary line was fixed by another bill; and whether the preamble to this bill should be retained or not, Michigan could not pass that line, so that the preamble was really of very little consequence.

Mr. Calhoun said that, in inquiring of the honorable chairman whether he intended to abandon the preamble of the bill, his question had had respect not to any pledge respecting boundaries, but to the recognition of the second convention and of its doings. He wanted to know whether the chairman was ready to abandon that principle. He had examined the subject a good deal, and his own mind was fully made up that Michigan could not be admitted on the ground of that second convention; but the senate might set aside the whole of what had been done, and receive Michigan as she stood at the commencement of the last session.

Mr. Grundy observed that, if the gentleman's mind was fully made up, then there could be no necessity of postponing the subject. The gentleman has fully satisfied himself, and now (said Mr. G.) let us see if he can satisfy us. His argument, it seems, has been fully matured, and we are now ready to listen to it. Though I consider that there is no virtue in the preamble, and that the effect of the bill will be the same whether it is stricken out or retained, yet I am not ready to say that I shall vote to strike it out. I am ready to hear what can be said both for and against it.

The question was now put on the motion of Mr. Grundy to postpone the previous orders, and carried, 22 to 16. So the orders were postponed, and the senate proceeded to consider the bill, which having been again read at the clerk's table, as follows: A bill to admit the state of Michigan into the union upon an equal footing with the original states.

Whereas, in pursuance of the act of congress of June the fifteenth, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, entitled "an act to establish the northern boundary of the state of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the state of Michigan into the union, upon the conditions therein expressed," a convention of delegates, elected by the people of the said state of Michigan, for the sole purpose of giving their assent to the boundaries of the said state of Michigan as described, declared and established, in and by the said act, did, on the fifteenth of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, assent to the provisions of said act: therefore—

Be it enacted, &c. That the state of Michigan shall be one, and is hereby declared to be one, of the United States of America, and admitted into the union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the secretary of the treasury, in carrying into effect the thirteenth and fourteenth sections of the act of the twenty-third of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, entitled "an act to regulate the deposits of the public money," shall consider the state of Michigan as being one of the United States.

Mr. Calhoun then rose, and addressed the senate as follows:

I have bestowed on this subject all the attention that was in my power, and, although actuated by a most anxious desire for the admission of Michigan into the union, I find it impossible to give my assent to this bill. I am satisfied the judiciary committee has not bestowed upon the subject all that attention which its magnitude requires; and I can explain it on no other supposition why they should place the admission on the grounds they have.—One of the committee, the senator from Ohio, on my left, (Mr. Morris), has pronounced the grounds as dangerous and revolutionary. He might have gone farther, and with truth pronounced them utterly repugnant to the principles of the constitution.

I have not ventured this assertion, as strong as it is, without due reflection, and weighing the full force of the terms I have used, and do not fear, with an impartial hearing, to establish its truth beyond the power of controversy.

To understand fully the objection to this bill, it is necessary that we should have a correct conception of the facts. They are few, and may be briefly told.

Some time previous to the last session of congress, the territory of Michigan, through its legislature, authorised the people to meet in convention, for the purpose of forming a state government.—They met accordingly, and agreed upon a constitution, which they forthwith transmitted to congress. It was fully discussed in this chamber, and, objectionable as the instrument was, an act was finally passed, which accepted the constitution, and declared Michigan to be a state, and admitted into the union, on the single condition, that she should, by a convention of the people, assent to the boundaries prescribed by the act. Soon after our adjournment the legislature of the state of Michigan (for she had been raised by our assent to the dignity of a state) called a convention of the people of the state, in conformity to the act, which met at the time appointed, at Ann Arbor. After full discussion, the convention, withheld its assent, and formally transmitted the result to the president of the United States. This is the first part of the story. I will now give the sequel. Since then, during the last month, a self-constituted assembly met, professedly as a convention of the people of the state; but without the authority of the state. This unauthorised and lawless assemblage assume the high function of giving the assent of the state of Michigan to the condition of admission, as prescribed in the act of congress. They communicated their assent to the executive of the United States, and he to the senate. The senate referred his message to the committee on the judiciary, and that committee, on its own authority, reported this present bill for the admission of the state.

Such are the facts out of which grows the important question, had this self-constituted assembly the authority to assent for the state? Had they the authority to do what is implied in giving assent to the condition of admission? That assent introduces the state into the union, and pledges in the most solemn manner to the constitutional compact which binds these states in one confederated body; imposes on her all its obligations, and confers on her all its benefits. Had this irregular, self-constituted assemblage the authority to perform these high and solemn acts of sovereignty in the name of the state of Michigan? She could only come in as a state, and none could act or speak for her without her express authority; and to assume the authority without her sanction is nothing short of treason against the state.

Again: The assent to the conditions prescribed by congress implies an authority in those who gave it to supersede in part the constitution of the state of Michigan; for her constitution fixes the boundaries of the state as part of that instrument which the condition of admission entirely alters, and to that extent the assent would supersede the constitution; and thus the question is presented, whether this self-constituted assembly, styling itself a convention, had the authority to do an act which necessarily implies the right to supersede in part the constitution.

But further: The state of Michigan, through its legislature, authorised a convention of the people, in order to determine whether the condition of admission should be assented to or not. The convention met; and, after mature deliberation, it dissented to the condition of admission; and thus again the question is presented, whether this self-called, self-constituted assemblage, this caucus—for it is entitled to no higher name—had the authority to annul the dissent of the state, solemnly given by a convention of the people, regularly convoked under the express authority of the constituted authorities of the state?

If all or any of these questions be answered in the negative—if the self-created assemblage of December had no authority to speak in the name of the state of Michigan—if none to supersede any portion of her constitution—if none to annul her dissent to the condition of admission regularly given by a convention of the people of the state, convoked by the authority of the state, to introduce her on its authority would be not only revolutionary and dangerous, but utterly repugnant to the principles of our constitution. The question then submitted to the senate is, had that assemblage the authority to perform these high and solemn acts?

The chairman of the committee on the judiciary holds that this self-constituted assemblage had the authority; and what is his reason? Why, truly, because a greater number of votes were given for those who constituted that assemblage than for those who constituted the convention of the people of the state, convened under its constituted authorities. This argument resolves itself into two questions—the first of fact, and the second of principle. I shall not discuss the first. It is not necessary to do so. But if it were, it would be easy to show that never was so important a fact so loosely testified. There is not one particle of official evidence before us. We had nothing but the private letters of individuals, who do not know even the numbers that voted on either occasion; they know nothing of the qualifications of voters, nor how their votes were received, nor by whom counted. Now, none knows better than the honorable chairman himself, that such testimony as is submitted to us to establish a fact of this moment, would not be received in the lowest magistrate's court in the land. But I waive this,—I come to the question of the principle involved; and what is it? The argument is, that a greater number of persons voted for the last convention than for the first, and therefore the acts of the last of right, abrogated those of the first; in other words, that mere numbers, without regard to the forms of law, or the principles of the constitution, give authority. The authority of numbers, according to this argument, sets aside the authority of law and the constitution. Need I show that such a principle goes to the entire overthrow of our constitutional government, and would subvert all social order? It is the identical principle which prompted the late revolutionary and anarchical movement in Maryland, and which has done more to shake confidence in our system of government than any event since the adoption of our constitution, but which happily has been frowned down by the patriotism and intelligence of the people of that state.

What was the ground of this insurrectionary measure, but that the government of Maryland did not represent the voice of the numerical majority of the people of Maryland, and that the authority of law and constitution was nothing against that of numbers. Here we find, on this floor, and from the head of the judiciary committee, the same principle revived, and, if possible, in a worse form; for, in Maryland, the anarchists assumed that they were sustained by the numerical majority of the people of the state in their revolutionary movements; but the utmost the chairman can pretend to have is a mere plurality. The largest number of votes claimed for the self-created assemblage is 8,000; and no man will undertake to say that this constitutes any thing like a majority of the voters of Michigan; and he claims the high authority which he does for it, not because it is a majority of the people of Michigan, but because it is a greater number than voted for the authorised convention of the people that refused to agree to the condition of admission. It may be shown by his own witness, that a majority of the voters of Michigan greatly exceed 8,000. Mr. Williams the president of the self-created assemblage, stated that the population of that state amounted to nearly 200,000 persons. If so, there cannot be less than from 25,000 to 30,000 voters. Considering how nearly universal the right of suffrage is under its constitution, and it thus appears that this irregular, self-constituted meeting did not represent the vote of one-third of the state; and yet on a mere principle of plurality we are to supersede the constitution of Michigan, and annul the act of a convention of the people regularly convened under the authority of the government of the state.

But, says the senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Buchanan,) this assembly was not self-constituted. It met under the authority of an act of congress; and that act had no reference to the state, but only to the people; and that the assemblage in December was just such a meeting as that act contemplated. It is not my intention to discuss the question whether the honorable senator has given the true interpretation of the act, but, if it were, I could very easily show his interpretation to be erroneous; for, if such had been the intention of congress, the act surely would have specified the time when the convention was to be held, who were to be the managers, who the voters, and would not have left it to individuals, who might choose to assume the authority to determine all these important points. I might also readily show that the word "convention" of the people, as used in law or the constitution, always means a meeting of the people regularly convened by the constituted authority of the state, in their high sovereign capacity, and that it never means such an assemblage as the one in question. But I waive this; I take higher ground. If the act be, indeed, such as the senator says it is, then I maintain that it is utterly opposed to the fundamental principles of our federal union. Congress has no right whatever to call a convention in a state. It can call but one convention, and that is a convention of the people of the United States to amend the federal constitution; nor can it call that except authorised by two-thirds of the states.

Ours is a federal republic—a union of states. Michigan is a state; a state in the course of admission, and differing only from the other states in her federal relations. She is declared to be a state in the most solemn manner by your own act. She can come into the union only as a state; and by her voluntary assent, given by the people of the state in convention, called by the constituted authority of the state. To admit the state of Michigan on the authority of a self-created meeting, or one called by the direct authority of congress, passing by the authorities of the state, would be the most monstrous proceeding under our constitution that can be conceived; the most repugnant to its principles, and dangerous in its consequences. It would establish a direct relation between individual citizens of a state and the general government, in utter subversion of the federal character of our system. The relation of the citizens to this government is through the states exclusively. They are subject to its authority and laws only because the state has assented they should be. If she dissents, their assent is nothing; and, on the other hand, if she assents, their dissent is nothing. It is through the state, then, and through the state alone, that the United States government can have any connexion with the people of a state; and does not, then, the senator from Pennsylvania see, that if congress can authorise a convention of the people in the state of Michigan, without the authority of the state, it matters not what is the object, it may in like manner authorise conventions in any other state for whatever purpose it may think proper?

Michigan is as much a sovereign state as any other, differing only, as I have said, as to her federal relations. If we give our sanction to the assemblage of December, on the principle laid down by the senator from Pennsylvania, then we establish the doctrine that congress has power to call at pleasure conventions within the states. Is there a senator on this floor who will assent to such a doctrine? Is there one, especially, who represents the smaller states of this union, or the weaker section? Admit the power, and every vestige of state rights would be destroyed. Our system would be subverted, and, instead of a confederacy of free and sovereign states, we would have all power concentrated here, and this would become the most odious despotism. He, indeed, must be blind, who does not see such a power would give the federal government a complete control of all the states. I call upon senators now to arrest a doctrine so dangerous. Let it be remembered, that, under our system, bad precedents live forever; good ones only perish. We may not feel all the evil consequences at once, but this precedent, once set, will surely be received, and will become the instrument of infinite evil.

I will be asked, what shall be done? Will you refuse to admit Michigan into the union? I answer no; I desire to admit her; and if the senators from Indiana and Ohio will agree, I am ready now to admit her as she stood at the beginning of last session, without giving sanction to the unauthorised assemblage of December.

But if that does not meet their wishes, there is still another by which she may be admitted. We are told that two-thirds of the legislature and people of Michigan are in favor of accepting the conditions of the act of last session. If that be the fact, then all that is necessary is, that the legislature should call another convention. All difficulty will thus be removed, and there will be still abundant time for her admission at this session. And shall we, for the sake of gaining a few months, give our assent to a bill fraught with principles so monstrous as this?

We have been told, that unless she is admitted immediately it will be too late for her to receive her proportion of the surplus revenue under the deposit bill. I trust that on so great a question a difficulty like this will have no weight. Give her at once her full share. I am ready to do so at once, without waiting her admission. I was mortified to hear on so grave a question such motives assigned for her admission, contrary to the law and constitution. Such considerations ought not to be presented when we are settling great constitutional principles. I trust that we shall pass by all such frivolous motives on this occasion, and take ground on the great and fundamental principle that an informal, irregular, self-constituted assembly, a mere caucus, has no authority to speak for a sovereign state in any case whatever; to supersede its constitution, or to reverse its dissent deliberately given by a convention of the people of the state, regularly convened under its constituted authority.

[Mr. Calhoun was followed in the debate this day by Messrs. Grundy, Morris, Strange and Walker.]

THE DISTRIBUTION BILL.

In senate, Wednesday, December 21.

Mr. Calhoun, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bill:

Bill to extend the provisions of certain sections therein named of the act of the 23d June, 1836, regulating the deposits of the money that may be in the treasury on the 1st January, 1838.

Be it enacted, &c. That the money which shall be the treasury of the United States on the first day of January, 1838, reserving the sum of five millions dollars, shall be deposited with the several states, on the terms and according to the provisions of the 3th, 14th and 15th sections of the act to regulate the deposits of the public money, approved the 23d day of June, 1836.

Mr. Calhoun, in introducing the bill, observed that he had not asked leave to introduce this bill without satisfying himself that there would be a large surplus of the public revenue remaining in the treasury at the termination of the next year, after allowing for very liberal appropriations on all proper objects of expenditure. From the calculations he had made he was convinced that the amount of this surplus would not fall short of eight millions of dollars.

He was fully aware that the secretary of the treasury, in the report submitted by that officer to congress, had taken a very different view, yet Mr. C. thought he hazarded little when he said that on this subject the secretary was certainly mistaken. He knew, indeed, that formerly such an assertion from a member of congress in relation to the highest fiscal officer of the government would have been deemed adventurous; but so vague, so uncertain, so conjectural, and so very erroneous had been the reports from that department for two or three years last past, that he could not be considered as risking much in taking such a position. That in this remark he did no injustice to the secretary of the treasury, (toward whom he cherished no personal hostility or unkind feeling whatsoever), he would take the liberty of presenting to the senate the estimates made by that officer for the present year, in December last, and comparing with it the actual result, as now ascertained from the secretary's own report, made in the present season. His estimate of the receipts from all sources, including the public lands and every other branch of the revenue, amounted to $19,750,000, whereas the report stated those receipts to have amounted to $47,691,998, presenting a difference of the estimate, for a single year, of $27,941,998.—Thus the excess of the actual receipts had exceeded the estimate by more than one-third of the whole amount of the estimate. Each of the great branches of revenue, the customs and the public lands, exceeded the estimate by millions of dollars.

Again: the secretary had estimated the balance at the end of the year, then within four weeks of its termination, at $18,047,599, whereas the report showed that the balance actually amounted to $26,749,803, being an error of $8,702,250 for that short period. How these errors arose, whether from negligence or inattention, or whether they were made purposely to subvert certain political views, it was not for him to say; but they were sufficient to show that he ran no very formidable hazard in venturing to say that the views of the secretary in respect to that was yet future might be erroneous.

But further: the secretary, in his report last year, had estimated the available means of the treasury for the current year at $37,797,598; they were now ascertained to have been $74,441,701, exhibiting a small error of $46,644,104. We might search the fiscal records of all civilized nations, and would not find in the compass of history an error so monstrous. He stated this with no feelings of ill will toward the secretary, but with emotions of shame and mortification for the honor of the country. How vast errors like these appear in the eyes of foreign nations? How would they look to posterity?

But he was not yet done. The secretary estimates the expenditure of the year at $23,103,444, whereas they turned out to be $31,435,032, making a difference of $8,331,588. He estimates the balance in the treasury at the end of this year at $14,590,000. He now admits that it will equal $3,005,669, making an error of $28,505,669, and his notwithstanding he had made an under estimate of the expenditure of more than eight millions, which, if added, as it ought to be, would make a mistake of nearly thirty-seven millions.

The secretary, however, had profited by the errors of last year. The estimates in the present report were somewhat nearer to the truth, but were still far removed from it. And, indeed, so small was the amount in which he had profited, that he had risked an opinion that the expenditure would exceed the income, so that, of the sum which had been deposited with the states, a portion, amounting to between two and three millions, would have to be refunded. The secretary held out language of this kind, when he acknowledges that the income for the year would be $24,000,000. Mr. C. said he would be glad to see the administration, with such an income, venture to call upon the states to pay back the moneys they had received. No administration would venture the call, except in the case of a foreign war, in which case these deposits would prove a timely and precious resource. With proper management, they would enable the government to avoid the necessity at the commencement of a war of resorting to war taxes and loans. All those gentlemen, and he saw several of them around him, who were here at the commencement of the last war, would well remember the difficulty and embarrassment which attended the operation of raising the revenue from a peace to a war establishment.

Assuming, then, that there would be a surplus, the question presented itself as to what should be done with it. That question Mr. C. would not now attempt to argue. The discussion of it at this time would be premature and out of place. He proposed to himself a more limited object, which was to state the points connected with this subject, which he considered as established; and to point out what was the real issue at present. One point was perfectly established by the proceedings of the last session—that, when there was an unavoidable surplus, it ought not to be left in the treasury, or in the deposit banks, but should be deposited with the states. It was not only the most safe, but the most just, that the states should have the use of the money in preference to the banks. This, in fact, was the great and leading principle which lay at the foundation of the act of last session—an act that would forever distinguish the 24th congress—an act which will go down with honor to posterity, as it had obtained the almost unanimous approbation of the present day. The passage had inspired the country with new hopes. It had been beheld abroad as a matter of wonder; a phenomenon in the fiscal world; such as could have sprung out of no institutions but ours, and which went in a powerful and impressive manner to illustrate the genius of our government.

He considered it no less fully established that there ought to be no surplus, if it could be avoided. The money belonged to those who made it, and government had no right to exact it unless necessary. What, then, was the true question at issue? It was this: Can you reduce the revenue to the wants of the people?—he meant in a large political sense. Could the reduction be made without an injury that would more than counteravail the benefit? The president thought it could be done; and Mr. C. hoped he was correct in that opinion. If it be practicable, then, beyond all question, it was the proper and natural course to be adopted. It was under this impression that he had moved to refer this part of the president's message to the committee on finance. He not only considered that as the appropriate committee; but there were other reasons that governed him in making the reference. A majority of that committee were known to be hostile to the deposit bill, and would, therefore, do all in their power to avoid the possibility of having a surplus. If, then, that committee could not effect a reduction, then it might be safely assumed as impracticable.—If they could agree on a reduction, the senate no doubt would readily concur with them.

There was one point on which the committee need have no apprehension, that any reduction they might propose to make would be considered by the south as a breach of the compromise act. Her interest in that act is not against the reduction, but the increase of duties. If it be the pleasure of other sections to reduce she will certainly not complain.

Mr. C. said he would take this occasion to define with exactness the position he occupied in regard to the compromise. He stood, personally, without pledge or plighted faith, as far as that act was concerned. He clearly foresaw, at the time that bill passed, that there would be a surplus of revenue in the treasury. He knew that result to be unavoidable, unless by a reduction so sudden as to overthrow our manufacturing establishments—a catastrophe which he sincerely desired to avoid. Whatever might be thought to the contrary, he had always been the friend of those establishments. He thought at the time that the reduction provided for in the bill had not been made to take place as fast as it might have been. But the terms of the bill formed the only ground on which the opposing interests could agree, and he, as representing in part one of the southern states, had accepted it, believing it, on the whole, to be the best arrangement which could be effected; yet he saw (it did not, indeed, require much of a prophetic spirit) that there were those who were then ready to collect the tariff at the point of the bayonet, rather than yield an inch, who, when the injurious effects of the surplus should be felt, would throw the responsibility on those who supported the bill. Seeing this, Mr. C. had determined that it should not be thrown upon him. He had therefore risen in his place, and, after calling on the stenographers to note his words, he had declared that he had voted for that bill in the same manner, and no other, than he did for all other bills, and that he held himself no further personally pledged in its passage than in any other. Mr. C. was therefore at perfect liberty to select his position, which he would now state. We of the south had derived incalculable advantage from that act; and, as one belonging to that section, he claimed all those advantages to the very last letter. That act had reduced the income of the government greatly. Few, he believed, were fully aware of the extent to which it had operated. It was a fact, which the documents would show, that the act of 1828 arrested at the custom house one-half in value of the amount of the imports.—The imports at that time, deducting reshipments, were about sixty-five millions of dollars in value, out of which the government collected about thirty-two millions in the gross. The imports of the last year, deducting reshipments, amounted to $120,000,000, which, if the tariff of 1828 had not been reduced, would have given an increase of $60,000,000, instead of something upwards of $21,000,000. He claimed not the whole difference for the compromise, but upwards of $20,000,000 may be fairly carried to its credit. Under this great reduction, we of the south began to revive. Our business began to thrive and to look up. But the compromise act had not yet fully discharged its functions. Its operation would continue until the revenue should be brought down till no duty should exceed 20 per cent. ad valorem, and the revenue be reduced to the actual wants of the government. But, while he claimed for the south all these very important advantages, Mr. C. trusted he was too honest as well as too proud, while he claimed those benefits on her part, to withhold whatever advantage the north may derive from the compromise. His position, then, on the question of reduction, was to follow, and not to lead; and such he believed to be the true position of the south. If it be the wish of other sections to reduce, she will cheerfully follow, but I trust she will be the last to disturb the present state of things.

Having thus clearly defined his own position, Mr. C. said he would venture a suggestion. If the manufacturing interests would listen to the voice of one who had never been their enemy, he would venture to advise them to a course which he should consider as wise on all sides.

It is well known (said Mr. C.) that the compromise act makes a very great and sudden reduction in the years '41 and '42. He doubted the wisdom of this provision at the time; but those who represented the manufacturing interests thought it was safer and better to reduce more slowly at first and more rapidly at the termination of the term, in order to avoid the possibility of a shock at the commencement of the term. He thought experience had clearly shown that there could be no hazard in accelerating the rate of reduction now, in order to avoid the great and rapid descent of '41 and '42; and in this view it seemed to him that it would be wise to distribute the remaining reduction equally on the six remaining years of the act. It was, however, but a suggestion.

Mr. C. observed, that had not this been the short session of congress, he should have postponed the introduction of the present bill, and awaited the action of the committee on finance. But it was possible that committee might find it impracticable to reduce the revenue, and as there were but about two months of the session left, if something were not effected in the mean time, a large surplus might be left in the treasury, or rather in the deposit banks—left there to disturb and disorder the currency of the country; to cherish and foster a spirit of wild and boundless speculation, and to be wielded for electioneering purposes. A standing surplus in the deposit banks was almost universally condemned. The president himself had announced it in his message, and Mr. C. heartily agreed with him in every word he had said on that subject.

Before sending the bill to the chair he would take the liberty of expressing his hope that the subject would be discussed in the same spirit of moderation as had characterized the debates upon it last year. It was a noble example, and he hoped it would be followed. Let the subject be argued on great public grounds, and let all party spirit be sacrificed on this great question to the good of the country. Yet, he would say to the friends of the administration, that it was not from any fear, on party ground, that he uttered this sentiment; for he believed there was no subject which, in the hands of a skillful opposition, would be more fatal to power.

The bill was, by consent, read twice; when Mr. Calhoun moved that it be made the order of the day for Monday next. He saw no necessity for its commitment.

Mr. Clay was extremely unwilling to interrupt for a moment (and he would only interrupt for a moment) the progress of the debate expected to proceed to-day. But, from the numerous indications which had been given of a purpose to disturb the compromise act, and from the direct allusion to the subject which had just been made, he felt himself called upon to say one word. Considering the circumstances under which that act passed, the manner through this body, the acclamation with which it ran through the house, the cordial reception with which it was greeted by every part and every interest in the country, he did not think that it ought to be lightly touched. In faith of adherence to the provisions of that act, large investments have been made, and under its beneficent operation every interest has prospered, the manufacturing not less than other great interests. The whole country has looked to the inviolability of the act: the messages of the president; the reports from the secretary of the treasury; the declarations of members of congress, upon this floor and that of the other house, all heretofore have united in stamping upon it that character. Strictly speaking, he was aware that congress possessed the power to repeal or modify the act, but in his opinion it could not be done, without something like a violation of the public faith. He had foreseen, at the period of the passage of the act, the probability of a large surplus beyond the wants of the government, economically administered, and he had endeavored, simultaneously with the passage of the act, to provide for it by the introduction of the land bill. That bill had passed congress, but unfortunately had encountered the veto of the president. If that bill had received his sanction, there would have been no surplus at the last session, none now, probably none hereafter, to divide and distract us. For it was from the proceeds of the public lands that the surplus arose. If the land bill which passed at the last session of the senate had become a law, it would have distributed among the several states a larger sum than will be deposited in their treasuries under the deposit act.

Mr. C. said that he knew well that the preservation of the compromise act did not depend upon him. He well knew that its fate was in the hands of a majority of the senate, as now constituted, and a majority of the house. But, if they choose to repeal it, or to make any essential alteration in the measure of protection secured by that act, he could only deeply regret the reopening of wounds which had been so happily healed. He can co-operate in no such object, but shall, for himself, steadily oppose any material change of the provisions of the act, and insist upon that efficacious and complete remedy for a surplus which is to be found in the land bill, or upon some other competent remedy which will not unsettle all the great business of the country.

Mr. Walker moved that the bill be referred to the committee on finance; and in supporting his motion observed that he had been one of those who voted against what was now openly avowed to be a distribution bill. Since the money had been distributed, some of the largest states had already come forward and applied to congress for the repeal of that section of the bill which provided for the refunding of the money by the states when it should be needed by the general government. He would remind the senate that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster), who had been one of the authors and advocates of this measure; did expressly tell the senate that it would be but a single operation; and when the senate was warned that the bill would be only a precedent for the distribution policy in future, the distinguished senator had assured them of the contrary, and had insisted that it was a single and solitary measure, intended only to meet a contingency. Yet, what was the senate now asked to do? To create a surplus for the purpose of future distribution. Mr. W. really thought that such a proposition demanded examination by some committee, and he hoped the senate would not consent to take a leap in the dark. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina had presented as one ground of his opposition to letting the public money remain in the deposit banks, a desire to prevent the public land from passing into the hands of speculators. But the gentleman's remedy had not met the evil. The distribution bill had not prevented the monopoly of the public lands by speculators, nor would it ever prevent it. If the gentleman did really desire to obviate that evil, let him join in recommending that part of the president's message which proposed to limit the sale of the public lands to actual settlers. Should this recommendation be adopted, there would remain no surplus to be distributed. For how was the surplus created? By referring to the report of the secretary of the treasury, it would be found that in the first three-quarters of the last year twenty millions of dollars had been paid into the treasury for the public lands, which was at the rate of about $25,000,000 a year. Yet, what portion of this amount was needed for actual settlers? not more than $5,000,000; or, according to an estimate made by the chairman of the committee on public lands, not over $8,000,000. Thus there would be a reduction in the receipt of $16,000,000, being double the amount of the surplus predicted by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina. Let him then adopt the president's recommendation, and the evil apprehended could not take place. But should the senate pass the bill which had now been introduced, they would have passed the Rubicon, and the distribution policy would, in spite of all opposition, become the settled policy of the government.

Mr. W. called upon the senate and upon the country to remark that they were now invoked by the gentleman from South Carolina to create a surplus for the purpose of distribution.

Mr. Calhoun, in reply, complained of having been entirely misstated by the senator from Mississippi. He had not invoked the senate to any such act, nor had he said any thing like it. But he had said that no administration could honestly plead any necessity for demanding back the deposits from the states, unless in the contingency of a foreign war. So far from having expressed a desire to create and distribute a surplus, he had, on the contrary, expressly declared that he should greatly prefer a reduction of the revenue, if it could be safely effected; and he had expressed his willingness to send the bill to a committee opposed to his own views, that, if possible, this might be effected. Yet, the gentleman accused him of a design to create a surplus.

The gentleman had again said that one of the arguments urged by him in favor of the distribution bill had been, that the deposits of the public money in banks was a great instrument of fraud and speculation. This was a great mistake. He had said no such thing. The president, however, had undertaken to legislate on the subject, and had issued an order, which was much more like an act of congress than an executive measure. The president deemed the evil so great, and the remedy so specific, that he had ventured on a great stretch of power to realize the object. Now, after what the president had said on this subject, any man who should vote to leave the public money in deposit banks stood openly convicted of being in favor of speculators.

Mr. C. hoped the senator would not persist in his motion to refer the bill to a committee which he knew to be utterly opposed to it. Nothing could be more unparliamentary. He hoped the gentleman would at least indulge him with a special committee.

Mr. Buchanan, without expressing any opinion on the merits of the bill, was in favor of its commitment. The subject extended itself into so many ramifications, was so complex and so extensive, that no leading measure ought to be adopted in relation to it without its previously undergoing the careful investigation of a committee. There were two counter projects now before the senate which were essentially incompatible with each other. One had been reported by the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay), which proposed to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the states on certain conditions; the other to deposit the surplus that might accrue, under the provisions of the bill of the last session. Both these plans, it was obvious, could not prevail; while the president had recommended the sale of the public domain to actual settlers only. On this matter Mr. B. expressed no opinion, but should be guided in a great measure by the wishes and opinions of gentlemen coming from the new states.

Should the president's recommendation be adopted, there would probably be no surplus. He should like to see a responsible report from the committee on finance. On the question whether there would or would not be a surplus on the 1st of January next he expressed no opinion.

While up, he would add one word on the subject of what was commonly called the compromise act. Never should he forget the impression made upon his own mind when the news of the passage of that act first reached him. He had then been in a foreign country. The enemies of liberty throughout the world were all looking to this country with anxious eyes, and with hopes highly raised; that this last experiment in favor of human freedom would prove to be a failure. The most exaggerated accounts of the division of opinion in this country, on the subject of the tariff, were spread throughout Europe, and the expectation appeared to be general that our union would be dissolved, and the republic expire. In such circumstances, when he heard that a compromise had been effected, his bosom had been pervaded by a feeling such as he had never known before. Without being acquainted with the particulars of the bill, he was prepared to approve of it in advance. On further examination, however, he could not say whether he should have supported the bill or no, but the country had received it; the great manufacturing and agricultural interest had welcomed it, and to this moment relied upon it as, in some sense, the charter of their hopes. Other prevailing interests of the country shared in the feeling, and never would Mr. B. give his vote in favor of touching one of its provisions. That could not be done without extensively and injuriously affecting, not only the agricultural and manufacturing, but another great interest of his own state. He referred to the mining interest. On the whole, he hoped that they should have a report from a committee; and should it even be adverse to the bill, yet such were the well-known zeal, perseverance and talents of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, that he would still find ways and means to bring the merits of his project fully before the minds of the senate.

Mr. Walker said that the senator from South Carolina had appealed to him to indulge him with a special committee. But that gentleman would do well to remember that, when on a former occasion he, (Mr. W.) had introduced a bill of great importance to Mississippi, and asked its reference to a select committee, that gentleman had opposed the motion, and had sent the bill to the committee on public lands, which he well knew to be opposed to every one of its provisions. In insisting, therefore, on his original motion to refer this bill to the committee on finance, he had only followed an example which the gentleman had set him.

Mr. W. then went into some explanation to show that he had not misunderstood or misrepresented the objects of the senator from South Carolina. If that gentleman should oppose the president's recommendation in regard to selling the public lands to actual settlers only, it would, in effect, be equivalent to voting to create a surplus. Mr. W. said he had no wish to alarm the manufacturing interest, toward which he entertained no hostility; but he would now tell that interest throughout this country that, if they wished to preserve the compromise bill, the mode was to prevent an exorbitant sale of the public lands. If this were permitted to continue, a surplus revenue could not be prevented without touching the compromise bill. Mr. W. had, on the last session, offered a resolution calling on the secretary of the treasury to ascertain and report to congress what reduction in the tariff and in the price of the public lands would be necessary to bring down the revenue to the wants of the government, but in such a manner as not to infringe on the compromise. The senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster), had moved to lay that resolution on the table; not because he was particularly hostile to it, but because he wished to press some other subject which was before the senate; and afterward there had been no opportunity to call it up. Mr. W. should not now depart from the spirit of that resolution. He had no wish to violate the compromise, but desired that the reduction should be in conformity with the 6th section of that bill (which he read).

The senate had been told by the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) that the faith of the nation stood pledged to preserve that bill inviolate. But that bill declared, in the most express terms, that the reduction of the revenue was not to be made by depositing it with the states—that was no feature of the compromise, but by a reduction of duties. He had ascertained that the reduction which his plan would effect would amount to three millions of dollars. Deduct this from the eight millions derived from the sale of the public lands to actual settlers, and it would leave five millions of dollars, being just the amount which the senator from South Carolina had thought it was proper to retain as an unexpended balance in the treasury. Mr. W. insisted on his motion for referring the bill to the committee on finance.

Mr. Calhoun rejoined and explained, with a view to show that the case of which the gentleman from Mississippi complained was not parallel to the present, and still insisted on the propriety of allowing him a special committee. If, however, the senate should resolve to send this bill to the committee on finance, he should not be at a loss to understand the movement. He had read the president's message attentively. It was an extraordinary document. He had read with no less care the report of the secretary of the treasury; that, too, was an extraordinary document. The perusal had suggested some suggestions to his mind; and should the present bill be seat to the finance committee, those suspicions would be fully confirmed. Such a measure would go far to convince him that the policy of the administration was agreed upon, and that it would be to make a demonstration on a reduction of the revenue, but, in fact, to leave that revenue in the deposit banks. The end of this session was not far off, and that would tell whether he were not correct in his opinion. He would now, in his turn, venture to become a prophet, and he would predict that, if the present motion succeeded, that very thing which the president in his message had most decidedly condemned would be the thing actually realized.—Notwithstanding the president's opposition to the collecting of the surplus revenue, and all he had said on its tendency to promote speculation and corrupt the public morals, that was the thing which would be done. He was sorry he did not see the senator from New York (Mr. Wright) in his place. On that gentleman, peculiarly, lays the obligation to provide for the reduction of the revenue. Mr. C. well knew the difficulty of touching this subject. He had himself had a full and sound trial of that operation. He knew the efforts by which the existing reduction had been effected, and he felt very sure that the senator from New York could not be sanguine in the expectation of effecting a reduction to any great amount. He had heard much said in private on that subject, and he could not but regret that the president, when alluding to it in his message, had not referred to the difficulties attending it. Mr. C. thought he saw how things were to go, and he thus openly announced what his conviction was. He believed nothing would be done to reduce the revenue; that the money would still be collected, and would be left, not where it ought to be found, in the treasuries of the states, but in the deposit banks.

If the finance committee would report an adequate reduction of the revenue, Mr. C. would consent to withdraw his bill. He should infinitely prefer a reduction to a distribution provided the thing could be done. In the meanwhile the south claimed the execution of the compromise bill; it had not only closed a long and painful controversy, but had enabled them to make some feeble stand against the progress of executive influence. He concluded by moving for a special committee.

Mr. Rives was in favor of referring the bill to the committee on finance, but as the senator from South Carolina considered the denial of a special committee as involving some want of courtesy, he would state the considerations which led him to the conclusion that that would be the proper committee.—The senator himself had said, but yesterday, that the committee on finance was the committee to whom the entire subject of the reduction of the revenue specially belonged. The senator had entered into a calculation to show that there would be a surplus in the treasury at the commencement of the year, and on this he grounded his bill. The question, therefore, at the root of the whole matter was, whether there would be such a surplus. This was a question which obviously pertained to the finance committee. The gentleman, relieving himself from every thing like a pledge to abide by the provisions of the compromise act, expressed his strong preference of a reduction of the revenue to its distribution; but the question whether it could safely be reduced certainly was a question coming within the range of the appropriate duties of that committee. Mr. R. reverted to the history of the compromise bill, and expressed his satisfaction at the reflection that he had rendered it his hearty support. He did not now recede, in the slightest degree, from the ground he had then occupied. But the senate was now in a different position: they were at the opening of a new session of congress, and were enabled from all the lights of past experience to look ahead with something like certainty. If they foresaw the probability of a surplus of revenue, they were bound to guard against it by attempting a reduction. That, beyond question, was the true policy. Mr. R. adverted to the prophecy by Mr. C. that the policy of the administration was to be a false and deceitful demonstration on reduction while none was to be made, and the money was to remain in the deposit banks. [Mr. Calhoun shook his head at the words false and deceitful.] Well, a demonstration, at all events, was to be made, and all that had been said by the president in his message against surplus revenue would turn out a delusion. [Mr. C. assented.] Yet the gentleman had, no longer than yesterday, expressed the highest satisfaction with the finance committee, and been lavish of his compliments on the gentlemen composing it, when the object was to refer this very measure of reduction to that committee. Did the gentleman mean nothing more than a demonstration? Had he not been in earnest? He hoped the gentleman had no such policy, nor could he suppose him to have.

Mr. Calhoun repelled the charge of inconsistency. He had been in favor of sending the subject of a reduction of the revenue to the committee on finance, because he considered the subject as appropriate to their specific duties; but he was opposed to sending this bill to that committee, because they were known to be adverse to its object. In one case he had gone on the great parliamentary principle that propositions were to be referred to committees favorable to the object proposed; and in the other case, he still had sent it to a committee at least not unfavorable to the measure. He was rejoiced to hear the honorable senator from Virginia declare so explicitly that he did not regret the course he had taken in reference to the compromise bill; he was confident the gentleman never would have reason to repent the able and honorable course he had pursued on that memorable occasion; and he trusted the gentleman would agree in sentiment with those who were opposed to leaving the public money in the deposit banks. Mr. C. had given many evidences of his desire that a reduction should be made in the revenue; and had, on a former occasion, sent a bill to the committee on manufactures for that object, which afterwards had passed the senate almost unanimously, and had been sent to the other house, after which it was never again heard of. He was not the man, however, to disturb the terms of the compromise, which had so happily been effected, unless it should be done by common consent. The south were prepared to assent to such a step, and if the north would also agree to it, there need be no difficulty in the case. The gentleman from Virginia seemed to suppose that, because it was the duty of the finance committee to consider the question whether there was likely to be a surplus revenue or not, therefore, this bill ought to be sent to them. The argument was too wide; on the same principle, every proposition which related to the application of any portion of the public resources must be sent to that committee. It would swallow up almost all the business of the senate. He concluded by demanding the yeas and nays on the question of commitment.

Mr. Rives briefly rejoined. As the senator from South Carolina was only conditionally in favor of the proposition in the bill, in the event that there would be a surplus, and that the revenue could not be reduced; and as the question whether it could be reduced belonged confessedly to the committee on finance, it involved no violation of the parliamentary principle to which the senator had alluded, to send this bill to that committee. Mr. R. hoped he should not be understood as wishing wantonly to interfere with the provisions of the compromise bill; he was far from desiring any such thing. He held the compromise in great respect, as having effected a great national good in the settlement of an agitating and alarming question. But he was free to say that, if any mode could be devised of bringing down the revenue to the wants of the government without interfering with the enactments of that bill, he should be opposed to disturbing them in any way. But it was a fundamental duty of legislation to dispense with all unnecessary taxes, and reduce the burdens of the people as far as the necessities of government would permit. If this could not be done, without touching some parts of the compromise bill, it must be touched; but if it could, then that bill, in all its provisions, ought to be sacredly maintained.

The question on Mr. Walker's motion to refer the bill to the committee on finance being now put, the vote stood as follows: yeas 22, nays 22. The yeas and nays being equal, the chair voted in the affirmative; and the bill was committed accordingly to the committee on finance.

[For the yeas and nays see page 270.]

THE DEPOSITE BANKS, &c.

From the National Gazette, of January 5.

It has occurred to us that the document published below (the authority of which is unquestionable) may throw some light on two or three objects of inquiry proposed in Mr. Garland's resolution. It is a circular letter addressed by R. M. Whitney to the officers of certain deposit banks, and pretty conclusively shows the close political connexion between that gentleman and the government, the nature of some of his duties, and the means by him deemed legitimate to effect the objects of his agency. In the debate of last Saturday, Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, said: [Here follows a quotation from Mr. T's speech.]

We are unable to predict how far all these topics of inquiry are likely to be elucidated by the labors of the committee; but if the honorable member will take the trouble to read this letter, he will probably be satisfied that the representation in the official message of the 6th of December, touching the onerous and unjust operation of the act of the preceding session upon the deposit banks, by which their action and accountability were defined, was suggested by the same spirit which on the 7th, was prompt to enforce the representation by a studied commentary upon it, directly addressed to those banks. He will also draw his own inferences touching the consistency of that administration whose various organs and ministers have never ceased to protest against the pernicious influence of a moneyed institution upon legislative freedom and integrity, when he sees a person from the very bosom of that administration officially dictating the repeal of an act of congress by means of the powerful impulses of a combination of banks upon the opinions of the members of the national legislature.

Should any curiosity be excited as to the authority upon which this communication is made public, it will be sufficient for us to suggest, that it may appear to some of the officers of the institutions to which it was addressed, that their agent has overstepped the line of his duty in forgetting the true objects of his appointment, and intruding against the continuance of a fair and legitimate regulation. Should such prove to be the case, we applaud their independence. If the surmise is unfounded, and Mr. Whitney's proceedings are unexceptionable, no injury can accrue to him. If, on the contrary, he has mistaken the limits of his office and his duty, the people will be enlightened, and the country benefited by a knowledge of the proceeding.

Washington, Dec. 7, 1836.

DEAR SIR: I should consider that I was remiss in discharging the duty which I owe to those banks which employ me to reside here to attend to their interests, were I to remain inactive on the present occasion. You will have seen that the president, in his annual message to congress of yesterday, in relation to the operation of the law of the last session of congress regulating the deposit banks, says it is believed that it "operates onerously and unjustly upon many of them in many respects." He justly recommends a modification of that law, so as to remove such operation.

I believe that few of the banks are aware what they are chargeable with under that law. I will explain: all sums, while in transitu, are chargeable with interest; for instance, a bank at New Orleans, which is required to transfer money to Boston, must pay interest upon it until it is placed at the credit of the treasurer at that place, although it may be money transferred to New Orleans from St. Louis on Natchez. This is not all; the New Orleans bank must pay interest upon this money while in its possession, although it derives no use of it, but is employed in making preparations to transmit it to the point ordered.

The same in cases where transfers are ordered from New York to North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia and Virginia.

This must certainly be pronounced an "unjust operation of the law."

What is considered an "onerous" part of the law, is the exaction of any interest at all. The bank of the United States never paid any interest on the public deposits, and for ten years prior to 1833 they averaged eight millions of dollars. That institution rendered no greater service than the deposit banks do to the government in performing the duties of disbursing agents.

The services rendered in the way of transferring the public money from one place to another by the deposit banks are nearly fourfold those rendered by the bank of the United States in any one year; and that too by a small number of the deposit banks.

It is believed that the greatest sum ever transferred by the bank of the United States in any one year was in 1832, amounting to $16,000,000. During the year ending the 1st of October, 1836, the transfers actually made and paid by the deposit banks amounted to $39,319,394, and the amount transferred and paid between the 1st of October and the 6th of November, was $5,399,000, and the amount of transfer warrants outstanding at that date was $14,450,000, making an aggregate of $59,168,394. This, I venture to say, is without a precedent in any commercial country. The transfers made by the bank of the United States were generally between the Atlantic cities, or from the east to the west, in all of which cases, if there was not a profit growing out of making them, they were not attended with loss; while millions of the transfers made by the deposit banks have been in an inverse direction, and have been attended by both a heavy loss and risk to the banks that have been called upon to make them.

It is a remarkable fact, which shows the ability of a small number of the state banks to perform all the fiscal duties of the government, that nearly all these transfers have been made by sixteen banks.

In the negotiation of the domestic exchanges, the ability of the deposit banks to grant all, and even greater, facilities to the community than were ever derived from the bank of the United States, is most fully demonstrated, and the contrast in the operations of a few of them, compared with those of the bank of the United States, is not less striking than that in the transfers of the public money made by the two. The domestic exchange transactions of the bank of the United States, and its twenty-five branches, were stated by Mr. Binney, in his speech in 1834, to be $225,617,910. This embraced some items which I do not consider to come legitimately within transactions which should be embraced under that head. By returns which have been received from nineteen of the deposit banks, their transactions for the year ending the 1st of October last, embracing the same items of their operations as those included in Mr. Binney's statement, amounted in the aggregate to $420,468,211. If the legitimate transactions of each only were stated, I believe the contrast would be still greater.

The important services rendered to the government, in the various duties devolving upon a small number of the deposit banks, as well as the facilities granted the community by an almost equally small number, are fully appreciated here; nor will it be overlooked by those whose characters were staked upon the success of the measure, the faithful manner in which the original deposit banks executed the duties which they were required to perform, and the aid which was derived from them in carrying out successfully the "experiment" of employing state banks as the fiscal agents of the government, in place of the bank of the United States, amidst an opposition and warfare to defeat it without a precedent in this country.

There is another fact which ought not to be forgotten: that, in the transfers of the public money and the domestic bill transactions performed by the bank of the United States, the whole was performed by one and the same institution, directed by the same head, while, in the case of the deposit banks, the whole has been performed by separate and distinct institutions, each of which has been obliged to rely on its own resources.

I know that, both here and elsewhere, those who feel a desire for the success of the "experiment" of employing state banks as fiscal agents, have always been opposed to the tax of interest required under the deposit bill, and will both encourage a relinquishment of any interest which may have accrued already, but also to repeal the operation of the act for the future.

The services to the government, and the facilities rendered the community, which I have already detailed, furnish strong grounds for such claim on the part of those banks which have performed them; but there are others which apply to nearly all—such as the aid given out carrying on the views of the administration in supplying a metallic currency under the acts of congress, and also, in many instances, in relinquishing a circulation of small notes, which was valuable to the bank, and substituting the precious metals in their place.

It is my intention to exert myself to have a substitute at the present session for the law of the last session, free of objections; and also to obtain a repeal of that part of the latter requiring the payment of interest by the deposit banks, both retrospectively and prospectively.

It will aid me much if the directors of the various banks to whom I send this will address letters to such members of each house as they may be acquainted with, impressing upon them the onerous duties which have been performed by the deposit banks, the injustice done many of them by the exaction of interest as the law is now construed, and the magnanimity which congress would display by a total relinquishment of interest altogether, both past and for the future.

Another argument might be employed, but it would be impolitic to make use of it with members, which is this: that as soon as the sum in the treasury comes to be reduced by the operation of the deposit law, the banks which will be continued will hardly find it an object to subject themselves to the expense of acting as fiscal agents, for the use of the small sum which each can have, even without paying any interest whatever. Before the close of next year, we must go back to as small a number of deposit banks as were employed prior to the passage of the deposit act; consequently, with but few exceptions, the newly selected banks will have to become as they were. All this part of the subject had better be promulgated here; it is my intention speedily to commence upon that subject, first, by enlightening congress in relation to the facts, of which I am sure most of the members are ignorant, and then to proceed to carry through my object; and I hope I may receive all the support possible from those immediately interested in the way I have pointed out.

I shall send this communication to very few of the banks not of the original selection, and I trust that all to whom I do send it will view it as one not to be made public, though not marked confidential.

Permit me to say that no time should be lost in adopting such measures as may be considered expedient.

I would add one further suggestion—that, in all cases where letters may be written upon this subject, a willingness be expressed to aid in future to the full extent of the ability of the bank, as far as circumstances will permit, the carrying out of the measure of substituting a metallic for a paper medium, within the limit fixed by the president (20 dollars).

I am, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,
R. M. WHITNEY.

P. S. I shall be happy to learn what steps are taken by those to whom this will be addressed, as well as to receive instructions from those whose agent I am.

To the editors of the Globe:

A circular letter, lately addressed by me to some of the deposit banks, and to but few that I am not in regular correspondence with, and employed by, has made its appearance in the public newspapers.

That letter contained the following injunction: "I trust that all to whom I do send it (the letter) will view it as one not to be made public, though not marked confidential."

It was under these circumstances the letter was written, and therefore less attention was paid to the phraseology than would have been, had it not have been a private and confidential communication.

Exceptions are taken, I learn, to some expressions employed in the letter, and very justly, too, if it can be supposed that I intended either the assumption of authority, or any thing disrespectful to congress, which the opposition presses are endeavoring to impress on the mind of the public that the language of the letter contains.

The facts which led to the communication in question are simply these. Shortly after the passage of the deposit law of the last session of congress, some of the banks wrote to me to ascertain and inform them of the construction that was given to different parts of it; that in relation to interest, which they are required under the law to pay, in particular. They were informed that such a construction was given to the law as would require them to pay interest on all sums under orders for transfer, while preparing to make such transfers, as well as while in transitu, and until placed at the credit of the treasurer by the bank to which the transfer might be ordered to be made. This appeared to them so unreasonable, that some of the most important of the deposit banks were seriously disposed to decline the agency of the government.

To these I wrote, and advised them not to give it up, but to continue to perform what was required of them, although onerous, until the meeting of congress. I also stated to them, that I felt confident that congress could not have foreseen the unjust operation of the law; and that I felt equally confident, when that body should be apprised of it, they would so modify the law as to give them relief for its past, as well as to remove its future continuance; and, as their agent, I stated that I would do all in my power to obtain this relief for them.

Accordingly, I suggested to the officers of the banks in my letter, the expediency of writing themselves to their friends and acquaintances in congress, pointing out to them the exaction which they are subject to, and soliciting them to aid in giving relief.

Many of the banks themselves remained, until very recently, entirely ignorant of the construction given to the law, or of what they would be chargeable with under it, and, as may be supposed, expressed some surprise when informed.

In regard to a diminution of the number of banks now employed, I have always understood that it would take place as soon as the surplus money is disposed of. That supposition has been confirmed by the suggestion contained in the report of the secretary of the treasury, that the head of that department be clothed with authority by congress to discontinue such as may be unnecessary. I have good reason for supposing that many of the banks lately selected consider that they are but temporarily employed.

These are the simple and plain facts concerning the origin and object of a private letter, which I feel confident has been obtained in a clandestine manner, and thrown before the public. Of such importance did the National Gazette man, in Philadelphia, view it to the nation, that its discovery and circulation was hastened, by being despatched in slips by the express mail.

R. M. WHITNEY.

January 9, 1837.

REPORT FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,

Transmitting statements of the transfers of public moneys, in obedience to a resolution of the senate of the 20th instant.

Treasury department, Dec. 26, 1836.

Hon. Martin Van Buren, president of the senate:

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report, in further compliance with a resolution of the senate, passed the 20th instant, directing "that the secretary of the treasury communicate to the senate a detailed statement of all transfers of public moneys ordered since the 23d of June last, for the purpose of executing the act of that date for regulating the deposits of the public money; showing the dates and amount of such transfers; from what place, to what place; from what bank, to what bank; and the times allowed for such transfers, respectively; also a similar statement of all transfers other than such as were made in execution of the aforesaid act."

From the manner of making transfers which has long prevailed in this department, the cause for making them does not appear on the face of the transfer draft, nor, in general, on any record.

The cause of any particular transfer is, therefore, usually known to no person except the secretary, who orders it; and, hence, such transfers as have been issued "since the 23d of June last, for the purpose of executing the act of that date for regulating the deposits of the public money," and which are called for in the first part of the resolution, cannot be discriminated from any others, called for in the last part of the resolution, and which may not have been made in execution of the aforesaid act, unless the secretary is able to do it, and from memory rather than the records.

In order, therefore, to avoid any mistakes as to the whole amount of transfers directed, from all causes whatever, within the period mentioned, the treasurer was, on the day the resolution reached me, required to prepare an exhibit of the whole since the 23d of June last, and to accompany it by the details desired in the resolution, as to the times of payment and the names of the bank to and from which they have been respectively ordered.

The whole amount of these transfers which have taken effect, or been paid, appears to be $20,129,385.

Those which have not taken effect, and are not payable, many of them till January, February, March and April of next year, equal $12,910,000; making the whole amount ordered $33,039,385.

To be able to decide, nearly as practicable, what portion of these have been directed "for the purpose of executing the deposit act," and what portion if any, for other objects, it will be necessary to advert to the following facts and explanations. The department supposes that they may all be construed by some as having been ordered for that purpose, because they were all issued under the authority of that act, and the supplement to it, passed July 4, 1836. But a portion of them having been issued with a view to facilitate disbursements, and make payments, at convenient points, of the appropriations by congress, may not in strictness, perhaps, be considered by others as ordered for the purpose of executing the act, and hence will, as far as practicable, be estimated by themselves. The amount of them, though not attainable with exactness, can by a few considerations, probably be separated and computed distinctly from the rest with sufficient certainty for any general object contemplated by the resolution.

Thus, the sum in the treasury subject to draft on the 23d of June 1836, was about $34,000,000. Of this amount about $6,200,000 were then under transfer to different places, and to take effect at future periods, for purposes of safety, and affording facility to future disbursements.

On the passage of the deposit law, however, and in execution of the first section of it, prohibiting any amount over three-fourths of the capital of any bank to be left in it any longer than was necessary to select new banks, and to complete the transfers proper for removing the excess, it became indispensable to transfer for that purpose alone, about $18,300,000. New transfers for this whole amount became necessary, except in a few cases where the transfers outstanding tended to accomplish that object, though in other cases they quite as much retarded it. The department, therefore, took immediate steps, even before the adjournment of congress, to comply with this direction of the law. But, it was at once perceived that, by the peculiar phraseology adopted in the deposite act, it was very doubtful whether any of these new transfers could be made to banks in other states than those where the money then was, unless done to facilitate the public disbursements, or unless suitable and sufficient banks to hold the excess could not be obtained in the latter states; and hence, that the transfers of any of it, for the purpose of beginning the equalization of the surplus among the different states, could not probably, in any case, however convenient, be carried on at the same time, or be commenced before the 1st of January next. These impressions were communicated by me in reply to several members of congress who inquired at the department on the subject and wished new banks selected, and transfers made under the new act, immediately from states where the public money had greatly accumulated beyond their proportion to other states where large deficiencies existed.

Accordingly, the form of a bill was, at their request, prepared, which might, if congress deemed it proper to legislate further on the subject, remove the supposed difficulty, and which, with some modifications, afterwards passed into a supplemental law, on the 4th of July last. Consequently, in any subsequent proceedings to accomplish those first transfers of $18,300,000, with a view to equalize the amount among different banks, in conformity to the first section of the deposite act, it was considered that congress, by the supplemental act, expressly intended to remove the doubts and objections before entertained to the course previously proposed, of combining with the division of the excesses among new banks, the commencement of the apportionment of the deposits among the different deficient states, preparatory to a gradual and easy payment to the states themselves the ensuing year.

In several cases, therefore, both objects or purposes, when convenient, were seasonably united, and with a mitigated and more beneficial effect, it is believed, on the whole administration of the law, and the condition of the money market generally, than if all the transfers to all the different states had been delayed till next year, and at that time have been ordered in much larger sums.

But as the payments were not required to be made into the state treasuries till the first of January next, and quarterly thereafter during the year, it will be seen by the exhibit that few or no separate transfers have yet been ordered for equalization among the states disunited with the other purpose of equalization among the banks, except such as were to take effect the next year, near the dates when the several payments are due to the states themselves, and none whatever have been ordered to remain permanently, except in cases where great excesses existed in some states, to be reduced, and deficiencies in others to be supplied, and where, if desired on account of greater convenience merely in point of time, they have not been postponed to 1837. The distinction between permanent and temporary transfers is adverted to in the above remarks, because, though that distinction does not, any more than the cause of the transfer, appear on its face, yet it often happens, as will be seen in the schedule B, that transfers are made from one place to another on account of its being more easy in the course of trade and exchange to have the money go to that other place in the first instance, temporarily, and afterwards be forwarded further by new transfers, and with greater public convenience, to the place where it is permanently to remain till expended.

If this be done sometimes, in the first step of its progress, without a rigid regard to deficiencies or excesses, in the bank or state receiving the money, yet, in the next and final step of transferring it to its ultimate destination, those are always strictly adhered to.

In several cases, also, where the transfers are at first, for the convenience of commerce, or other proper cause, ordered to banks in an amount beyond three-fourths of their capital, it will be seen that, before all the transfers take effect or become paid, other transfers are ordered from the receiving banks, so as to prevent them from holding permanently more than the amount prescribed in the law. But, besides the transfers of the $18,300,000, rendered imperative to equalize the money among the banks, there has been an accruing revenue since the deposite act passed, amounting to nearly $22,500,000, and most of which, being at first paid into the banks where an excess already existed, and hence not by law retainable there, has also been, necessarily, placed under transfer to some other banks, in compliance with the first section of the act of congress, except so far as while accumulating, the revenue, whether new or old, has in part been used to meet current expenditures at the places where collected.

In addition to all these removals of money, rendered indispensable under the 12th section of the act, and amounting in all to over forty millions of dollars, except the deduction of the current expenditures at those points, equaling perhaps one-third of the whole $17,500,000, which have been paid out on appropriations since last June, other transfers, to the amount of $700,000, authorised for the purpose of supplying the mint with metal for coining, as explained in my annual report, have, under the direction of the president and advice of the director, been made to promote the execution of that desirable object.

The result of the whole is, that the amount of transfers ordered to execute only these purposes would be about $30,666,666, or but seven to eight millions less than all the transfers ordered since the deposite act passed.

This residue is near the whole amount which has probably been required to be transferred for facilitating the public disbursements at other points, amounting, since June last, at those other points, it is presumed, to about $12,000,000 out of the whole.— This sum is only from one to two millions larger than the transfers outstanding for this and a similar purpose when the deposite act passed, and is less than the average amount required during the two years before the act passed, as well as while the United States bank was employed as the depository of the public money in the expenditure of a similar sum. This is the nearest approximation which can be made to the amount which has been transferred since June last, not strictly perhaps "for the purpose of executing the act," provided that the clause in it by which they are authorised be not so understood in connection with the resolution as that these transfers may be properly considered as made "for the purpose of executing the act."

The dates of the particular transfers which were made exclusively to aid disbursements, and the names of the banks from and to which they were made, cannot now be distinguished from the others, except by some general circumstances, which may be briefly indicated. They embrace a portion of all those transfers which have been made to places where the public money is disbursed to a large amount for any legitimate purpose, and especially in the deficient states. Besides, some of these transfers required in over one-half of the states of the union, the largest amounts rendered necessary to meet appropriations since the 22d of June last have been to New Hampshire, chiefly for the navy yard and pensions; to the District of Columbia, for various great public expenditures of almost every description: to Norfolk, Virginia, very large sums for the navy yard and fort near that place; to Charleston, South Carolina, and Savannah and Augusta, Georgia, as well as to New Orleans; for the prosecution of Indian hostilities and disbursements anticipated on our south western frontier, and to Tennessee, as well as the other places last named, a sufficiency to meet heavy payments connected with the removal of the Cherokees, Creeks and Seminoles beyond the Mississippi.

The explanation of both branches of the last resolution, and of the tabular statements referred to, in answer to the call of the senate, might here be closed, had not the treasurer prepared the schedule of transfers in a form only chronological, when it might be desirable to some members to have the results presented in their connection with the situation of the different states as bearing on the amount of deposits of public money within each as well before these transfers began, in June last, as at the date of this inquiry, and both of these as compared with the proportion of deposits which the states will respectively be entitled to receive under the act. An exhibit has, therefore, been added, which gives in round numbers the proportion each state would be entitled to receive from a distribution of deposits amounting to $37,000,000; and in other columns the amount on deposit in each state subject to draft about the time the act passed, and also at the present time.

By this document, and those on the subject of the deposite banks, submitted to the senate with my last annual report, and connected with the present call, it will be seen that sufficient transfers have already been issued, though all have not yet become payable, to execute the 1st section of the act, prohibiting more money to remain in any bank than three-fourths the amount of the capital. It deserves notice, however, that the revenue has increased over our expenditures during the last six months constantly, and in such large amounts, as to keep up to the present moment, and imperatively requires almost weekly transfers and weekly selections of new banks, in order to comply with the above direction of the deposite law. But the utmost care has been exercised, while endeavoring to enforce the spirit of the law on this point, to take every precaution to prevent, as far as practicable, any unnecessary derangement or pressure in the money market, by affording reasonable time for all those transfers to be effected, varying the notice given by this department to all the parties concerned, generally according to the amount and distance, from thirty to one hundred and twenty days, and in several cases to a longer period, so as to enable the banks easily to remove the money by bills of exchange, drafts, bank balances and other satisfactory remittances, and by allowing the payment to be made, as has always been usual, at the places to which the money is to be transferred, unless the bank making the transfers prefers to pay them at its own counter.

But it will be seen, at the same time, that while all has thus been accomplished which was deemed necessary to execute the purpose of the 1st section of the deposite act, dividing the excesses among different banks, and to aid the operations of the mint under the 18th section, and to facilitate our very large disbursements the last half year, and for a few months to come, at the necessary points, yet the other and last process of transfers for the apportionment of the deposits among the states in the prescribed proportions, so as to be gradually and seasonably ready for payment to each state the next month, and quarterly thereafter during the year, has made but little progress since June, by means of transfers to the several states then deficient, and has not been thus completed in a single case, unless the state of Ohio be considered an exception. Her contiguity to other states which had not banking capital sufficient to hold the great accumulation in them, has required the department, under the act, in order to execute the 1st section alone, to place enough within her limits by transfers from only the neighboring states, to supply, with the aid of collections there, any deficiency before existing, and all the current expenses of the government, with some excess for transmission elsewhere.

Very unequal sums have been placed in some states from the same unequal cause; a cause not within the control of this department, but yielded to under the express directions of the deposite act. It deserves notice under this head, that of the other states which were deficient last June, being as appears by the table C, seventeen in number, all except Indiana still remain deficient, in sums ranging from $150,000 to $1,600,000 each, and requiring in the whole, to produce an equality, nearly $11,000,000 more to be paid from other states, besides about two-thirds of the five millions to be reserved next month to defray current expenditures. Indiana has since been filled up and now has an excess of more than a million, derived from the large sales of land within her limits, and not from transfers.

On the other hand, all of the states which last June had an excess, still retain one, except Maryland, which has now only about her just proportion. In all of them, likewise, with a single exception, those excesses, instead of being much diminished by large transfers to a distance, or payments at home beyond the accruing revenue within their limits, have been all increased, and in several cases in such great amounts as to range from a third of a million to two millions higher than they did in June. That exception is New York; but which, at the same time, has been diminished only about $400,000, and still retains an excess beyond her proportion, and mostly in her commercial capital, of over six and one-fourth millions of dollars.

If, looking to the whole amount in the treasury when the deposite act passed, and to the proportions then on deposit within the several states, and to the proportions of it they were then entitled to receive, on the principles of the two acts, provided all excesses had then at once been reduced and all deficiencies supplied, it will be seen that they did not then vary over one and a half millions from what is still to be accomplished in the present state of things; and consequently, that, during the six months which have since elapsed, the operation of equalization among the states has not been begun or consummated; because not found easy and convenient, while carrying on the other imperative operations under the law, beyond the small extent of less than two millions of dollars.

But, however difficult the apportionment among the states must be when it all goes into final effect, merely from the collection and paying over such immense sums into new hands, and however widely and with what embarrassment some of the money must, in the end, depart from the usual channels of commerce and of our fiscal operations, the directions of the act in this respect, as stated in my annual report, could not, with propriety, be neglected by the department, and are in the course of completion at the proper periods within the ensuing year.

Thus, among the transfers already ordered, but not to take effect till 1837, it will be seen, by the table annexed, (B,) that a portion of them will in a few months somewhat reduce these excesses, and a portion of the existing deficiencies will, by the same transfers, be further filled up or supplied.—But considerable parts of the excesses in several states, after leaving a due proportion of the five millions continuing in the treasury to meet the current expenditures there, are now so situated that they will not be actually put under transfer till the beginning of each quarter in 1837, and will then in general be made directly to the agent of the state to which they now are, or can, by law, hold them till wanted for the several state treasuries. Care, however, will be taken to give a suitable general notice of the time and place of all these subsequent transfers, as has been done concerning the preceding ones. Indeed, as long ago as the 1st of last November, the department addressed a circular to almost every deposit bank, notifying it of the probable amounts, times and places, of all future transfers or payments which were expected to be made from it to the several states in the course of the ensuing year.

These banks will thus enjoy a longer time than usual to make preparations for completing most of these last transfers to the states themselves, by having 60 days notice in all cases, and in others an additional time of three, six and nine months.

The necessity for further explanations upon this subject is not perceived, except to remark that, in all cases where the amount transferred was not required for expenditure, the transfers which were made exclusively for division of the money among the banks have been arranged to the nearest practicable and convenient points where public money was either collected or disbursed, and banks could be selected agreeably to the provisions of the law under which they were ordered. The practice, which had heretofore prevailed, of transferring chiefly from one great section of the country to another, according to the course of the commercial operations between them, was prohibited by the 12th section of that law, except for the purpose of facilitating expenditures, or except, as under the supplemental act, it has in few cases, and may hereafter in many, become necessary and permissible in transfers made either principally or wholly with a view to begin to execute in some cases, and in others to complete, the execution of that part of the law apportioning the deposits in ratable proportions among the different states. When attempting either of those objects, independent of the others, the former practice has been strictly adhered to, and the whole operations under the act has been rendered as easy as possible to the banks making the transfers, and as little inconvenient or injurious to the money market and the commercial community as was practicable without departing from the express enactments of congress.

Respectfully yours, LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the treasury.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS,

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

January 6. A message of an executive character was received from the president of the United States, through Andrew Jackson, jr. his private secretary.

Mr. White presented a petition relating to alleged violations of the tariff, which was referred.

Mr. Buchanan presented the petition of a number of citizens of Philadelphia, praying appropriations for a court house for the United States district court, and also for a penitentiary. Mr. B. remarked that he believed the Pennsylvania penitentiary system had been carried to perfection; and as it would be necessary for the United States to have something of the kind, it appeared to him no more than suitable that they should commence in Philadelphia. He moved to refer the petition to the judiciary committee, and hoped they would give it due attention.

Mr. Calhoun had no objection to the reference, but hoped the judiciary committee would pause long before commencing a penitentiary system for the United States.

Mr. Grundy said he should not object to the reference to the committee; but he imagined the committee had no reason to pause long on the subject. They would be ready in a short time to report on the whole subject.

Mr. Buchanan said he was sorry to find that the chairman of the judiciary committee had already made up his mind on this subject. It appeared to him that it would be necessary for the United States to erect penitentiaries, and that it could not be avoided. As long as the United States had to inflict penalties for violations of the laws of the country, some system of punishment must be provided. He thought a system of this kind could in no way be dangerous, and could not infringe on the rights of the states. He did not expect the least opposition to the proposal, or, perhaps, he would not have made it.

The petition was then referred.

Mr. Clay presented the petition of John McLane, of Virginia, praying the passage of a general law in relation to unsurveyed islands, under twenty acres, belonging to the United States. Referred.

On motion of Mr. Linn, it was Resolved, That the chair appoint a member of the committee on private land claims, in the place of Mr. Porter, resigned.

Mr. Nicholas from the committee on naval affairs, reported several bills, which were ordered to a second reading, and will be noticed in their progress.

The following resolution was offered by Mr. Calhoun, and adopted:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to report to the senate, as early as practicable, the undrawn appropriations on the 1st day of January instant, with the date of the acts making such appropriations.

On motion of Mr. Clay, (Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, having been called home by sickness in his family), the senate proceeded to the further consideration of the joint resolution repealing the treasury order of July last, &c. The question being on the substitute offered by Mr. Rives, for refusing by the United States the paper of such banks as should issue bills under certain specified denominations.

Mr. Southard addressed the senate on the subject at large, in continuation and conclusion of his former remarks on the subject.

On motion of Mr. Wright, when Mr. Southard had concluded his remarks, this subject and all the other previous orders were postponed, and the senate proceeded to consider, as in committee of the whole, the bill from the house of representatives supplementary to the act for establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States.

The amendment proposed by the committee on finance, extending the limit of wastage allowed to the chief coiner from one-thousandth part to one and a half one-thousandth part, was adopted, and the bill so amended was reported to the senate.

Mr. Wright entered into various explanatory details, showing some small changes contemplated by the bill. After which the bill was ordered to lie upon the table; but subsequently was taken up and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, the previous orders were postponed, and the bill granting five years' full pay to captain Samuel Warren, of the revolution, was considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. Grundy, the senate spent a short time in executive business.

On motion of Mr. Robbins, the report of the navy commissioners on an examination of Narragansett bay, with a view to the establishment of a naval depot, was ordered to be printed.

The following resolution was offered by Mr. Tip-ton, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee on public lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a surveyor general's office in the state of Indiana.

The senate then adjourned till Monday.

January 9. The chair presented the credentials of hon. Samuel Prentiss, re-elected senator for six additional years, from the state of Vermont.

Also, the credentials of hon. William C. Preston, re-elected senator from the state of South Carolina.

The chair presented a communication from the state department, with a report of the names of the clerks employed in that department, and of the amount of their compensation during the past year.

Also, a communication from the war department, with the report of the second auditor, showing the amount of expenditures, &c. in the military establishment of the United States.

A number of petitions were presented and appropriately referred.

Mr. Walker from the committee on the public lands, reported with an amendment, which was read, the bill extending the time of issuing scrip for United States military land warrants.

Also, with an amendment, the bill authorising the relinquishment of the 16th sections of lands, for the use of schools, and the entry of other lands in lieu thereof.

Mr. Ruggles, from the special committee appointed on the late conflagration of the patent office, to consider on the best method of repairing the loss, reported a bill for that purpose; which was read; ordered to a second reading, and 2,000 extra copies of the report and documents ordered to be printed.

A number of resolutions of inquiry, which, by rule, lie over, were presented, and will be noticed when acted on.

The bill supplementary to the act for establishing the mint and regulating the coin of the United States, was read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Clay, the previous orders were postponed, and the senate proceeded to the further consideration of the joint resolution rescinding the treasury order of July, 1836.

The question being on Mr. Rives' substitute, Mr. Strange addressed the senate on the subject generally. Mr. Webster followed Mr. Strange in a few remarks, explanatory of his opinions relating to this subject, expressed in 1816, which had been several times referred to, and he maintained their entire consistency with his opinions on the subject at the present time. Mr. Rives having obtained the floor for to-morrow,

On motion of Mr. Grundy, the senate spent some time in executive business, and then adjourned.

January 10. A message was received from the president of the United States in regard to a communication by canal or rail road between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, in the vicinity of the Isthmus of Panama, intimating the inexpediency of any action at present by the United States.

The chair presented a communication from the treasury department, with a statement of the names, condition and dates of contract, of two deposit banks recently selected.

A number of petitions were presented and referred, and several reports received from committees, when Messrs. Fulton and Bayard offered resolutions of inquiry, which will be noticed in their progress.

The house bill for the relief of Orange H. Dibble, was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The house bill for the relief of Robert P. Letcher and Thomas P. Moore, was read twice and referred.

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, the bill providing compensation for the loss of horses and other property in the military service of the United States, was taken up, amended as proposed by the committee, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the bill making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and others pensioners, for 1837, was taken up, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate proceeded to the further consideration of the joint resolution to rescind the treasury order of July, 1836, &c. together with the substitute offered therefor by Mr. Rives.

Mr. Rives spoke at large on the subject of the resolution and the amendment. After whom,

Mr. Clay rose and said that he desired to submit to the senate a few considerations on the subject under debate; but as the hour was somewhat late, the senate might prefer that he deferred what he had to say till to-morrow, and proceed for the remainder of to-day to some other business; whereupon,

On motion of Mr. Brown, the senate adjourned.

January 11. Mr. Kent presented the credentials of John S. Spence, elected by the legislature of Maryland a senator from that state to fill the place vacated by the death of the honorable R. H. Goldsborough till the 4th of March next.

After the reception and disposition of sundry reports and petitions, the chair presented a communication from the treasury department, with the returns made to that department by the incorporated banks of the District of Columbia for 1836.

The following resolutions were offered and by rule lie over one day.

By Mr. Walker—Resolved, That the state of Texas, having established and maintained an independent government, capable of performing those duties, foreign and domestic, which appertain to independent governments, and it appearing that there is no longer any reasonable prospect of the successful prosecution of the war by Mexico against said state, it is expedient and proper, and in conformity with the laws of nations, and the practice of this government in like cases, that the independent political existence of said state be acknowledged by the government of the United States.

(Mr. W. accompanied his resolution with a few remarks, urging the consistency of the resolution with the president's message on this subject, and stating that he had this morning received information that the attempted invasion of Texas by Mexico had utterly failed; the invading army had been broken up, and the small remnant were destitute of arms, ammunition, and subsistence.)

By Mr. Davis—Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making some provision for the nautical education of American seamen.

By Mr. Tomlinson—Resolved, That the committee on pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing the office of commissioner of pensions for a limited period.

The bill for the relief of Orange H. Dibble was read second time, and referred.

The bill providing compensation for horses and other property lost in the military service of the United States, was read a third time and passed.

Also, the bill making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensioners for the year 1837.

The senate proceeded to the special order, the further consideration of the joint resolution rescinding the treasury order of July, 1836, &c. together with the amendment or substitute thereto offered by Mr. Rives.

Mr. Clay addressed the senate on the subject generally. Mr. Ruggles made a few remarks in reply to Mr. Clay, to which Mr. Clay briefly responded.

Mr. Niles moved to refer the whole subject to the committee on public lands, and, in connexion with some desultory remarks, urged the great and growing importance of the subject, as demanding such a reference.

Mr. Calhoun briefly characterized the treasury order as unconstitutional, without law, without precedent, without any authority whatever. Its temporary character, under which refuge had recently been taken, was no where to be seen; on the contrary, it still continued in force, when the executive himself ought to have repealed it, if it had been temporary. If it should be now referred, he could see no reason for referring it to the committee on public lands. It partook wholly of a financial character, and its proper reference was, therefore, to the committee on finance. Mr. C. said he depended on the action of that committee whether there should be a recurrence of that state of things in the ensuing year as well as the past, which had been used as a pretext for the treasury order. That state of things, he urged, depended entirely on an accumulation of the surplus in the deposit banks, where it would not remain for nothing, but would be employed, as it had been, in speculating on the public lands. To the committee on finance he also looked for a reduction of duties, if that should be adopted as a preventive. The whole subject properly belonged to that committee, to which Mr. C. would move to refer it, if the motion of Mr. Niles should fail.

Mr. Black opposed the reference. Much time had already been consumed in debating all the questions immediately involved, and all having any relation to it. It was time for action. He was prepared to vote. He had no hesitation in saying that he considered the treasury order illegal and highly impolitic. It was a question in which his constituents were deeply interested, laboring, as they were, under the embarrassments arising from this executive law or order. It had been intimated by the senator from Connecticut (Mr. Niles) that this measure was to be delayed by the committee to see the result of other measures. Deeming, therefore, prompt action necessary to relieve the people of the state he in part represented, and considering this motion for reference one of delay, he asked the privilege of recording his vote against it, and asked the yeas and nays. He was for action.

Mr. Clay said he concurred entirely with the senator from Mississippi. All the propositions before the senate were simple, and easily understood. He hoped the subject would not be referred at all.

Mr. Tipton also opposed any reference. Half the session was now nearly gone, and the subject had been well debated. He deemed it very important to his constituents and the community that all doubt on this subject should be removed as soon as possible.

Mr. Webster briefly urged that, if a reference should be made at all, it ought to be made to the committee on finance.

The question was then taken on Mr. Niles's motion, and decided as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Moore, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Sevier, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster—19.

So the whole subject of the treasury order, of July, 1836, was referred to the committee on public lands.

After a short executive session, the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Jan. 6. The speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting a statement in obedience to the act fixing the compensation of the public ministers and of consuls residing on the coast of Barbary, and for other purposes, approved May, 1810; which communication was referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

The speaker also laid before the house a communication from the secretary of state, transmitting a report respecting the clerks employed in that department during the past year, and the amount of compensation paid to each; which communication was laid on the table.

Mr. Boon, from the committee on public lands, reported a bill to arrest monopolies of the public lands, and to prohibit the sales thereof except to actual settlers; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. Thomas, from the committee on the judiciary, reported a bill to admit Michigan into the union; which bill was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Gillett, from the committee on commerce, offered a resolution for the reprinting of sundry documents in relation to the reorganization of the treasury department, and the number, compensation of custom-house officers, &c. &c. and for the printing of certain manuscript documents thereto appended.

This resolution gave rise to a desultory debate, the result of which was, that the manuscript documents alone were ordered to be printed. The house then proceeded to the consideration of private bills, and after the resolution for the settlement of the accounts of Orange H. Dibble had been read and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, the bill for the relief of Rubert Letcher and Thomas P. Moore, came up on its final passage.

Mr. Lane called for the yeas and nays on that question. Mr. Underwood moved the recommitment of the bill to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union. After a few words from Messrs. Huntsman and Lane, Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, called for the yeas and nays on the question of recommitment. After a few remarks from Mr. Mann, of New York, Mr. Anthony called for the previous question. Mr. Rencher moved to lay the bill on the table, and called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, were—Yeas 35, nays 157. So the motion to lay the bill on the table was lost.

The question then recurring on seconding the previous question, the house seconded the same—Ayes 83, noes 46. Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, called for the yeas and nays on the question of taking the main question; but the house refused to order them. And the main question was ordered to be now put. Mr. Williams, of N. C. called for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered. And the main question, "Shall the bill pass?" was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—Yeas 126, nays 64. So the bill was passed.

Several other private bills were considered, but without passing finally upon them, the house adjourned.

Saturday, Jan. 7. The hon. Mr. Gholson, member from the state of Mississippi, appeared, was qualified and took his seat.

A number of reports from the committee on invalid and the committee on revolutionary pensions, were severally read and laid on the table. Mr. Storer from the last named committee made an unfavorable report on the petition of John Whitman, of Eastbridge, in the state of Massachusetts, for a pension, for services performed in the revolutionary war.

Mr. S. moved that the report be referred back to the said committee, with instructions to report a bill granting the prayer of the said petition.

Mr. S. said he had but a few words to say in support of his motion. The petitioner was a man of the age of one hundred and two years, and he asked a pension as a revolutionary soldier. The committee had refused the pension because there was not positive evidence that the petitioner had served six months, as required by the law of 1802. He had proved five months' service, and his own affidavit deposed to a service of six weeks longer, making more than the period of six months. He had received a commission as a lieutenant from the continental congress, dated March 20, 1776; and he was known to be a man of unquestionable veracity.—Under these circumstances, the majority of the committee thought he had established his claim to a pension. The only question was, whether the one month's service had been sufficiently proved. The probability was that no similar case would again be brought before the consideration of congress.

The motion of Mr. Storer was opposed by Messrs. Harper, Wardwell, Rencher and Pearce, of Rhode Island, on the ground that the petitioner's claim was opposed to the provisions of the bill on the subject; and advocated by Messrs. Granger and Storer as a case in which those provisions might properly be overlooked. Finally Mr. Rencher moved to lay the report and accompanying documents on the table; which motion was rejected. Mr. Storer then withdrew his motion to re-commit, with instructions; and Mr. Reed moved to commit the report and documents to the committee of the whole house. The motion prevailed; and the report and documents were committed accordingly.

Mr. Bell gave notice that he would, on Tuesday next, ask leave to introduce a bill to secure the freedom of elections.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. C. Allan:

Be it resolved, That a select committee of one member from each state be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the justice and expediency of making to each of the thirteen original American states, together with each of the states of Vermont, Maine, Kentucky and Tennessee, such grants of the public lands, for the purposes of education, as will correspond in a just proportion with those heretofore made in favor of the first-named states and territories, and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise. But, to avoid the objection of one state holding land in another, the committee is directed to insert a clause in the bill which they may report, providing that the grants to be made thereby, shall be subject to sale under the laws of the general government now in force, and that the proceeds arising therefrom shall be paid over to the states entitled to the same.

To which resolution Mr. Finton heretofore offered the following amendment:

Resolved, That the said inquiry extend to all the states, and that the said committee be further instructed to inquire into the expediency of inserting a clause in said bill to pay said new states the value of the improvements made by them on the public lands, or to pay to them the amount the public lands would have been assessed for taxes, if they had been private property.

Mr. Johnson, of Louisiana, heretofore moved to amend the resolution, "by extending its provisions to all the states of the union."

To which amendment Mr. Claiborne, of Mississippi, heretofore offered the following amendment:

"And provided that no such grants shall interfere with, or be located upon the claim or improvement of any actual settler on the public lands."

Mr. Lane, who was entitled to the floor, having risen to address the house, Mr. C. Allan requested the gentleman from Indiana to yield the floor for a moment, to enable him to offer a modification of the first part of the preamble thereto, by substituting the word "grants," for "donations."

Mr. Lane having declined yielding the floor, the speaker said the modification could not now be made.

Mr. L. then proceeded to address the house at length in opposition to the resolution. He denied the truth of the assumption that the lands were ceded as a donation; and contended that they were grants made upon contract, and for which, not a nominal, but a full, fair and bona fide consideration had been paid by the states, by the surrender of the right of taxing the public domain, and by the construction of works of improvement, which had enhanced, to a vast extent, the value of the public domain in the several states in which it was situated.

Mr. L. had not concluded his remarks when, the hour having elapsed, Mr. E. Whittlesey called for the orders of the day.

Mr. Yell, by consent, offered an amendment to the above resolution, in order that the same might be printed.

And, on motion of Mr. Y. the resolution, with all the pending amendments, were ordered to be printed together.

The house refused to suspend the rule to permit Mr. Thompson to offer a resolution directing the committee on the militia to inquire into the expediency of publishing gen. Macomb's and major Cooper's works on tactics; and a resolution directing the committee on military affairs to cause an examination to be made by a board of officers of certain improvements in fire arms by Cochran, Hall, &c. &c.

Mr. Thomas asked the house at this time to take up, on its first and second reading, the bill from the senate, now on the speaker's table, entitled "An act to admit the state of Michigan into the union, on an equal footing with the original states." Objections having been made, Mr. Vanderpoel moved to suspend the rule for the purpose of taking up, on their first and second reading, the bills from the senate now on the speaker's table; which motion prevailed—Ayes 119, noes 2. So the rule was suspended.

The above mentioned bill having been read twice, Mr. Thomas said he was instructed by the committee on the judiciary to move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Tuesday next, and that it be made the special order of the day, after one o'clock, for that day and each succeeding day, at the same hour, (Friday and Saturday excepted), until finally disposed of. Mr. T. was proceeding to state that there was a difference of opinion among the members of the judiciary committee as to the mode of action which the house would adopt.

The speaker said the motion could not be debated.

Mr. Robertson moved to commit the bill to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

Mr. Hardin was understood to suggest that commitment was indispensable, inasmuch as the clause in the bill in relation to the surplus revenue was tantamount to an appropriation. And the question on the motion of Mr. Thomas was thereupon taken, and decided in the negative—Yeas 99, nays 71. So the motion to postpone and make the bill the special order was rejected. The question recurring on the motion of Mr. Robertson.

Mr. Thomas moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Tuesday next. Mr. Robertson, in support of his motion to commit, said that, in substance, if not in terms, the bill contained an appropriation which, in itself, was a sufficient ground to desire its commitment. If ever a bill had come before the house which ought to go to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, that bill was the present.

And the question on the motion of Mr. Thomas (the same having priority over a motion to commit) was taken, and decided in the affirmative—Yeas 95, nays not counted. So the further consideration of the bill was postponed until Tuesday next.

Mr. Jenifer made an ineffectual motion to suspend the rule, to enable him to offer a resolution calling on the department for certain information in relation to the exports of tobacco.

Some other business was transacted, an account of which will be given hereafter; after which, the house adjourned.

Monday, Jan. 9. On motion of Mr. Adams, Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested, if, in his judgment, not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this house copies of the correspondence with the department of state and with the Peruvian government, of the late Wm. Tudor, jr., consul of the United States, and their political agent in Peru, from the 27th of March, 1824, to the 15th of May, 1827. Also, the correspondence of the said William Tudor with the department of state, and with the government of Brazil, while he was charge d'affaires of the United States at Rio de Janeiro, until his decease.

Petitions and memorials were called for in the order of states and territories, and were presented by Messrs. Evans and Jarvis, of Maine; and Messrs. Jackson, Borden and Adams, of Massachusetts.

Mr. Adams rose, and said he was desirous to make the general inquiry, whether any member of the house was charged with a petition from the authors of Great Britain to the congress of the United States. If any gentleman was charged with such a petition, he (Mr. A.) had nothing further to state; he did not know but that the chairman of the committee of ways and means (Mr. Cambreleng) had such a petition in his hands.

Mr. A. explained that his reason for making the inquiry, was that he had received a letter from a respectable person in England, Miss Harriet Martineau, enclosing a printed address or petition from certain authors of Great Britain to the congress of the United States, and although the request was very distinct that he would favor the object of the petition, yet no positive request was made that he would present it. As the petition was merely a printed paper without any signature, he did not feel himself at liberty to present it, if, as he presumed, there was in the possession of any other member of the house, who would present it, a petition regularly signed.

Mr. Cambreleng said he had no such paper in his possession.

And as it did not appear that any other member was charged with the presentation of the same, Mr. A. said he would wait another week or two; and if a formal petition should be presented by that time, he would present the one which had been forwarded to him.

Mr. Adams offered to present the petition of one hundred and fifty women, whom he stated to be the wives and daughters of his immediate constituents, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and moved that the petition be read.

Mr. Glascock objected to its reception.

Mr. Adams said that, in reference to the reception of the petition, he did not know that he had any observations to make, except that he considered that the obligation rested on the house to receive this petition, and he felt himself bound by his duty to present it.

Mr. Boon rose to a question of order. He would inquire whether, under the rule, a petition could be debated on the day of its presentation?

The speaker said that, under a decision made at the last session of congress, and which had been sanctioned by a large majority of the house, the question of "reception" was not included in the 45th rule, and that therefore it was debateable at the time the petition was presented.

Mr. Adams said he had not expected that any objection would have been made to the reception of this petition; inasmuch as one portion of a similar character, presented by himself, had already been received. At the last session of congress, after much consideration and debate, it had been decided as formally as any thing could be, that petitions of this description should be received; and the house had made a special order as to the manner in which they should be treated after they had been received. He considered that that precedent was good, at least so far as that the petition should be received. The decisions of the house at the last session of congress went quite far enough towards suppressing the right of petition in the citizens; and quite far enough towards the suppression of the freedom of speech in this house. It was proposed now to go one step further; the motion of the gentleman from Georgia went to settle the question, that a petition so interesting and important as the one under discussion could not be presented and should not be received—a proposition directly in the face of the constitution itself. Now, he hoped that the people of this country would be spared the mortification and the injustice and the wrong which would be inflicted upon them by their immediate representatives, by a decision that such petitions should not be received.

No such example had been given. It was, indeed, true that all discussion, all freedom of speech, all freedom of the press, on this subject, had, within the last twelve months, been violently assailed; and assailed, too, in every form in which the liberties of the people could be assailed. This was the truth. He had lamented the decisions and determination of the house at the last session of congress, even so far as they went. He considered them as outrages on the constitution of the country and on the freedom of the people. The present proposition proposed to go one step further. He hoped that step would not be taken, and that it would not receive the sanction of that house. It was always in the power of the house to reject petitions, after they had been considered; and the house, by a large and overwhelming majority, had given evidence enough to the country that they had no disposition to favor petitions of this character; that they were ready, too ready, to state their views, against such petitions, and to reject the prayer of them. Amongst the outrages that would be endured by that portion of the people of this country whose aspirations were raised to the greatest improvement that could possibly be effected in the condition of the human race—the total abolition of slavery on earth—that of calumny was one of the most glaring. Their petitions were not only to be treated with contempt as at the last session of congress, but the petitioners themselves were to be loaded with foul and infamous imputations, poured upon a class of citizens as pure and as virtuous as the inhabitants of any section of the union. Such, he had no doubt, were the petitioners whose names were appended to the present petition. They were females. To men animated by that sentiment which does honor to human nature, this fact alone, in his opinion, was a recommendation for the reception of the petition.

He had said that the petition was signed by one hundred and fifty females; the wives and daughters of his immediate constituents. They were, many of them, sisters and mothers of his constituents.—Every member of the house, said Mr. A. has, or had, a mother; and he appealed to the feelings of every member to say whether, in the whole class of human affections, there was one sentiment more honorable, or more divested of earthly alloy, than that which every man must entertain for his mother. Let him put a case, and suppose that the own mother of any member of the house was one of the petitioners. He (Mr. A.) would ask that member whether he would reject and turn the petition out of doors, and say that he would not even hear it read? The petition was perfectly respectful in its terms and language; it consisted of nothing more than four or five lines, which could be read in half a minute. What! said Mr. A. do I speak to men? and do they say that they will not even listen to a petition coming from such a source? What had he, or this house, to fear from female petitioners? Were insurrection, and bloodshed, and slaughter to be apprehended from the petition of women? There was no such disposition; there was nothing of an inflammatory character or tendency contained in the petition itself. He hoped that the gentleman who had objected to its reception would withdraw his objection. He hoped so, for the sake of that gentleman's character as a man; for the sake of his character as a son; and he hoped that no senseless or cowardly influence would deter that gentleman from doing justice to these females, so far as to allow the petition to be received without objection.

Mr. Glascock said it was well known what position he had taken on this question during the last session of congress; and if, on the present occasion, he were to accede to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which, however, he had no disposition to do, it would be inconsistent with, and an entire abandonment of, the principle which, at that time, he and those acting with him had assumed. In reference to the female petitioners, to whom the gentleman had so eloquently alluded, he would say that no man would show or pay higher regard to a petition coming from such a quarter, on a proper subject, than he (Mr. G.) would show.—But, from the course pursued, and the scenes presented at the last session, and from indications at present, it was time that all those members of the house, who believed they had the constitutional right to reject these petitions, should now exercise that privilege which they conceived to be secured to them by the constitution, and to have their votes recorded against petitions of this character.

If this were a new subject, upon which the sense of this house had never been taken, and a petition, emanating from such a source, had been presented, he would have responded to it as promptly as any member on the floor. But did not the gentleman from Massachusetts know that, even if the petition had been received, it would, by the almost unanimous vote of the house, without being read, and without action of any kind being had upon it, be laid upon the table, where, as the gentleman himself had once said, it would sleep "in the tomb of all the Capulets." It was indeed true that the petition had emanated from wives, and mothers, and daughters; but he must say that he doubted very much whether all petitions of this nature were not presented for effect of some kind or other, and that these females were improperly influenced by men in the community in which they resided. The gentleman had said that those who had mothers and daughters ought to pay some regard to this petition, otherwise it would be to treat them, as it were, with disrespect. If he (Mr. G.) were situated as was the gentleman from Massachusetts, had seen the many votes which had been taken on this subject, and been a witness to the excitement which had been produced by means of similar applications, his (Mr. G.'s) language to a mother and a daughter would have been very different from the language of that gentleman. He (Mr. G.) would have told them that their petition might be just and right, according to the views of those by whom they were immediately surrounded, yet that they ought not to raise their voices at this time; that their petitions were creating an excitement which ought to be put down, and he would advise them to pause in their course. Did the gentleman from Massachusetts, in appealing to the feelings of the house, suppose that the people of the south were not as much entitled to sympathy as those who were less delicately placed? In the mind of any reflecting man, could any good result from the reception of these petitions? They were not to be acted upon, and no good could result from their presentation, though evil might.

The gentleman from Massachusetts had thought proper to advise him, (Mr. G.) for the sake of his character as a man, to withdraw his objection.—Were he to do so, he would prove recreant not only to his own feelings, but to the feelings of thousands who sent him here, and whose interests he represented. His only object was, that those who agreed with him that the petition should not be received, might have an opportunity of recording their votes, and of showing what their course was to be. He wished to have a vote on the direct question, "Shall the petition be received?" so that those who believed they had the constitutional right to reject it might, by their vote, record that opinion on the journals of the house.

Mr. Parks said that, believing this discussion could be productive of no good, but might be productive of evil, he would move that the preliminary motion on the reception of the petition be laid on the table.

In reply to an inquiry from Mr. Glascock, the speaker said that the effect of this motion, if carried, would be simply so arrest the action of the house on the petition, and not to lay the petition itself on the table.

Mr. Reed called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and being taken were, yeas 130, nays 69.

So the preliminary motion was laid on the table.

Mr. Adams said that, if he had understood the decision of the speaker in this case, it was not the petition itself which was laid on the table, but the motion to receive. Now, in order to save the time of the house, he wished to give notice that he should call up that motion for decision every day so long as he should be permitted to do so by the house; because he should not consider his duty accomplished so long as the petition was not received, and so long as the house had not decided that it would not receive it. This was an operation to which he could not consent.

Mr. Pinckney rose to a question of order, and inquired if there was now any question pending before the house.

The speaker said he had understood the gentleman from Massachusetts as merely giving notice of a motion hereafter to be made. In doing so, it certainly was not in order to enter into debate.

Mr. Adams said that, so long as freedom of speech was allowed to him as a member of that house, he would call up that question until it should be decided.

Mr. Adams was called to order.

Mr. A. said he would then have the honor of presenting to the house the petition of 228 women, the wives and daughters of his immediate constituents; and, as a part of the speech which he intended to make, he would take the liberty of reading the petition. It was not long, and would not consume much time.

Mr. Glascock objected to the reception of the petition.

Mr. A. proceeded to read that the petitioners, inhabitants of South Weymouth, in the state of Massachusetts, impressed with "the sinfulness of slavery, and keenly aggrieved by its existence in a part of our country over which congress"—

Mr. Pinckney rose to a question of order. Had the gentleman from Massachusetts a right, under the rule, to read the petition?

The speaker said the gentleman from Massachusetts had a right to make a statement of the contents of the petition.

Mr. Pinckney desired the decision of the speaker as to whether a gentleman had a right to read a petition.

Mr. Adams said he was reading the petition as a part of his speech, and he took this to be one of the privileges of a member of the house. It was a privilege which he would exercise till he should be deprived of it by some positive act.

The speaker repeated that the gentleman from Massachusetts had a right to make a brief statement of the contents of the petition. It was not for the speaker to decide whether that brief statement should be made in the gentleman's own language, or whether he should look over the petition, and take his statement from that.

Mr. Adams. At the time my friend from South Carolina—

The speaker said the gentleman must proceed to state the contents of the petition.

Mr. Adams. I am doing so, sir.

The speaker. Not in the opinion of the chair.

Mr. Adams. I was at this point of the petition—"Keenly aggrieved by its existence in a part of our country over which congress possesses exclusive jurisdiction in all cases whatever"—

Loud cries of "order, order."

Mr. A. proceeded: "Do most earnestly petition your honorable body?"

Mr. Chambers, of Kentucky, rose to a point of order.

Mr. A. proceeded: "Immediately to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia"

Mr. Chambers reiterated his call to order, and the speaker told Mr. Adams to take his seat.

Mr. A. proceeded, (with great rapidity of enunciation and in a very loud tone of voice)—"And to declare every human being free who sets foot upon its soil."

Mr. Chambers insisted on his point of order, and the speaker again, with great earnestness of manner, told the gentleman from Massachusetts to take his seat.

Whereupon Mr. A. yielded the floor.

[The confusion in the hall at this time was so great that scarcely a word could be heard by the reporters.]

Mr. Chambers then stated his point of order.—The rule of the house provided that every member, in presenting a petition, should state briefly the substance of it. Could that rule be evaded by any gentleman who chose to avow that he would read the petition as a part of his speech? He would be the last man in the world to disturb any gentleman in his remarks, but he thought this course entirely out of order.

The speaker read the rule of the house applicable to the question. It is as follows:

"Rule 45—Petitions, memorials, and other papers addressed to the house, shall be presented by the speaker, or by a member in his place; a brief statement of the contents thereof shall verbally be made by the introducer, and shall not be debated or decided on the day of their being first read, unless where the house shall direct otherwise, but shall lie on the table, to be taken up in the order in which they were read."

The speaker said he would give his decision if it should be insisted on; but he thought much time might be saved by not pressing a decision at this time, because he understood that the gentleman from Massachusetts had gone through the greater part of the contents of the petition.

Mr. Chambers said that his objection was as to the principle, whether a member had a right to read a petition as a part of his speech. He insisted, respectfully, on having the decision of the chair.

The speaker said that he decided, then, that it was not in order for a member to read a petition, whether it was long or short. By the provision of the rule, whatever petition a member might present, he was bound to make verbally "a brief statement of the contents." It would be an abuse of the intent of the rule for a member to rise before a petition was received, and when its reception was objected to, and proceed to read a long memorial. So far as the principle was concerned, it was the same in the case of a short memorial as a long one; otherwise the rule, which looked to economy in the time of the house, would be a nullity.

Mr. Adams said that, as he intended to appeal from the decision of the chair, he would request the member from Kentucky to reduce his point of order to writing, and he would likewise request the speaker to reduce his decision to writing. He appealed from any decision which went to establish the principle that a member of the house should not have the power to read what he chose. He had never before heard of such a thing. If this practice was to be reversed, let the decision stand upon record, and let it appear how entirely the freedom of speech was suppressed in this house. If the reading of a paper was to be suppressed in his own person, so help him God, he would only consent to it as a matter of record.

The speaker repeated the grounds of his decision, and, in support of it, read from Jefferson's manual a clause setting forth, in substance, "that a member had no right to read a paper, but that such rigor was not practised except there was an intentional or gross abuse of the time of the house. Strictly, also, by that rule, a member could read his own speech if written," &c. The speaker said his decision was founded mainly on the 46th rule of the house, which required that a "brief statement of the contents" should alone be made. He was of opinion that it was an invasion of this rule to permit a member, as matter of right, to read any paper he chose to present, as a part of that brief statement.

Mr. Patton rose to express his concurrence in the decision of the speaker. He thought, however, it would have been better not to have raised the question in this form, because, substantially, the gentleman from Massachusetts would effect his object when he made his speech on the question of "reception;" a question which the house had decided to be debateable. He thought it would be better not to consume the time of the house in the discussion, and he hoped the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Chambers) would withdraw his objection, and not appeal from the decision of the chair.

Mr. Chambers said that, if he had the power to appeal, he did not intend to exercise it. But the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Patton) was mistaken as to the practical effect of the question which he (Mr. C.) had raised. A member could not do by a sideward that which he had not the power to do directly. There was no member of the house whom he would indulge so much on a subject as the gentleman from Massachusetts; but he (Mr. C.) thought there was an important principle involved, which ought to be decided. The house must either give a man the right to read every thing he liked, or they must restrict him in every instance. He could not withdraw his objection.

The point of order was debated further by Messrs. Briggs, Harper, Chambers and Adams, the latter gentleman contending that, inasmuch as the whole petition was in five lines, he could not himself give verbally a more "brief statement of the contents" than the petition itself gave.

The speaker presented, in writing, the substance of his decision, that it was not in order for a member to read the whole petition if objected to, but that he had only the right to make "a brief statement of the contents thereof."

Mr. Adams said he proposed to withdraw his appeal in order to save the time of the house, if the gentleman from Kentucky would permit him to complete his "brief statement of the contents" of the petition. It was, indeed, so brief, that to read the petition in its own language was the briefest statement that could be made.

Mr. A. then read from the petition that the petitioners "respectfully announced their intention to present the same petition yearly before this honorable body, that it might at least be a memorial in the holy cause of human freedom, that they had done what they could."

These words were read amidst tumultuous cries for order from every part of the house. And order having at length been restored, Mr. Adams withdrew his appeal.

The question then recurring on the objection of Mr. Glascock to the reception of the petition,

After some remarks from Mr. Dawson, deprecating any excitement on the subject, and condemning, in strong terms, the conduct of the fanatics in agitating it,

Mr. Boon moved to lay the preliminary motion of reception on the table.

Mr. Glascock urged the house to take the vote on the direct question of reception.

After some desultory conversation on points of order,

Mr. Boon withdrew his motion to lay the preliminary motion of reception on the table.

Mr. A. Mann said that, as this question had been most fully discussed at the last session of congress, and as the house had at that time resolved that these petitions should be laid on the table without being referred or printed, he would, to save the time of the house, call for the previous question.

And the house seconded the call—yeas 114, nays not counted.

And the house determined that the main question should now be put.

Mr. Phillips called for the yeas and nays on the main question, which were ordered.

And the main question "Shall the petition be received?" was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Anthony, Bailey, Beale, Bean, Bockee, Bond, Boon, Borden, Bovee, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, William B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Carr, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, Chaney, Chapin, Chetwood, Childs, Clark, Cleveland, Corwin, Cramer, Crane, Cushing, Cushman, Darlington, Denny, Doubleday, Evans, Everett, Fairfield, Farin, Fowler, French, Fry, Fuller, Galbraith, Gillett, Granger, Grantland, Grennell, Haley, J. Hall, H. Hall, Hamer, Hard, Hardin, Harper, S. S. Harrison, Haynes, Hazeltine, Henderson, Heister, Hoar, Holt, Howell, Hubley, Hunt, Huntington, Ingersoll, Ingham, Jones, Jarvis, Cave Johnson, B. Jones, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Lawrence, Gideon Lee, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Lincoln, Abijah Mann, J. T. Whittlesey, Sherrod Williams, Young—137.

NAYS—Messrs. Ash, Ashley, Barton, Bell, Black, Bouldin, Bunch, Bynum, John Calhoun, Campbell, John Chambers, Chapman, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, John F. H. Claiborne, Coles, Connor, Craig, Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Elmore, Forester, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gholson, Glascock, Graham, Graves, Grayson, Griffin, Hannegan, Harlan, Albert G. Harrison, Hopkins, Howard, Huntsman, Jenifer, Richard M. Johnson, Henry Johnson, Lawler, L. Lea, Lewis, Loyall, Lucas, Martin, Maury, May, McKim, McLene, Mercer, Miller, Patton, Pettigrew, Peyton, Pickens, Pinckney, Rencher, Richardson, Robertson, Rogers, Wm. B. Shepard, A. H. Shepperd, Shields, Standefer, Steele, Taliaferro, Thomas, W. Thompson, Underwood, Washington, White, Lewis Williams, Yell—75.

So the petition was received.

Mr. Haynes moved that the petition be laid on the table.

Mr. Adams moved that it be referred to the committee on the District of Columbia.

The speaker said the motion to lay on the table had precedence; and Mr. Adams called for the yeas and nays on that motion, which were ordered

Mr. Pinckney inquired if the motion of the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Haynes) was susceptible of amendment.

The speaker said it was not.

Mr. Pinckney asked the gentleman from Georgia to withdraw his motion, in order to enable him to substitute a more comprehensive proposition; the object of which was, that not only this memorial, but all others of a similar character, should be laid on the table. He wished to offer a resolution to that effect.

Mr. Haynes said, if his motion was susceptible of such an amendment, he was willing it should be made.

The speaker said that such an amendment was not in order.

And the question on the motion to lay the petition on the table was then taken and decided in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Bean, Bell, Black, Bockee, Boon, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Bunch, Buras, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, G. Chambers, Jno. Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Chetwood, Nath. H. Claiborne, John F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Davis, Deberry, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Efner, Elmore, Fairfield, Farlin, Forester, Fowler, French, Fry, Fuller, Galbraith, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gillett, Gholson, Graham, Grantland, Graves, Grayson, Griffin, Jos. Shepperd, Shields, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Standefer, Steel, Sutherland, Taliaferro, Taylor, Thomas, J. Thomson, Toucey, Turritt, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Washington, Webster, Weeks, White, T. T. Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams, Yell, Young—151.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Bailey, Beale, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Childs, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Denby, Evans, Everett, Granger, Haley, Hiland Hall, Hardin, Harper, S. S. Harrison, Hazeltine, Henderson, Heister, Hoar, Hunt, Ingersoll, Ingham, Jones, Lawrence, Lincoln, S. Mason, McCarty, McKennan, Milligan, Parker, D. J. Pearce, Pearson, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Russell, Slade, Sloane, Sprague, Storer, Vinton, Wardwell, E. Whittlesey—50.

So the petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Adams then presented a third petition, from forty inhabitants of the town of Dover, in the county of Norfolk, Massachusetts, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia; and moved that the petition be read.

Mr. Lawler objected to its reception.

A debate followed, in which Messrs. Underwood, Reed and Bynum participated.

Mr. B. had not concluded, when he gave way to Mr. Taylor, on whose motion the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Jan. 10. On motion of Mr. Adams, several amendments were made to the journal of yesterday, the purport of which was to give a more definite description of the sundry petitions presented by him in relation to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Davis moved a suspension of the rule, to enable him to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, propositions or papers, relating in any way, or to any extent, whatever, to the subject of slavery, or the abolition of slavery, shall, without being either printed or referred, be laid on the table, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon.

Mr. D. called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend; which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 102, nays 78; [not two-thirds].

So the house refused to suspend the rule.

Several reports having been made from the standing committees,

Mr. Bell rose, and said that he did not wish to interfere with the regular reports of committees, but that he would now move for leave to bring in the bill, of which he had given notice the other day, to secure the freedom of elections.

The speaker said the motion was not now in order; but that it would be in order for the gentleman from Tennessee to submit the motion at any time when, under the rule regulating the proceedings of the house, it would be in order for him to submit a motion on any other subject.

Mr. Bell said he was under the necessity of making a question on this point. He had given notice of this motion the other day, because he could not procure an opportunity to bring in a resolution which might accomplish the object. He thought that he was entitled to make the motion at this time. He did not propose now to offer a resolution, but a substitute for a report, and if the chair was not satisfied that he had a right so to do at the present time, he must beg leave to submit a few remarks.

The speaker said he had looked carefully into the question, and it was his decision that the motion was not in order at this time.

Mr. Bell appealed from this decision, and entered, at some length, into his reasons for so doing.—The rule under which he had given notice of his motion was the 87th rule, which is in the following terms:

"Every bill shall be introduced by motion for leave, or by an order of the house, on the report of the committee; and, in either case, a committee to prepare the same shall be appointed. In cases of a general nature, one day's notice, at least shall be given of the motion to bring in a bill; and every such motion may be committed."

There were two modes, (Mr. B. said), under this rule, of getting a bill before the house, and, in either case, it must be done by the order of the house; and even bills reported in the morning were received under the order of the house. The same law, the same reason, and the same rule, almost literally, governed both cases. Both bills were embraced under the same rule, and the coherence was the same. Upon what principle was it that the chair had decided that a motion for leave to bring in a bill should not be assigned the same hour as other reports? By what means could a distinction be made in the two cases? The decision not only postponed the time for a day, but might postpone it to the end of the session. He appealed to the magnanimity and sense of justice of the house, and, if that was not sufficient, he appealed to the right of deliberation in this house. He hoped that his character there was too well known to admit of the supposition that he would bring forward a frivolous measure, or one the object of which was only to give him an opportunity of making a harangue for ephemeral effect, here or elsewhere.

The speaker stated the grounds of his decision. The case was a novel one; from the organization of the government, (1789), down to the present period, so far as the precedents which he had been able to discover would go, there had been only two or three cases of bills introduced on leave, and those, so far as appeared, had been brought in without debate and sub silentio. Beyond this, the chair had looked in vain for precedents; and he had therefore been thrown back to the construction of the rules, and had adopted as a guide the very salutary principle that you are to fix upon each portion of the statute that construction which would give effect to the whole of it.

The 87th rule required that "one day's notice at least shall be given of the motion to bring in a bill." The 17th rule provided that reports should be called for, "first from the standing and then from the select committees." The speaker was calling for reports; they had been made in part, and a member rose to make a motion of which he had given previous notice. The question arose, could he, by the rule, make the motion at that time? The 18th rule provided that these reports should be made at no other part of the day except that laid down in the rule, except by permission of the house. It was said that, technically, the 87th rule applied to resolutions, and not to motions to bring in a bill. If the motion were now in order, what must the inevitable consequence be? If the motion was admitted, the mover would have a right to discuss the merits of the bill; and so, also, every other member would have. A member would only have to rise and proceed to debate the motion during the whole of that and the succeeding days, and thus change the whole order of business in the house, and utterly subvert the established course of its proceedings. The speaker referred to the proceedings of the other branch of the legislature, in whose proceedings, he said, he could find no analogy to the present case, because there were in that body no allotments of time for particular business.

The chair finally decided that the motion for leave to bring in a bill could not now be received.

At the suggestion of Mr. Mercer, Mr. Bell withdrew his motion till all the committees should have made their reports.

A number of reports were then received from various committees, chiefly in relation to claims of individuals, after which

Mr. Bell renewed his motion for leave to bring in a bill to secure the freedom of elections.

The speaker said he was about to state that the hour devoted to reports had elapsed, and that it was therefore his duty to announce the orders of the day. Mr. Bell wished to inquire whether the half hour which had been spent in taking the yeas and nays was to be considered as a component part of the hour devoted to resolutions and reports. The speaker said that the uniform course had been to commence the computation of the hour from the moment at which reports were first called for. Mr. Bell said he then gave notice that he would to-morrow again ask leave to introduce this bill. Various ineffectual motions were made to suspend the rule, for the introduction of particular resolutions. Mr. D. H. Lewis moved to suspend the rule for the purpose of calling the states for resolutions, commencing where the call was broken off on the last on which resolutions were received.

The speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of war, transmitting a report, in obedience to the resolution of the house of representatives of the 3d inst. accompanying the survey, plan and estimate for the improvement of the mouth of Black river, in the state of New York; which report was referred to the committee of ways and means.

The speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting an exhibit of the names, condition and dates of selection of two additional deposite banks, selected since the making of his annual report to congress.

A message was received from the president of the United States, transmitting a report of the secretary of state, with the accompanying letters addressed to him by the commission, appointed under the act of congress of the last session, for carrying into effect the convention between the United States and Spain.

The house resumed the consideration of the resolution of Mr. Wise, providing for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the administration of the executive departments; together with the pending amendment of Mr. D. J. Pearce to confine the investigation to specific charges of maladministration.

Mr. Hamer, who held the floor when the subject was last before the house, rose to conclude his remarks, but yielded the floor for a moment, to enable Mr. French, of Kentucky, to present, with a view to have read, a resolution, which he would submit when in order: the resolution was read. It provides, in substance, that so much of the president's message as is contained in the sentence eulogistic of the officers in the executive departments be referred to five select committees, one for each department, and to consist of seven members each, with instructions to inquire into the manner in which the duties of the several departments and their bureaus have been performed; into all alleged abuses, corruption and frauds, which had taken place under the present administration; and if any such fraud, corruption, &c. existed, to inquire by whom and what injury had been thereby done; and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

The speaker said the resolution which had been read was in the nature of a motion, and, of course, was not before the house. Mr. Hamer then rose, and concluded his remarks in opposition to the original resolution, and in favor of the amendment.—After Mr. Hamer concluded, Mr. McKen obtained the floor, but gave way to enable the house, by general consent, to take up the mint and coinage bill.

The amendment of the senate to the bill supplementary to the acts regulating the mint was then read and concurred in, nem. con. [This bill, having now passed both houses, requires only the signature of the president to become a law.]

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting the annual return of the banks of the District of Columbia up to the 1st January; and then the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Dec. 11. Mr. Cambreleng, from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill, with an accompanying report, to reduce the revenue of the United States to the wants of the government.

The bill was read as follows:

A bill to reduce the revenue of the United States to the wants of the government.

Be it enacted, &c. That, from and after the 30th day of September next, in all cases where duties are imposed on foreign imports, by the act of the 14th of July, 1832, entitled "An act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," or by any other act, shall exceed twenty per centum on the value thereof, one-third part of such excess shall be deducted; from and after the 31st of March, 1835, me-half of the residue of such excess shall be deducted; and on the 30th September, 1838, the other half shall be deducted: any thing in the act of the 1st of March, 1833, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the 30th of September next, the duties on salt and coal shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. Owens moved that the report be read, which was agreed to.

The same having been read accordingly, the bill was read a second time.

Whereupon, Mr. Cambreleng moved to commit the same to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union, and that the bill, report, and abular statements accompanying the same, be printed.

Mr. Lawrence rose and said, that, as one of the committee of ways and means, and as one of the minority of that committee on this subject, he hoped he might be permitted to express his dissent from the principles of the bill and the report which had just been read. This was a measure of grave importance. It was no less than a bill to reduce suddenly the revenue of this country, which, by a law passed in the year 1833, had been proposed to be reduced in 1842, or, in other words, in five years and a half from the present time. It was a bill to bring down the revenue in eighteen months to a standard to which it would have been reduced in five years and a half.

He wished the members of this house to reflect for a moment on the principles contained in the report, and on the effect which must be produced if they were carried into operation. He would put the question to every member of the house whether he really understood the reasons upon which the bill had been introduced at the present time; whether there was any serious, any abiding feeling in this house that the bill was to become the law of the land. The measure was of so much importance, that it was necessary that the country should know and understand what it was; that they should be well advised of its objects; that this sudden legislation on questions involving the greatest and most vital interests of the country should not go forth upon the people like a clap of thunder on a summer's day.

What, he would ask, was to be the effect upon the country of simply making the report? It would be to create a panic from one end of the country to the other. What was the state of the country at this time from Maine to Georgia? What was the condition of the finances and currency? What was the interest paid on money in all the commercial states? From fifteen to twenty, and even thirty per cent. per annum. And, in the new states, he understood it was still higher. Already a panic had been created out of the peculiar position of the finances and currency of the country. And what would be the effect of this report but to increase the panic? The bill proposed to reduce the tariff ten per cent. in six months on all imported articles; and one-half of the excess over twenty per cent. at the end of the six following months; and the other half on the 30th September, 1838, (which was more than half of the present duties on many of the most important protected articles), in eighteen months from this time—a reduction which would otherwise be made in five years and a half.

Mr. A. Mann rose to a question of order, and asked if, on the question of commitment, it was in order to go into a regular debate.

Mr. Lawrence asked that he might be permitted to proceed a few moments longer. He wished to make an appeal to some of the members of this house.—He wished to appeal to the representatives of the state of Pennsylvania; and he did so for the purpose of ascertaining whether this was, or was not, a party measure. Sir, (said Mr. L.) I hope it is not. But I appeal to the representatives from the state of Pennsylvania, and I ask them if they are ready to sanction the doctrines contained in this bill and report. I appeal to the representatives from the state of New York, and I appeal to them to say whether the citizens of the state of New York are in favor of his system? Sir, I cannot believe it. I know there are many gentlemen, members of this house, in favor of it; but, so far as I know, I feel assured that the majority of the people of the state of New York will not sustain it.

I appeal to the representatives from the state of Ohio, and all the grain-growing states of the west, to say if they have no interest in this question? Is here a gentleman here, truly representing the views of his constituents, who will say that he is willing to place the whole industry of the country on the same foundation as the industry of the nations of Europe is placed? No, sir, I believe no such thing.

I appeal to the representatives of New England, whole and not in part. I appeal to the representatives from Connecticut in particular, as forming a portion of the administration party here, to say whether they dare go home to their constituents with this report in their hands, and tell them "this is our doctrine, we will stand or fall by it." Sir, they would not be sustained a moment; I say, and when I appeal to the representatives of New England, I know there is a diversity of opinion amongst them, but I say there is no difference amongst them on this point; that is to say, that this sudden and extraordinary reduction at this time, and under these circumstances, without any shadow of a plea for it, will never be sustained. There is no plea; for what says the secretary of the treasury? He says that the revenue will be short during the present year. The secretary says, and he is surely good authority, that the revenue, after the appropriations which may be expected to take effect before the 31st of December next, will be about three millions short. What can we know about the revenue of 1838? Who knows what we shall receive from customs or from the public lands? Who can tell what is to happen in a year from this time? No man can say with certainty.

Why is this bill brought forward at this time?—There is no surplus now. We do not expect there will be any at the end of the year. I know not what effect the bill is intended to have. I hope that next to passing it, the object is not to send it out to the country to destroy the confidence already so much impaired. It strikes at the interests of the whole country. Its effect will be to weaken the bonds of confidence and credit which bind men together in all commercial communities. Will any gentleman, (I do not mean one of the committee)—but will any gentleman of the administration party, from Pennsylvania, Connecticut, New Hampshire, New Jersey or any other state, who may know more of this matter than I do, say that he will sustain it, and that he believes it to be for the interest of the country that the bill should be brought forward at this time? This may seem a light matter, but, sir, you are tampering with the great interests of the country. You propose to throw open your ports to all the world; you propose free trade on the one side, but you ask nothing on the other. Would you export more cotton or more tobacco, if the duty were taken off to-morrow? Who takes your produce? Great Britain takes a great portion of it: the continent of Europe takes some, but only those articles which cannot be done without.

What are the duties in Great Britain on agricultural products? I will state a few of them. Salted beef 2½ cents per lb.; bacon 6 cents per lb.—

The speaker here intimated to Mr. L. that the merits of the bill were not open to discussion. Mr. Lawrence inquired if it would be in order to move that the bill be rejected, and under that motion to proceed with his remarks.

The speaker said it would not now be in order; that the motion would have been in order if it had been submitted previous to the second reading of the bill.

Mr. L. said he would be the last man in the house to transgress the rules of the house, and that he would not, therefore, continue his remarks.

Mr. Ingersoll inquired if it was in order to move the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The speaker said the motion would be in order, and that it would lay open to discussion the whole merits of the bill.

Mr. Lawrence, thereupon, moved its indefinite postponement.

The speaker said that the motion to commit would take precedence of the motion for indefinite postponement, but that the merits of the question would still be open to discussion.

Mr. Lawrence said he wished merely to show this house what effect would be produced by the passage of this bill. He was enumerating a few of the English duties on American articles—on unmanufactured tobacco, 67 cents per pound; on manufactured tobacco, 2 dollars per pound; on coals, £2 or $8 88 per ton; on spermaceti candles, 56 cents per pound; on tallow candles, 14 cents per pound.

Mr. L. proceeded: I could, sir, go on with a catalogue of those articles which interfere with the interests of Great Britain and of the continent. Their duties, in effect, are prohibitory upon all such articles. Now, if the duties are all taken off, will you export any more than you can now? No, sir, not of a single article, unless it is done by treaty. We have no treaties of this kind that I know of. How is it with cotton? I apprehend that the cotton growers have supposed that they held command of the market of Great Britain and the continent of Europe. I wish to inform them that it is a great mistake; that these countries are importing cotton now from other parts of the world besides the United States, and that to a great extent. In India, they are increasing the quantity as well as the quality of their cotton. During the last year, double the quantity of cotton was imported into England from India, more than was imported the previous year. At the present time, they were importing cotton from Egypt, Persia, Brazil and other places where it was grown.

Mr. Vanderpoel here rose, and called for the orders of the day; which motion was lost—ayes 68, noes 74.

Mr. McKay here raised the question whether, under the 103d rule, the bill did not require commitment.

The speaker decided that, so far as he was able to form an opinion from the very hasty consideration he had given to the subject, he should decide that the bill must be committed.

A long debate followed, in which Messrs. Mercer, Mann, Read, Thomas, Cambreleng, Ingersoll, Mann, Vinton, Vanderpoel, Sutherland and Toucey took part.

The speaker then assigned his reasons why he was of opinion, upon further consideration, and consulting precedents, that this bill is not of a character to bring it under the rule that every bill imposing a tax upon the people shall first be discussed in committee of the whole.

Mr. Boon then withdrew an appeal which he had taken from the decision of the chair; and

Mr. Lawrence resumed. He was very sorry, he said, that any remarks of his should have been the cause of consuming so much time of the house; and nothing but the peculiar position which he occupied, as a member of the committee of ways and means, would have induced him to trespass on its attention. Occupying that position, he felt himself bound to protest against this bill, as being a project as monstrous as any that had ever been presented to the people of the United States. When interrupted, Mr. L. said, he had remarked that he had a word to say to the cotton growers of the country in relation to this bill. What he meant to say to them was, that they have some interest in this great question. They have a common interest, as well as the manufacturers, in the prosperity of the union; and they have a particular interest in this bill besides, in regard to their own staple.—From data before him, it was demonstrable that the quantity of cotton consumed in the United States, at this moment, is equal to what the whole crop of the country was in the year 1820, some sixteen or seventeen years ago. This he stated as a fact not to be disputed. And the consumption here, moreover, is at this time as great as the consumption was in England two or three and twenty years ago. We consume now, in the manufactures of this country, more than a fifth, and nearly a fourth, of the whole present crop of cotton. Was it nothing, besides, to the growers of cotton, that Great Britain, the great consumer of our cotton, is actually now importing it from every country that produces it? Is that nothing to the producer of it in this country? And is this a time to reduce and almost destroy the consumption of it here?

But (Mr. L. said) he would not now go into this subject at large—he might do so on some other fitting occasion; he had risen, this morning, not with a view to make a speech, but to wash his hands, as a member of the financial committee, of any share in the production of this bill, or the report which accompanies it. He owed it (he said) to himself—he owed it to his constituents—he owed it to his country, to do so, because he believed the bill fraught with every sort of mischief, amongst which was its direct tendency to increase the existing embarrassment in the commercial communities. For himself (he said) he had no ulterior political objects to serve by his course in this house on this or any other question: he asked for nothing—he feared nothing: he was neither an officeholder nor an office-seeker. But his object in addressing the chairman was to ascertain, and let the country know, whether this bill was or was not a political measure. He had had no opportunity to ascertain that fact. I would like to know (said he) whether there is any concert of action here, upon this bill, among the administration party. The country ought to know, and to know at once, whether this be a party measure or not. I hope, sir, that it is not. For that reason, sir, it was that I appealed to the representatives from Connecticut, as deeply interested in this question as any state in the union—to the representatives from New Hampshire, from Rhode Island—from all New England, and from Pennsylvania, the latter the authors (I was going to say) and the consistent supporters of the protective system. I now call upon them all to rise in their places and say whether they are going for this bill. I want the country to know this. It is due to the people that they should know, whether a bill is going to pass this house by the votes of those representatives, which will prostrate to the earth most important interests of the country. I profess, sir, some practical knowledge of the subject; and I pronounce this bill fraught with consequences fatal to thousands of individuals. It has been said that a bill embracing such provisions as the bill now before the house, is a bill for the benefit of the poor. Sir, I deny the truth of the proposition. This is a bill the title of which should be a bill to make THE RICH RICHER, AND THE POOR POORER.

Mr. L. here traced the passage of such a bill as this to its probable consequences. He supposed the case of an individual in Pennsylvania, or in Connecticut, engaged in manufactures, the cost of whose buildings and fixtures has been ten thousand dollars, upon which, (a common case), there was a mortgage for one-half the cost. To pay off this mortgage, when his employment for his machinery fails, his property is sold. Who buys it? Is it the poor man who purchases in such cases? Not at all; but he who has redundant capital. What is now the case, Mr. L. asked, in those parts of the country where pecuniary pressure is felt? Go into your cities, and you will find that the men who have a small or a middling property are paying at the rate of from 15 to 30 per cent. per annum for money. Who is it that is reaping the profit? Is it the poor man? No, sir, it is the rich capitalist, or those who are allowed to use his capital. If there was ever a system devised on earth to throw the property of the country into the hands of the few at the expense of the many, it is the present financial system of the United States. I know it, sir, and I am willing that my judgment of the matter shall go to the country; for every practical man will know that what I say is true. Aye, sir, and the bill on your table goes to a much further extent than this, for it reaches the labor of his country. In one month after the passage of this bill, the business of every manufacturer and dealer in the country will be contracted. It is not the large capitalist; protected by his money-bags, who will feel its direct effects, but the laborer—the mechanic, who now gets two dollars or two dollars and half a day. To him the employer says, on receiving information of the passage of this bill, I must stop my work! Oh, no! says the laborer, for you will take from me my means of support. Well, says the employer, I will, in order to keep you at work, give you henceforth a dollar a day instead of what I have heretofore given you. Gentlemen may flatter themselves that they are exempt from the operations of this bill; but no man, whatever his condition in life may be, is beyond the deleterious effects of this bill if it becomes a law. Mr. L. was sure, he said, that the representatives from the western states, or from the southern, were not going for this bill. The representatives from the southern states especially would not go for it when the profits of their cotton crops were already in a process of reduction; for, although he knew that the crop of this year was a large one, the proceeds of that crop will fall far short of the proceeds of the crop of last year.

Mr. L. said it was not only to protest against the principles of this bill that he had risen, but to ask of the gentlemen of this house who have the power to do what they will—to pass this bill, or to defeat it—whether this bill was to be considered as a proclamation issued by the present dynasty in the government, or as a decisive token of the course of measures which we have to expect at the hands of the coming administration. For, he did not hesitate to say, if it is produced as a party measure, it will become the law of the land; but, if not, by the aid of the representatives of Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, Ohio and Maine, whose constituents are so deeply interested in the matter, with those from at least a portion of the south, the bill might providentially be defeated. But, be that as it might, it was the imperative duty of the house to declare to the country, at once, immediately, whether or not it was probable that any bill like this would pass during the present congress.

Mr. L. said that, whilst he was up, and as he might not have another opportunity, he would say one word on the state of the currency of the country. In the first place, said he, the domestic exchanges of the country are far greater in amount than all the gold and all the silver and all the bank notes in circulation—a vast deal greater. These exchanges are not now available to any great extent. To a very large amount they cannot be used, in consequence of the position in which, by its measures, the government has placed the country. He meant no reflections upon the banks; for it is their interest to do all the business that they can, and they do it. But the channels of domestic exchange are obstructed, from the want of ability on the part of the banks; and a considerable portion of our commercial difficulties arises out of that circumstance. Add to this and other causes the introduction of this bill, with the expectation that it is to become the law of the land, and you will produce a state of things the like of which very few members of this house has ever seen.

Mr. Corwin, of Ohio; obtained the floor; but the hour being late, he gave way to a motion for adjournment, and the house adjourned.

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In the senate. After the usual morning business, on motion of Mr. Calhoun, the supplementary deposit bill, (to extend the provisions of the late bill through 1837), was postponed to, and made the order of the day for Tuesday next.

On motion of Mr. Walker the resolution offered by him yesterday on the subject of Texas, was postponed to, and made the order of the day for Wednesday next.

The bill introduced by Mr. Morris prohibiting the sales of public lands, except to actual settlers, was announced as the order of the day. After a brief discussion, some amendments by the committee were ordered to be printed, and the subject was then postponed until to-morrow.

The senate then proceeded to the next special order, the expunging resolution of Mr. Benton: when that gentleman addressed the senate at length on the subject. Mr. Davis followed, but before he had concluded, gave way to Mr. Grundy, on whose motion the senate adjourned.

In the house of representatives, the first business in order was the bill reported yesterday by Mr. Cambreleng, from the committee of ways and means, to reduce the revenue to the wants of the government: there being two motions pending, first for commitment, and secondly for indefinite postponement. Mr. Corwin addressed the house in opposition to, and Mr. Cushman, of N. H. in favor of the bill. Mr. Galbraith moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Tuesday next, and that the bill, report, &c. be printed. Mr. Muhlenberg moved that the bill, &c. be laid on the table and that they be printed. Mr. Calhoun, of Kentucky, moved a division of the question—first, on laying the bill, &c. on the table, and then on printing. An animated and desultory debate now ensued, (of which we will publish a notice hereafter)—after which the yeas and nays were taken on the motion to lay the bill on the table and decided in the negative, yeas 94, nays 119. Mr. Holsey then moved that the house adjourn, but withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. Cambreleng, who moved that the report, bill and documents be printed, which motion prevailed. Some business of minor importance was next transacted, after which the house adjourned.

DOMESTIC CHRONICLE.

A report reached Washington yesterday from the west, by way of Baltimore, that the wife of Mr. Senator Ewing died on the 1st instant: which was of course believed to be true, until it was ascertained that a letter had been received here from a member of the senator's family, under date of the 5th inst. saying that Mrs. E. was rapidly recovering from her dangerous indisposition. [Nat. Int.]

It was a real pleasure to see Mr. Morris, of Pennsylvania, in his place in the house of representatives (for the first time this session) on Monday. He was taken ill on his way hither, and has been detained in Baltimore, until now, by protracted indisposition. [Nat. Int.]

The secretary of the treasury acknowledges the receipt of an anonymous letter, postmarked "Lebanon, Connecticut, January 6th," which states: "In the late war a partner of mine took pay (I believe) for a number of yards of cotton cloth more than he delivered: the enclosed is to make restitution."

The amount enclosed in the letter ($10) being presumed to be due to the United States, has been deposited to the credit of the treasurer of the United States in the bank of the Metropolis. [Globe.]

Express Mail. We are requested to state, for the information of those who have occasion to write to members of congress, that the letters of members by the express mail are not free, but, like all other letters by that mail, are charged with triple postage. This seems not to be generally understood. Members are every day taxed with triple postage on letters by the express mail, by persons writing on their own business. Such letters should be paid at the office where they are mailed. [Id.]

Rifle manufactory. There is a manufactory of Cochran's many chambered rifle, for a company in New York. Eight rifles are finished weekly. The editor of the Springfield Gazette says that he has witnessed the discharge of the nine charges of powder and ball, contained in the chambers of the cylinder in 15 seconds, and in one instance in a still shorter time, hardly exceeding one second to each discharge of the rifle.

Baltimore delegation. A bill which passed the last legislature of Maryland, to increase the delegation from Baltimore from two to four members, has been confirmed by the present, and is now a part of the constitution of the state. This concession is a trifle compared to the monstrous abuses under which the larger counties still labor from the anti-republican character of the constitution. The bill passed the senate unanimously, and the house of delegates by a vote of 53 to 15.

The army—More resignations. The following additional resignations of officers of the army are officially published as having taken place from the 31st of October to the 31st of December, inclusive, viz: [Nat. Int.]

Captains. Major C. Legate, Wm. M. Boyce, James Dean, Thomas Hunt, Henry Smith, Zalmon C. Palmer.

First lieutenants. John McClellan, John W. Barry, George W. Ward, Robert P. Smith, T. B. W. Stockton, Jona. K. Greenough, William Bloodgood, John M. Berrien, Alex. J. Center.

Staff. Zina Pitcher, surgeon, Wm. A. Berry, assistant surgeon.

The Cincinnati Post of the 4th instant says that the roads in Indiana are literally alive with hogs, going to the market of that city. Prices ranged from six to seven cents, according to size.

Distilling. In the Pennsylvania house of representatives, on Thursday last, a resolution was offered by Mr. McIlwain, of Chester county, proposing—on account of the extensive failure of the last year's crop—to instruct the committee on agriculture to inquire into the expediency of imposing a tax, for a limited period, on the distillation of ardent spirits. The resolution was twice read and agreed to.

In Franklin county, Pa. a public meeting of the distillers has been called for the 18th inst. in Chambersburgh, with a view to the adoption of some general arrangement for greatly reducing, if not entirely suspending the business of distilling for some time. This course is deemed necessary, on account of the present apparent scarcity and consequent high prices of bread stuffs. It is a good and humane move, undoubtedly, in the actual condition of the grain and flour market.

Banking capital in Virginia. The stockholders of the Farmers bank of Virginia, have made an application to the legislature of that state, praying an act authorising an increase of their capital stock to an amount not less than one million two hundred and forty thousand dollars.

The president has, as usual, notified the senate to meet the 4th of March ensuing. This is the usual courtesy paid by the executive to his successor, who, in his inauguration that day, which is also the constitutional termination of the existing session of congress, requires the co-operation of the senate to aid him in the construction of his cabinet.

The U. S. supreme court commenced its annual session on Monday last, in the court room at the capitol. All the judges were present except judge WAYNE, and all in apparent health. The absent judge is expected, we believe, in a day or two.—Until he arrives, (under a rule of the court made three years ago), no question of constitutional law can be taken up, a full court being required for all such. The docket is not large, the number of cases upon it falling short of sixty. [Nat. Int.]

The lost money restored. We learn that the reward for the $25,000, some time since lost in this city, having been increased to $5,000, notes to the amount of $20,000 were yesterday addressed through the post office, to Messrs. J. & G. Berlin.

Since writing the above, we have been informed that only $17,000 have been returned; the finder having taken the $500 reward originally offered by Mr. Nevins, of this city—the $2,500 offered by the New York house—and the $5,000 offered by the Messrs. Berlin—in all $8,000. A pretty considerable sum for picking up a small package.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 21.—Vol. I.]

BALTIMORE, JANUARY 21, 1837.

[Vol. LI.—Whole No. 1,321.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

Our old carrier is confined to the house by indisposition, and the delivery of the "REGISTER" has been committed to new hands. Should any of our subscribers be neglected, they will oblige us by leaving notice to that effect at the publication office in Water street, where missing numbers of the "REGISTER" will be cheerfully supplied.

Among the annoyances suffered in conducting this work, there is none greater than the necessity which often compels us to omit articles prepared with much care, to give place to those which must be inserted, both on account of their current interest and as subjects for record. Of this character are the proceedings of congress and Mr. Cambreleng's report from the committee of ways and means for reducing the revenue to the wants of the government, which have crowded out a mass of articles on our desk. We will, however, speedily relieve our files by a supplemental sheet, as a slight return for the manifestations we daily receive of the public favor.

Mr. Cambreleng's report and bill from the committee of ways and means for reducing the revenue, have been committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and from what we can learn from Washington there is not the slightest prospect that the bill will be carried in its present shape, indeed, it is said there will be no further action on the subject at the present session, and that it was only intended as a demonstration for "certain purposes" hereafter. These impressions should not, however, slacken the zeal of the friends of the protective system, who must not expect either justice or mercy from politicians of Mr. Cambreleng's school, with their preposterous notions of free trade—about as practicable in the present condition of the world, as his calculations! in his celebrated report from the committee on commerce in 1830, are true.

The report of the committee of ways and means is inserted in the present sheet, and is itself the most powerful argument against the object it affects to have in view; for a greater tissue of bungling demonstrations and false inferences was never embodied in any report that has emanated from a committee of congress, since the memorable report aforesaid—in which Mr. Cambreleng put down "the coasting tonnage" of Great Britain in 1827 at 8,648,363 tons, that amount being only six millions one hundred and eighty-eight thousand three hundred and sixty-eight tons more than the whole tonnage of the British empire amounted to in that year! But its errors of fact and inference have been ably exposed by Messrs. Lawrence and Corwin of Ohio, whose speeches shall have a place as soon soon as reported. In the mean time the following extract from an article in a late number of the "Globe," will afford matter for reflection.

"The only difficulty," says the Globe, "that can ensue among the republicans, who are sincerely desirous of bringing down the taxes so as only to supply an economical expenditure, will be the difference of opinion as to the effect of the reductions proposed in the report. Many consider the reductions contemplated too rapid and radical, and with the restrictions in land sales, greater than the object it has in view will justify or require. A more gradual movement in the same direction, will, we think, be the probable result of the deliberations of the majority in congress, which doubtless concurs with the committee in regard to the great end it would accomplish, and, in the main, as to the means. All are sensible that a sudden, abrupt and violent change is not the proper alternative for the present state of things. Day itself would be intolerable, if it did not emerge through twilight. The vicissitudes of the season are made grateful and beneficial by their slow approach, and the happy manner in which they are intermingled.

"The sensation which this report produced in the house was strongly manifested at the moment it was received, and on every preliminary motion. As frequently happens, one of the most unimportant articles, as a matter of finance, was most talked about, and excited the greatest sensibility. The duty on coal produces a revenue of only $100,000. Its protection, too, is almost secured by natural causes, independently of tariffs. As a matter of principle or interest, we learn that the committee consider it altogether a non essential in the scheme of reduction."

Vol. LI.—Sic. 21

Mr. Benton's expunging resolution passed the senate on Monday last, by a vote of 24 to 19. In a subsequent page we have given an account of all that transpired on the occasion, including the extraordinary scene with an individual arrested for an indignity to the senate, on the conclusion of the ceremony of expunction.

Party is so closely allied with this question, that any opinion we may utter, will be imputed to personal bias—yet, we cannot refrain from saying, that this act of the senate is a palpable violation of the constitution, and has established a precedent of a most fatal tendency. It is not only a clear infraction of that provision of that instrument which enjoins that a journal of the proceedings of the senate shall be "kept," but is impressed with a degree of personality that should not find a place in a body with such high prerogatives as the senate of the U. States: and for all practical purposes, both in its present effects and for posterity, it is utterly valueless. For, with this precedent established, it is not necessary to inform our readers that chance or change, may create, at no distant day, a majority in the senate opposed to the expunging resolution, and that that majority may direct its expunction from the journals and the restoration of that which it condemns. These resolutions may also be expunged by another senate, and thus we may have "the contemptible farce" of expunction or restoration, played at each ascendancy of party. A more safe, and equally honorable, mode of evincing confidence in the purity of the motives of the president, would have been the passage of a resolution to that effect; and then the issue would have been fairly presented for the decision of posterity.

The subjoined communication has been handed to us for publication by the citizen who was arrested and brought before the senate by the sergeant-at-arms on Monday night, on a charge of committing disorder in the gallery. As his arrest and the alleged causes of it are made known through our columns, we of course concede to him the right of being heard through the same channel.

[National Intelligencer.]

[COMMUNICATED.]

The public will undoubtedly be informed, through the medium of the reports of congressional proceedings, letters from Washington, and by other means, that last night, after passing of the expunging resolution, by the senate of the United States, a gross outrage was perpetrated, at the instigation of Mr. Senator Benton, on the person of an American citizen. That he was arrested, brought to the bar of the senate, condemned without proof, denied permission to speak, and discharged without trial, after being insultingly called "a hired ruffian of the bank," by Mr. Benton, sheltered behind his privilege as a senator.

That individual desires the public to suspend their judgment on this matter until due deliberation shall have enabled him to determine upon the course most proper to be pursued in relation to this outrage on the rights of

AN AMERICAN CITIZEN.

Washington, January 17, 1837.

TEXAS AND MEXICO. On Thursday last a message was received by the senate from the president of the U. States, transmitting the correspondence of that functionary with Santa Ana, which is inserted in the last page to the exclusion of our foreign and domestic chronicle. It will be found highly interesting and important when taken in connection with the declarations of Messrs. Preston, Walker and Calhoun.

Santa Ana arrived at Frederick, Md. on Tuesday last at 1 o'clock, and on the same evening, accompanied by his escort, waited upon the veteran general Gaines, to whom he felt under obligations for courtesies received. On Wednesday morning he departed for Washington, at which place col. Almonte, his secretary and aid, arrived on Tuesday. Santa Ana was accompanied by colonels Hockley and Patton; the latter acting as interpreter in the absence of col. Almonte.

The New Orleans Standard furnishes a very curious account of the action of the different branches of the Texan government, in relation to Santa Ana.

The rumors reaching the ears of the members of congress, that president Houston intended to liberate the Mexican chiefs, they passed the following resolution;

Resolved, That the president be and is hereby vested with the custody and disposal of all prisoners of war. Provided, that the prisoners Santa Ana and Almonte shall not be released or set at liberty on any occasion, without the concurrence of the senate, and that the president shall not have the power to release said prisoners during the recess of the senate.

This resolution was immediately vetoed by gen. Houston. The congress, notwithstanding, passed it again by the constitutional majority of two-thirds, and it became a law. President Houston, driven to extremity, and determined to release Santa Ana at all hazards, pronounced the resolution unconstitutional, and a usurpation of his executive authority, and, in the face of the law of congress, set Santa Ana free, and put the whole congress at defiance. The army being with the president in all things, congress succumbed.

By slips received in Baltimore from New Orleans, information has been received that M. Gorostiza arrived in the city of Mexico, on the 15th of December, which event will bring up at once for the decision of that government, the results of his mission to this country. On the same day, general Bustamente arrived from France in the city of Mexico. He is a candidate for the presidency, and will probably be chosen. Report says he declared for the federative system, which sets him at once into opposition to Santa Ana. His success would be favorable to the principles originally declared for by Texas—but in her present posture, adverse to the hopes resting upon the supposed engagements of Santa Ana.

TRIAL OF RICHARD H. WHITE. On Friday morning the 18th inst. the jury came into court, having been out more than twenty-four hours, and gave in a special verdict, finding the traverser GUILTY of the offence charged, but that he came within the view of the statute of limitations, and was therefore to be acquitted.

Mr. Brent claimed the acquittal of his client on this verdict, and that it should be recorded as amounting to a verdict of not guilty.

The court dissented, and after some discussion, the jury were sent back, and in a little while returned and gave the following verdict:

"We, the jury, are of opinion that the offence, as charged, was committed by the prisoner; but find him not guilty, upon the plea of limitations, more than two years having elapsed from the committing of the offence to finding the indictment."

Mr. Brent now called upon the court for the discharge of his client. This, however, was refused, as it appears that the qualifications or hypothesis contained in the verdict, gives ground for argument and leaves it to be decided by the court whether or not this verdict is a verdict of acquittal.

In the case of Harry White the jury returned a verdict of guilty.

DELAWARE. Judge Thomas Clayton has accepted the appointment of U. S. senator, and took his seat on Thursday last. John M. Clayton, has been appointed chief justice of Delaware, vice judge Thomas Clayton, and has accepted the appointment to the great gratification of his fellow citizens.

Judge Thomas Clayton at first declined the appointment to the senate of the United States, and wrote to the governor of Delaware to that effect—but the obstacle to his acceptance having been, unexpectedly, removed he withdrew the letter of resignation.

Gov. CALL returned to Tallahassee from the seat of war on the 28th ult. and was greeted with every testimonial of esteem and respect. At about two miles from that town he was met by a large cavalcade of citizens on horseback, and escorted into it amidst the firing of cannon.

During the latter ceremony, we regret to state that Mr. Benjamin Taylor was so much injured by the explosion of a charge, whilst ramming it home, as to render the amputation of both hands necessary, and that a Mr. Freeman had his wrist broken by the same accident.

B. RATHBUN. The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser states that the trial of B. Rathbun, indicted for forgery, came on on the 5th inst. when an affidavit was put in by the prisoner stating that Lyman Rathbun, Rathbun Allen and Horace Janes, of New York, were material witnesses in his behalf, but could not be produced; and on motion of T. T. Sherwood and E. Van Buren, esqrs. counsel for the prisoner, his trial was put over until the next court of Oyer and Terminer, in July next.

The prisoner was willing to come to trial on the first twelve indictments found against him, by which he is only charged as accessary to the forgeries, but not on the one recently obtained against him as principal in the crime. It was, however, determined by the counsel on both sides, and concurred in by the court, that the public would be best satisfied, and the ends of justice best subserved, by a trial at the same term, upon all the charges against him, so that the matter could be finally disposed of.

Lyman Rathbun has absconded, but the pursuit was hot, and it was expected that he would be apprehended.

The New York papers contain the advertisement for the sale of B. Rathbun's real estate,—a mere list of which is enough to burden the memory of an ordinary man, and its management sufficient for the employment of a hundred heads and hands.

A JUST VERDICT. We learn from the Boston Advocate of Saturday the 7th inst. that on the day previous, the jury in the case of Thompson and others vs. the Providence rail road company, returned the following verdict: damages awarded to Thompson $2,250; Cummings, $175; Ransom, $175; White, $1,500; Howell, $3,000; Murdock, $2,250; making the whole amount of damages $9,350.

The counsel in the case of midshipman Rust against the same corporation, then agreed with the counsel for the rail road company that the same jury should, by consent, return a verdict for $2,000.—The sum of $11,350 has thus been awarded as damages against the Providence rail road company on account of the unfortunate collision of their cars last summer; and there remains one case (Brown's) to be decided by reference.

The verdict of the jury in the several cases settles one of the most important questions ever brought before our courts. The jury deserves the thanks of their fellow citizens, and of the whole country, for the firmness and sound discretion with which they gave their verdict, avoiding vindictive damages to punish the corporation, but giving such liberal compensation for the injuries received, as will serve as ample warning to all rail road companies to employ scientific and competent men, and to use such precautions as will hereafter protect the travelling public from danger, either by the inexperience or rashness of the managers of rail road cars.

Charles S. Sibley, to be attorney for the middle district of Florida.

ADMISSION OF MICHIGAN INTO THE UNION.

Mr. Grundy confessed that he could not see any thing in the whole proceedings calculated to excite alarm. The senator (Mr. Calhoun) had told the senate that a proceeding in Maryland had excited more apprehension in regard to our institutions than any thing that had occurred since the establishment of our government. Now, that was the gentleman's opinion; but he (Mr. G.) had seen the time when there was felt more solicitude with respect to the stability of our union than what had recently happened in Maryland, or in the proceedings which had been adopted in Michigan. In order to determine the question before the senate, it might be as well to take a short review of the facts and circumstances connected with it.

By the ordinance of 1787, it was provided that this territory, and all portions of the territory ceded by the state of Virginia north west of the Ohio, should be admitted as a state, not by conventions called for the purpose of ratifying a proposal made by congress, but upon the fair condition that when their population should have amounted to a certain number. Michigan, at the time she first applied to be admitted into the union, possessed a population of one-third more than was required by the ordinance of 1787. But he should state, that before asking for admission, as she had a right to do, she called a convention, and framed a constitution. The general government had, at that time, a right (without prescribing the terms to be found in the act of the 2d March, 1836,) to receive her into the union. But what did congress do? Did they comply with her request? or with the terms of the ordinance?—No: congress prescribed different provisions from any to be found in the ordinance. Now, according to the view he took of the subject, this sovereign and independent state, having the same right to be represented on that floor as South Carolina or Tennessee, has been for a long time kept knocking at the doors of congress, and still they were shut against them. He would, having said this much, say nothing further on this part of the subject.

At the last session, and for some sessions previous to that, a very serious controversy had arisen between the state of Ohio and the territory of Michigan. What, he asked, did congress do in its great desire to see tranquillity and harmony restored between them? It passed the acts of 1836. And yet the senator from Ohio (Mr. Ewing) now wanted to see no such provision as that contained in the act of 1836, and which he (Mr. G.) believed to have been placed there by the committee in the proper discharge of their duty, and which he thought commendable in them.

Mr. Ewing explained. I contended for the third section. I thought it of no importance then, nor do I now.

Mr. Grundy resumed. He was speaking of the senator's exertions in regard to another bill, or other bills, which were introduced to fix the northern boundary of the state of Ohio; and before that was accomplished, senators insisted that Michigan could not be admitted into the union. Well, what was the objection now to her admission? None that he could see. But when the senate came to pass this act of admission they put in this section:

"That as a compliance with the fundamental condition of admission, contained in the last preceding section of this act, the boundaries of the said state of Michigan, as in that section described, declared, and established, shall receive the assent of a convention of delegates elected by the people of said state, for the sole purpose of giving the assent herein required," &c.

Now that was the provision to which this preamble has a reference. Did that section say that the legislative assembly of Michigan should call a convention to decide on the subject? Not a word did it contain to that effect. Did the constitution of Michigan authorize the calling of a convention on the part of the legislature? Not a word did the constitution contain on the subject. But the legislature did call a convention, and they refused to assent to the conditions contained in the act of congress.

Now, to judge that congress did not intend putting a legal construction on the section, that the intervention of the legislature should be necessary, let him suppose that the legislature should refuse to act, and consequently call no convention, and the people of Michigan had risen up una voce, and given their assent to the meeting in convention, would gentlemen have said "the convention must be called by the legislature?" Now this was the consent of the people of Michigan—of the population entitled to vote, residing there. And shall the legislature of that state have the power to refuse, or grant, that which the people may demand on so important a subject as this? It seemed to him it ought not to be required, and therefore the conclusion he drew from the question was, that the people have a right to convoke their assemblies, the delegates from which have a right to meet in convention, and there, if they deem proper, ratify the conditions prescribed by congress. If he were right in that conclusion, then the preamble was correct; and, if wrong, it ought to be struck out.

He felt no concern in regard to this branch of the subject at all. He was free to admit that, without the preamble, he was ready to vote for the bill. But for the third section of the act of 1836, let him tell the senate, Michigan would have been represented here and in the other house, long ago. Well, now, the people have been called upon in their primary capacity, and have given their assent to the conditions of congress, why should the senate cause further delay in admitting her? The senator from South Carolina had said it would not take long to have another convention. He (Mr. Grundy) admitted it; but every moment did her injury. Senators were, by delay, violating a greater principle than that of which the gentleman had spoken. It was a greater infraction of principle than any known to free government.

He admitted, with the senator from South Carolina, that the testimony establishing the fact of the assent of the people of Michigan was of great importance, and in this case not according to the strict rules of legality; yet the testimony was of such a character, that legislatures would not refuse to act upon it, although courts of justice would reject it, because not duly accredited by the oaths of witnesses. But did not senators do daily many acts upon testimony not on oath, but for which the statements of men of high standing, honor and honesty, guaranteed their truth?

What, he asked, was the amount of the testimony produced? Why, that between five and six thousand votes were given at the election of members for the convention in September last, and that from eight to nine thousand were given for the delegates who formed the convention in December. What was the object in calling upon the people of Michigan? It was to know whether they were willing to come into the union on the terms prescribed by the act of the 2d March, 1836. They have answered, and given their assent. In one county there was given at the first election for the delegates who were elected, 180 votes of a majority. These delegates constituted the majority in the first convention; and by their votes the assent of Michigan was refused. At the first election, about 1,700 votes were cast, including both parties. At the last election 1,900 votes were given in favor of the assenting party alone. The whole thing was changed, and must have been changed by the revolution of opinion.

Without going further into the subject, he wanted the senator from South Carolina to inform the senate how he would do justice to the people of Michigan, and, further, how the passage of the bill was to be obtained in any form. Would he send the people back again to a convention? The delay was unnecessary, and objections would be made of a similar character. Why should the senator not vote for the bill, the preamble being struck out? What difficulty was there in it? For his (Mr. G's) part, he could not see any. He contended that there was nothing of a political character in this matter, either on one side or the other; therefore, it was fairly on principle that a difference of opinion could be said to exist. In answer to the inquiry of the senator from South Carolina, "can congress call a convention in a state?" he answered, "no!" nor did it in this instance; neither does the preamble or bill give such a power, nor imply it. He would conclude his remarks by merely declaring, that whether the preamble should be stricken from the bill or not, he would vote for it.

Mr. Morris, on his first motion to strike out the preamble to the bill providing for the admission of Michigan into the union, said: The gentleman from South Carolina had correctly understood his object, which was to bring the principle contained in the preamble to the bill in a direct form before the senate for its decision. Although he entertained for the talents and ability of the senator from Tennessee the highest respect, yet, on this subject, he had entirely different views from those expressed by that gentleman; still he would say that, on this question, particularly on the doctrine contained in the preamble, the gentleman was unquestionably in error. He, however, agreed with the senator that Michigan ought to be admitted into the union; his mind had undergone no change on this point, for he was of the same opinion at the last session of congress; he was opposed to the principle contained in the third section of the act for her admission at the time of its passage, though he said nothing on the floor of the senate on the subject; he, at that time, considered this third section not only as unnecessary as it respected the rights of Ohio, but as unconstitutional and dangerous, and as requiring of the people of Michigan an act nugatory in itself, and humiliating in its consequences. He was anxious then, he was anxious now, that Michigan should be admitted without having any restriction or condition whatever imposed on her; he thought then, as he found the fact now, that the people of Michigan would view this provision, requiring their assent to the law of congress, as an act of supererogation, and one which the authority of the constitution did not warrant, and did not reach, and he had found both conventions which had lately been held in Michigan concur on this head, for both had denied the power of congress to require the assent which had been required in the third section of the act for their admission; nor did they submit or agree to give it as matter of right, but as matter of obedience only, and to prove to the country their love and attachment to the union.

Whenever Michigan shall be admitted, it ought to be on that high and elevated ground on which she desires to stand—a repeal of the third section of the act of last session. On this ground, Mr. M. said, he wished most ardently to place her citizens; and the passage of the bill without the preamble would accomplish that object, for he believed that it was a well-settled principle, that if the provisions of an act passed by the legislature be repugnant to the provisions of a former act, the former act is repealed without any express words being used for that purpose. This, then, was his first, though most inconsiderable reason, for wishing to strike out the preamble; for if his doctrine was true, as he verily believed it was, the passage of the act itself, without the lumber and incumbrance of the preamble, would fairly and honorably admit the state of Michigan at once. He had understood the senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) to say that if both the senators from Ohio were satisfied as to the northern boundary line of that state, he would have no objection to give his assent to the bill, provided the preamble was stricken out, after this declaration. If that were done, as he (Mr. M.) hoped it would be, he had but little doubt of the unanimous vote of the senate in favor of the admission; he could not possibly see any quarter from which objections would be made to it. Gentlemen had argued as if there was a party here who wished to keep Michigan out of the union; he was not one of those; and whatever gentlemen might say in argument, he did not suppose a single member harbored such a wish, but all were anxious for her admission the first moment it could be done without violation of constitutional duty, of principle, or of law. Although it has been attempted to be impressed upon the senate that the controversy which had existed between Ohio and Michigan, with regard to boundary, was one reason why the delegation from that state were opposed to the bill, he begged leave to undeceive gentlemen on this point, by assuring them that that was not the case: the course which Ohio had marked out for herself in that controversy had proved itself to be the correct one. Congress, by their act of last session, had given consent to the constitutional boundary of that state, and it had now become satisfactory, as well as obligatory on all parties, and thus the incumbrance which for so many years had been thrown over the title of Ohio by the act of congress of 1803, establishing the territory of Michigan, had been withdrawn, and the moment this was done the jurisdiction of Ohio over the disputed territory was complete. It is, then, by virtue of the constitution of the state that Ohio has taken jurisdiction over that portion of country; we cannot, for a moment, admit the idea that congress has given us any power to do so. Congress has only recognized the validity of our claim, and removed the difficulty the act of 1803 had created. He, therefore, as one of the senators from Ohio, was perfectly satisfied that the state of Michigan should be admitted without any reference to the Ohio boundary whatever. On this question doubts no longer remain as it respects Ohio, and he felt strongly disposed to remove from the people of Michigan the now unnecessary and humiliating condition which had been imposed on them, which condition he thought, in point of sound policy, was never required, nor did he believe that congress rightfully possessed the power to impose it.

But, sir, (said Mr. M.) the views which I have so far taken of this subject is a very important one, indeed, with the broad and dangerous principles for the preamble before us. He had for rich presented occupied some humble station in publicmen; no been somewhat acquainted with the legis it, of the country; that branch, more than any other, had occupied his attention, and he could say, in the most perfect sincerity, and with a clear conscience, that he never had heard, nor had he ever expected to hear, doctrines such as were recognized in the preamble to the bill, and such as had been openly and clearly avowed in the senate on the present occasion, and in support of the preamble now under discussion. The facts, as stated by the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun), with regard to the proceedings in Michigan, have often been repeated on this floor: they are well known, and need not be again detailed. Congress has recognized, even by the act of the 15th June, 1836, Michigan as a state; in the third section of that act she is no less than four times spoken of as a state. It is the state of Michigan, and not the people of the country, as abstract from the sovereignty of the state, that can rightfully respond to the law of congress; and it is only the voice of the people of the state, collected and expressed as a state, that ought to be received as creating any obligation on the part of congress, or, indeed, any obligation upon the state herself.

But, sir, what are we to understand by this word state? Do we mean an organized, or do we mean an unorganized, community? Do we mean a country governed by known and established laws? or do we mean one where the law shall never be known but when expressed by the public voice, through the medium of county conventions, or by an assemblage of the people at one particular place? If to the word state, or the expression, people of the state, we mean, as I contend is the only correct meaning, an organized community, a people who have associated together and provided, for the safety and security of ALL, written constitutions and laws, and also provided for the exercise of its sovereignty through the instrumentality of constituted tribunals, or a government of any other known and established character; if this be the case, then he contended that a state had but one mode and one medium through which it could express its opinions, or exercise its power; and that, in pursuance of its own constitution and laws, a state can be known or recognized under no other character, and, to use a figurative expression, it can neither think, speak, nor act in any other way. Well, sir, (said Mr. M.) what are the few facts to which this doctrine can be applied in the present case? The sovereign, but it would probably be more appropriate to say the physical or numerical, power of the people of Michigan, exercised in their primary assemblies, without the authority of any law of the state; and not only without the sanction of any constitutional provision, but in direct contravention of constitution and law, and by mere numerical strength, evidenced by a plurality of votes, have understood her to give the assent of the state to an act of congress, which is to remain obligatory upon the state in all time to come, and which the regular constituted authorities of the state have no power to control, and which the people themselves, according to the provisions of their own constitution, can never alter, abridge or amend; and it is the assent thus given that we are now so emphatically called upon to receive as the constitutional and legitimate will of the state.

Sir, (said Mr. M.) I cannot consent thus to humble any one of the sovereign states of this union.—Let it be constantly borne in mind that there have been two conventions assembled in Michigan, for the purpose of considering, or assenting to, the act of congress. The convention which first met was in pursuance of a law of the state especially passed for that purpose; that it was elected and organized according to the provisions of that law; that this convention dissented from the proposition of congress, or rather did not consent thereto; that subsequent to this decision it was that the people met in their primary assemblies, and the result was, that another convention was had. The documents furnished the senate inform us that in two counties no elections were held, and, of course, those counties were not represented in this latter convention, the president of which, in a communication to the president of the United States, says, that "the convention originated through primary meetings of the citizens of the several counties, in ample time to afford notice to the whole state; pursuant thereto elections, kept open for two days, on the 5th and 6th inst. (December), have been held in all the counties except Monroe and Macomb." This (Mr. M. said) was the relation of facts and circumstances to him entirely inexplicable; no time is mentioned as to the notice given, nor what kind of notice was thought necessary, or how the same was promulgated. This, as it appears to us, was mere matter of opinion, and might, in Michigan, depend very much on party views and party purposes. But the great principle, and indeed the argument, does not depend on these minor considerations. The question is, will congress recognize as valid, constitutional and obligatory, without the color of a law of Michigan to sustain it, an act done by the people of that state in their primary assemblies, and acknowledge that act as obligatory on the constituted authorities and legislature of the state? Are we prepared to subject all state power and state authority to the test of this principle? Our answer not only concerns Michigan, but ought, and, I trust, will be examined into by every state in the union; and, although Michigan at this moment may be the scapegoat, to bear off this power into the western wilderness, yet it may, and can be found convenient to apply it to other states. Are we prepared for this application? Is the great question now about to be decided? I would most seriously call upon all state rights men to look well to this matter. Do you love and venerate your own constitution and laws, the only guaranty you have for all your personal, social and political rights? Are you willing to subject them all to this tremendous power? Congress may have a favorite measure to accomplish, which may come in collision with state power.—How easy to overcome this power, by doing what is now claimed to be right in Michigan; pass an act requiring the people of the state to give their assent to it, or permitting them, if you please, to do so; send amongst them your agents and emissaries, to induce calls for primary assemblies; to hold a convention to suit your views; obtain the act of assent by such convention, and your whole purpose is answered. The state is under your feet; you are the master-spirit that directs its movements; and you would have the right to call upon the executive power of the country to see that your laws were faithfully executed. Why, sir, but yesterday, and we might have looked on this picture as fancy only; but it is now fast assuming the character of fact, and we may awaken to the reality before we are aware. All that has been suggested, and much more, may take place under the sanction of the broad principle now contended for. Let it not be said that we are unnecessarily alarmed, and that the argument is carried to extremes. We always test principles by the extent to which they can, consistent with themselves, be carried into effect. Suppose congress should have a favorite project to carry through a state, say the state of South Carolina, for instance, a road or a canal, which all would agree could not be done without the consent of the state, and congress should pass an act in terms precisely those used in the act for the admission of Michigan, and the legislature of the state should be convened to consider the proposition, or should provide for the election of a convention, who should meet and reject the same. If, after all this, some person should be found possessing influence sufficient, either with or without the patronage of this government, to obtain a majority of the qualified electors of the state, or even of the whole body of the people, both male and female, no matter how expressed, whether by convention or otherwise, would any man say that this was sufficient authority for congress to proceed with the contemplated work? No! none would be found to avow this at once; yet to this length will the doctrine lead.

Sir, the matter can be brought home to our doors in Ohio; we have had a controversy partaking of this character with the bank of the United States; the legislature of the state denied the power of congress to authorise the bank to send a branch into the state without its consent. Suppose the charter had contained a provision that a branch might be sent into any state by the "assent of a convention of delegates, elected by the said state, for the sole purpose of giving such assent." Suppose, sir, this had been the original charter of the bank, and a convention of delegates had been gotten up, and have forced upon the state the power of the bank, contrary to her own constitution and laws, and against the express will of the legislature. I ask every citizen of Ohio what would have been his opinion and feelings on a state of things of this kind? For my own part, as a citizen of that state, I had rather see Ohio struck at once from the union, than that a doctrine of this kind should be considered orthodox and prevail in practice. We might wander for a while at large, and find a resting place; but when once swallowed up by this government, our power of action would entirely cease. Then, indeed, would we have no government of our own; we would be but mere automata in the hands of those who administer this government. They would be the judges both as to the time and manner of our acting, and of the validity of the records of those acts. Would not this be the condition of the states if we adopt and maintain this dangerous principle? a principle which admits a state into the union without law and without record, so far as the state has any action in the case. It is true, as was observed by the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun), that good precedents are soon forgotten, while bad ones live forever. He (Mr. M.) contended that the principle contained in the preamble to the bill was vicious in the extreme. Shall we then countenance it? Shall we maintain it? He trusted not.

He said he was somewhat surprised, he confessed, to hear the doctrine that had been advanced by the senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Buchanan). That gentleman, if he understood him correctly, not only sustained the proceedings of the last convention in Michigan, but contended that, if it had not assented, the people would have gone on, even ad infinitum, to elect conventions, until they obtained one which would give the assent. A doctrine so latitudinarian as this (he said) he could by no means admit. It was a doctrine that unloosed all the obligations of society, and dissolved government into its original elements.

In a controversy of this kind he would not fear to meet the gentleman, even in his own state, in which as far as he knew, this doctrine had been first promulgated to the country. He would call the attention of the senator to a public letter from the pen of a very distinguished citizen of that state; that letter had been made public, and of course was public property, and liable to public examination. The doctrine, he contended, contained in it, was revolutionary in its nature; it went to prove, as he understood it, that the right of revolution was a right inherent in the very nature of our institutions; a doctrine which he could not admit as correct, and one which went to prove that we had no stability whatever in our government. This doctrine was broached in a state whose citizens had always proved themselves sound republicans; democratic sons of democratic fathers; and he felt highly gratified in finding that in that state this doctrine had fallen still-born from the press; it was at once rebuked by the good sound democratic sense of the people, and he thought had gone to the tomb of the Capulets; but he feared it was but the precursor of more extensive operations of a system, which, while it flattered the pride and vanity of the people, was stealing from them every vestige of liberty, and undermining the foundation of all their social institutions. The case of Maryland had been mentioned; the plea in that case was, if he understood it correctly, that the legislature of the state having, as some thought, neglected to adopt such measures as the wants of the people required, that the people or rather a majority of the people had the right, by a convention, elected without the authority of any law, to put down the whole frame of government, and establish a new government with new powers and new agents in its stead; that in fact the majority of the people of a state had the right to form a government to suit their own convenience, without any regard to the rights of the minority as secured under the existing government; this he considered the first act in the grand drama, by which he feared that public institutions, made for the safety of all, were to be abolished for the special benefit of a part; it was the mere precursor of more energetic and extensive operations. Suppose a few of the large states should be disposed to think that the senatorial representation in congress was unequal; that it was absurd and derogatory to the rights of the people that New York should have no more power in this body than Delaware, and should wish to change the present order of things. True it is that the constitution of the United States has provided that no state, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the senate; but what of that? This according to the argument we have heard, is but a subordinate right, always subject to the constitutional power of the people; let conventions be holden, elected by the people in their primary assemblies according to mere numbers, and less than half a dozen of the most populous states would swallow up the twenty smaller ones, who now, by giving their assent to this doctrine, do homage to the larger states for their liberties, and appear willing to rely on them, and not on the constitution, as the security for their rights. It would be well that we should always remember that our fathers did not expend their blood and treasure to establish a government resting alone upon popular breath, but one founded on written constitutions and laws for the security of all, and in the formation of which all had an equal right to participate.

But, sir, suppose all that has been urged against the facts as they appear in this case should be deemed insufficient to show that the principle upon which the admission of Michigan is made to rest is founded in mistaken and erroneous views, yet he contended that there was no certain or conclusive evidence to show that the consent of the people of Michigan had ever been given, as required by the act of congress. Who are the people of Michigan, within the meaning of that act? Surely the qualified voters of that state and none other; no one will contend for an opposite construction; what evidence, then, have we that the convention which gave the assent was elected by the proper persons? None at all; for aught we know, or for aught that appears in any part of the documents furnished the senate, there is no conclusive evidence that the people of Michigan ever did give their assent to the act of congress. That the people of that state are desirous of being admitted into the union he had little doubt; but insisted that certain forms were necessary before that admission could take place. The evidence furnished to prove a compliance with those forms he considered entirely incomplete and unsatisfactory. True, as the senator from Tennessee has said, we have evidence founded on publications in newspapers, the statements of individuals, and copies of the proceedings of the convention itself, but none of these come to us under oath, or under the forms of official proceedings. The gentleman's opinion is, that evidence thus furnished ought to be considered sufficient to found an act of legislation upon; to this he said he agreed; but was the present a mere question of general or local policy, to operate in future? He thought not. It was a question of a judicial character. Deciding upon the proper construction of an existing law, and the facts that were to determine the rights of citizens under that law, we assumed here the character of judges, rather than legislators; and he thought it indispensably necessary that at least the shadow of judicial evidence should be preserved; and he contended that, in this case, even that shadow did not appear. In measures of naked policy, the argument of the gentleman might safely be admitted, but he repudiated its application in the present case. If evidence of a higher nature exists, it is somewhat extraordinary that it has not been furnished the senate. If we are to rely exclusively on the popular vote of the people of the state, we ought to have some evidence of the votes given, and by whom. Does a single gentleman here know, by any evidence furnished, whether the persons who voted on the 5th and 6th days of December for members to a convention were qualified electors or not? No: not one of us has any evidence on that point. How, then, are we to judge of the validity of the vote, or the rights of the convention? None of the proceedings were authorized by a state law, and thus stamping them with the solemnity of state authority; nor have we any parol evidence, even without oath, at all satisfactory on this point. It is most extraordinary that we are not furnished with any evidence as to who the voters were that cast their votes for the election of members to the convention by whom the assent was given; and we may ask, and not without reason, who were they, or by what rule or authority their votes were collected and counted? No one here knows any thing on the subject.

Sir, the history of the day informs us that the tide of emigration into the state of Michigan has for a year or two past been immense: not only citizens of the United States, but foreigners, who have reached our shores in shoals, have found their way into that part of our country. Have we any evidence that this class of men were not the persons, in a good degree, who have thus undertaken to remodel the constitution of Michigan, and with it the very principles of our government? Was it this class of men, or any portion of them, that have undertaken to give the assent of Michigan to her boundaries, as prescribed by congress? Have we, I repeat again, any evidence to prove that this is not the class of persons who elected the second convention? We have no such evidence. There is another view of this subject, not unworthy our notice. The election appears to have been held two days in each county, and he should be glad to be informed who it was that selected the days, and the number of days in which the election was holden; who it was that gave the notice of the place and manner of conducting the elections. Was it proclaimed by one individual or was it made known by an assemblage of citizens in one county to the citizens of another county?—Did the county of A send a special messenger to the county of B, and so throughout the state, or did the people act simultaneously by instinct or impulse? Was the voting by ballot in one county, and visa voce in another, and in a third by the holding up of hands or counting of heads? All these facts, he contended, were entirely unknown to the senate; and yet we were called to declare, by the solemn enactment of a law, that the people of Michigan, in proper form, had given their assent to the condition imposed on them by the act of congress. He contended that the senate was about to establish the truth of a fact about which they had heard but little, except from public rumor, paragraphs in party newspapers, or from the statements and assertions of individuals not under the obligations of an oath. This, he thought, would be a most dangerous decision, pronounced at a very inauspicious time. The condition of the country is at this time peculiar, if not alarming. He said he felt it his duty to express his opinions honestly, as he entertained them; and he regretted much that duty seemed to require him to comment on the existing state of things. Almost every newspaper on which he laid his hands contained the history of crimes almost without number, and strongly impressed upon his mind the idea that men began to think it right to take the administration of justice into their own hands, and dispense what they believed it to be, entirely without any of the forms of law.

He had read of punishments of the highest nature being inflicted by the order of assemblies of the people in some of the states, who had conducted their proceedings with all the formality and gravity no doubt that the convention of Michigan had conducted theirs. He had read, with some surprise as well as regret, advertisements in newspapers in different cities, offering for sale fine duelling pistols, and pistols for the belt and the pocket, Bowie-knives, and like instruments well calculated for the taking of human life, offered as convenient articles, necessary for the convenience or comfort of man. He had no recollection of seeing, until very lately, advertisements of this kind; and the question very naturally pressed itself upon his mind, what does all this mean? Does it not prove to us that men are endeavoring to place themselves entirely above the power of the law, and do that which they think to be right in their own eyes? He thought that it was high time for the whole constituted authorities of the country to use all proper means to circumscribe the entire action of the people within the strict limits of the law, before the restraint of law was lost sight of altogether. Recognize (said Mr. M.) that the people of Michigan may, in this informal manner, dispense with the constitution and laws of their own state, and you at the same time recognize the doctrine that numerical strength alone shall have precedence in point of obligation to the most solemn legal enactments. It seemed to him there was at that moment a powerful responsibility resting on congress, and that they ought to proceed with the most serious deliberation. He had heard for a year or two past much said about the abuse of executive power; but, said he, we are about to change the question, and to establish here dangerous assumptions of legislative power. By the act of the 15th of June, the fact of Michigan having assented to the conditions of that act, is to be ascertained by the president of the United States alone; he is made the sole judge when the assent is given, and is to make the same known by proclamation. Has he found the fact to exist, or has he issued his proclamation? No; he has done neither. He informs us that one convention, elected and convened in pursuance of a law of the state, has not given its assent. He also informs us that another convention had met, and did assent; and he further says that if the proceedings of this latter convention had come to him in the recess of congress, he would have issued his proclamation in conformity with the provision of the act of congress, if he was satisfied that this convention, in all respects, had accorded with the will of the people of Michigan. The president was not satisfied that such facts existed upon which his proclamation ought to issue, and he referred the whole proceedings to congress; and this very reference ought to prove to us that the fact did not exist, and that Michigan had not complied with the conditions required of her, and he referred it in order that the restrictions might be removed; but, instead of removing the restrictions, we are about to find the fact of assent. He was anxious that this question should come to an issue, and that Michigan should come into the union, but was not willing to sacrifice any principle to attain even this desirable end. He thought it would be better for the people of Michigan themselves, and more satisfactory, if they were kept a little longer out of the union, rather than have a principle adopted which both of her conventions had declared to be unconstitutional.—He trusted, however, that the difficulties might be remedied in the way suggested by the chairman of the committee, for he understood the gentleman to say that he viewed the preamble as of little consequence, and would vote for the bill if it was stricken out; yet he would feel himself bound to retain it, although he considered it perfectly harmless and nugatory.

Now, if this was the case, he hoped the gentleman, in courtesy, would at once agree to let it be stricken out by the senate, without his vote, as he believed it to be entirely unimportant, while other gentlemen believed it involved a dangerous princi-and would compel them to vote against the bill; and he fully believed that if the gentleman would thus give his assent, and the obvious preamble was stricken out, there would be a dissenting voice to the admission of the state into the union. He could see no prejudice that would result in pursuing this course to boundaries of either Ohio or Indiana; their boundaries were already settled, and could not be disturbed, whether the preamble was retained or not. A great deal (said Mr. M.) has been said about Michigan having extended her jurisdiction over part of the territory belonging to Ohio and Indiana; but, if he understood the constitution of Michigan, no definite boundary was established by that instrument. It was in the preamble to the constitution it was to be found, and in that alone. It was there provided that the people inhabiting the territory, as established by the act of congress 1805, formed for themselves a state government; and he considered as creating no difficulty as it respected the question of boundary, either with Ohio or Indiana. He therefore most sincerely hoped the honorable chairman would give his assent to thus striking out the preamble; for, with it, he thought impossible to vote for the bill.

The honorable chairman (he said) had told us at this was not a party or political question. He agreed with him that it was not. He felt that he ought to approach it as a judge; and so far as he was advised of the important principle involved in the case, he would endeavor to decide upon it according to the dictates of his best judgment. He stated that no senator would give his vote on this question under the influence of party or political feelings. However (said Mr. M.) we may be attached to party for the purpose of favoring political views as to future policy, yet, when we come to a question of the magnitude of the one before us, we must decide it upon higher grounds, and suffer ourselves to be influenced by the sound principles of justice only. If Michigan was not a state, when would her existence as a state commence? If she was a state at the time the act of the 15th of June last was passed, she could only speak, or, rather, make known her will as such state, and, therefore, the assent of this latter convention was not her act. If (said he) we recognize her as a state, we must date her existence from the time she adopted her constitution; and if her senators and representatives who have been elected to congress are entitled to seats, then, indeed, was she a state, to all intents and purposes, from that time; and the convention which afterwards met without authority, was in derogation of all her state rights.

No gentleman, he presumed, would deny this; and yet we are about to set up the acts of certain unauthorized individuals as above the constituted authorities of the state. There was one circumstance which he deemed somewhat material, which he wished to notice. The number of delegates which composed the first convention was forty-nine, and he took it for granted that the law of Michigan prescribed this number. But the convention which gave its assent to the act of congress was composed of seventy-two members; how happened this? Was this a movement by which certain gentlemen in the state were to be put up, and others put down? Who apportioned to one county twelve delegates, the sixth part of the whole number, while an adjoining county sent but two?—Where was the power in Michigan to make this discrimination, except the legislative power? Sir, (said Mr. M.) admit the truth of this preamble, and then the legitimate lengths to which it may be carried, and we dissolve the very elements of government, and reduce its power to physical or numerical force. It is through anarchy that we arrive at despotism. Submit this to any state, even to Michigan herself, freed from duress, and no one would agree to it. He was sure it never would be assented to in his own state; her people had no authority to change her political condition, even by the consent or advice of congress, but only through their own legislature, and in the manner and form in which they had bound themselves to each other in their own constitution. It has been said that the first step from correct principles was taken with more difficulty than others which followed; as in morals so in politics. If we once let go our hold on the constitution, for any purpose whatever, we may soon find it convenient to dispense with it on most, if not on every occasion. These (Mr. M. said) were his views on this important question, delivered, to be sure, in a desultory and unconnected manner; and he returned his thanks to the senate for their patient attention.

Mr. Strange said he should detain the senate but a moment or two, for, in his judgment, there was not space for much pertinent argumentation on the subject under consideration. He did not perceive the alarming consequences from the adoption of the preamble, which presented themselves to the minds of other gentlemen; nor, indeed, did he much care, except so far as it might be gratifying to others to retain it, whether the preamble accompanied the bill or not. The retention of it struck him as being an exceedingly simple matter, involving no assertion either dangerous or untrue. Congress at the last session passed a law constituting Michigan one of the states of this union upon a particular condition therein prescribed, and the preamble merely asserted the performance of that condition. And what was that condition? Why, that the people of Michigan should hold a convention, and agree therein to be bound by the territorial limits prescribed by congress to that state.—Have the people of Michigan complied with that condition? Has she held her convention, and given the assent required? It was not denied, as he understood, that a convention had been holden, but the manner of holding it was objected to. He was not aware that either the common law or any statute prescribed any mode of assembling conventions; and no mode was prescribed in the act of congress imposing upon Michigan the condition of holding this convention; and it was rather hard now, after she had holden her convention, to tell her that she could take nothing by it, because it had not been properly holden, although no landmarks for her guidance were laid down by the common law or statute, and congress herself had neglected to indicate any mode in which a convention might be constituted satisfactory to herself. Michigan was left, as we are still left, to the plain dictates of common sense, that a convention was an assemblage of the people of a community, in person or by their agents or representatives, no matter how assembled; and by that plain principle of common sense she has a right to ask that she shall be tried. How was the government under which we live put in operation, but through the action of the primary assemblages of the people? And who has ever dared to question the propriety of that result? And is Michigan now to be told, in the absence of all law, and in the face of such examples, that there was a particular mode of action, the only legitimate and proper one? The report of the chairman of the judiciary committee shows that Michigan has holden a convention and given her assent, and it is not denied that a convention has been holden, and the assent thereby given; but gentlemen say it is not a legitimate convention, but do not show us what is necessary to constitute a legitimate convention. It has been assumed, in the argument of this matter, that Michigan is a state. If so, there is nothing left, it seemed to him, either to dispute or legislate about. The senators and representatives from that state were entitled to their seats without further action. He was not prepared to admit that she was a state. She was unquestionably once a territory, the property of this union, and could only rise to the dignity of a sovereign state by the consent of congress, properly given. Congress had given this consent, but it was accompanied with certain conditions, which conditions must be performed ere the consent could take effect; and whether these conditions had been performed, was the very matter under consideration. He denied that there was any chrysalis state in which she ceased to be a territory, and yet was not a member of this union. The transition must necessarily be instantaneous from territorial existence to that of membership in the union. Until she became a state, she continued to be a territory, and only ceased to be a territory when she became a state in the union. Her existence as a state, and her membership in the union, were the contemporaneous effects of one action.

If he rightly understood the reason why congress had imposed this condition upon Michigan, it was, that there might be no future difficulty between her and the states of Ohio and Indiana relative to boundary. Congress could never decide the judicial question as to what effect any or all the circumstances should have upon the rights of the several parties. As a matter of prudence, she might ask conditions which might, in her judgment, tend to peace, but it remained to the judicial tribunals of the country only to decide ultimately upon their regularity and effect. A rigid technical course was therefore unbefitting congress, and nothing remained for her at present but to ascertain, upon broad and liberal principles, whether the condition required of Michigan had been performed.

Some reference had been made to the state of Maryland in the course of the argument, which, by the way, he did not think at all parallel to the case of Michigan; but as it had been mentioned, he would say, that if the people of Maryland, or any other state, thought proper at any time, by a convention, however originated or organized, to change her constitution, congress would have no right to interfere, unless she departed from a republican form of government. It was an affair entirely domestic; and the authority of congress to intermeddle in the matter, under any circumstances, could only be by force of the fourth section of the fourth article of the constitution of the United States, by which a republican form of government is guaranteed by the United States to the states respectively. The evil of such a course, if any, would be confined to the citizens of the state itself, and neither the general government, nor that of any other state, would have a right to interfere as long as the republican form of government was preserved. But the case of Michigan fell far short of this, and in his judgment involved no question which could alarm the most apprehensive. It was a case which could only occur on the formation and admission of new states, and could be drawn into precedent under no other circumstances. The simple question, he repeated, was, has Michigan complied with the conditions required of her? The preamble affirmed that she had, and, believing it to be true, he should vote for retaining it.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.

The committee of ways and means, to which were referred the message of the president recommending a reduction of the revenue to the wants of the government; the report of the secretary of the treasury on the finances; a memorial praying for a distribution of the surplus revenue, and many memorials praying for a repeal of the duties on foreign merchandise, submit the following report:

The balance in the treasury on the 1st of January last, as near as it can be now ascertained, of available funds, was $42,468,859 97. There was probably placed to the credit of the treasurer before that date, of which no account had been received, about one million in addition, and the government held, on public account, $6,244,600, par value, of stock in the bank of the United States, which at 114 per cent. amounts to $7,106,804. The aggregate amount of money, and other means possessed by government on the 1st of January, was upwards of fifty millions five hundred thousand dollars.—The appropriations unexpended at the close of the year, and required to complete the service of 1836, amounted to $13,561,373 35. Of this amount but $6,000,000 can be properly charged against the surplus, as about seven to eight millions remain unexpended at the end of almost every year. The surplus of means, on the 1st of January, may therefore be estimated at $44,500,000.

The revenue of the past year from customs, as nearly as it can be ascertained and estimated at the treasury, was $28,000,000 from customs, and $24,500,000 from public lands, and from all other sources 620,000 dollars, making an aggregate of $48,120,000.

The excess of revenue beyond the proper wants of government, though now assuming greater importance than it did formerly, has existed for some years past, and originated in the policy of revising our tariff so frequently since our war with Great Britain, without regard to the condition of the treasury. High rates of duty were levied to protect particular branches of industry, and a very large revenue was raised, which was absorbed in our public debt, till that was extinguished.

Other causes have, however, combined to produce our present redundant revenue, and to give an impulse to trade generally. The sudden and rapid increase during the last five years, may be ascribed, in a measure, to British and American legislation. The former, after prohibiting them for a century, authorized the unlimited creation of joint stock banks, not redeeming their notes in gold or silver, but in the notes of the bank of England, which were made a lawful tender. On our side, we have added since 1829, $45,083,207 to our metallic currency; and since 1830 we have increased our banking capital from 110,000,000 to about $330,000,000; thus extending our paper circulation probably $60,000,000. The currency of no country can be so suddenly increased, without encouraging general speculation, and producing a very considerable expansion of commercial credits. Trade and revenue have been accordingly affected by it. Our exports, which were at fifty millions in 1823, rose in 1835 to one hundred and one millions; and those of 1836 were more than one hundred and twenty millions. Our imports deducting the amount exported, and excluding coin and bullion, were in 1829, 49,500,000 dollars; and in 1835 $123,000,000, and in the past year probably $150,000,000.

The annual receipts from the sales of the public land in 1830, were less than two millions and a half; and in 1836, $24,500,000; and a much larger increase would have occurred in our revenue from customs, had not the duty on nearly one-half of our imports been repealed. The produce of our agriculture, and one-half in value, if not in extent, of the whole territory of the country, have become objects of speculation, contributing to enlarge very considerably the mass of commercial contracts and credits.

The revenue of forty-seven millions and a half from customs and public lands in the past year, is obviously not to be relied upon as our permanent income. The spirit of speculation is already checked, and the probable embarrassments of the winter will sensibly affect the receipts in the present and the next year. But in the actual condition of our country, sustained as its prosperity is, by powerful and permanent causes, we are not authorised to anticipate the extraordinary decline in our revenue which occurred after the disastrous revulsion in 1819—the consequence of a sudden transition from war to peace. In adjusting our revenue to the future wants of government, we should reflect that this is the first opportunity we have had, since the adoption of our constitution, to enlarge our foreign trade, and develop the resources of our extensive confederacy. At the outset we had but four years of uninterrupted commerce. In the second period but seven, from 1800 to 1807: and even after the close of the war in 1815, the trade of the country was convulsed for six years by the change from war to peace, the sudden increase of state banks, and the fluctuating operations of the bank of the United States. The speculations of 1825 were very much confined in this country to one branch of trade, and were of British, not American, origin. No general prostration of our trade, internal and external, has occurred for sixteen years; and to this, more than to any temporary or legislative cause, the existing prosperity of the country ought to be ascribed.

Our revenue from customs is sustained by permanent causes, and although it will fall off during the present and in the next year, it must increase with the growing foreign trade of the country. The cotton manufactures of Europe are steadily increasing. In Great Britain the average increase from 1834 to 1836, was twenty per cent. In this country, the crop of cotton in the past year, is estimated at 1,570,000 bales; being 210,000 more than was produced in 1835. It must also be observed, that while the spirit of speculation has raised other commodities to extravagant prices, cotton, other articles of export, and foreign merchandise generally, the sources of our revenue, have not been much higher than usual. A crisis in commercial affairs could not, therefore, as in 1819, cause any very considerable reduction, and any decline would be but temporary. The rapid growth too of our wealth and population, and the extension of our settled territory, enlarge the demand for foreign supplies, and in any prospective adjustment of the tariff, the permanent increase of our foreign commerce should be more regarded than a temporary depression resulting from overtrading.

We may anticipate a greater decline in our revenue from public lands, though not to the extent which has been estimated. The receipts in the last quarter, notwithstanding the extraordinary demand for money were, as nearly as they can be ascertained, four millions and a half. The revenue for the present and the next year, will fall far below that of 1836; but in estimating our future income from our public lands, we must not be governed by the annual receipts in former years. Many causes exist now, which must considerably enlarge this source of revenue. We have within six years purchased of the Indians ninety millions of acres within our settled boundaries, and removed the tribes beyond the Mississippi. This must accelerate the sale and settlement of these lands. We have too within a few years rapidly multiplied our internal improvements in the interior, in every direction, and in many instances, through large tracts of the public lands. It is as easy for the emigrant to reach Illinois at this time, as it was to go to Utica in New York twenty years ago. The area of settlement is thus enlarged in the south, and in the west, to an extent very far beyond its former boundaries. The states in the north west are growing with astonishing rapidity; while the laboring population of Maryland, Virginia and North Carolina, is rapidly moving off to the south western states.

Should the sales of our public lands be limited to actual settlers, as is proposed by the committee on public lands, some, though not a very considerable reduction in the revenue, may be anticipated. Nothing short of suspending the sales, a policy which this government never would adopt, can prevent us from receiving a large income from this source.

One, and not the least of the evils resulting from a surplus revenue, is an extraordinary increase of our federal expenses. A part of this increase has been caused by extinguishing Indian titles, and removing the tribes. We have appropriated for these objects, since the 4th of March, 1829, 26,982,068 dollars; and our Indian wars have and will cost us not less than $18,000,000, making an aggregate of about $40,000,000. Such heavy expenditures, for similar objects, cannot be anticipated hereafter, and our federal expenses for all purposes ought not to be estimated at more than twenty millions of dollars. Even that amount is much more than we have hitherto deemed compatible with the necessary wants of an economical government; and a just regard to economy should prevent us at least from making provision, in anticipation, for a larger government expenditure.

Unless, however, prompt measures are taken to reduce our revenue, we may anticipate a rapid increase of our expenses, and the recurrence, in a few years, of another surplus for deposit or distribution. To avoid these evils, the only safe and prudent course is to diminish the income of the government. The committee are of opinion that some unnecessary taxes, not yielding much revenue, may be repealed, and that a general reduction should be made in one or the other sources of our income to the extent of seven millions of dollars.—The actual condition of our finances does not warrant a less reduction.

Without arresting the progress of the settlement of the country, this reduction cannot be made in our receipts from public lands. But even if such an unwise and unjust proposition were made, and the question should be presented whether we should relinquish our income from this source, or reduce our revenue from customs, there are great considerations, involving even the stability of our confederacy, why the latter should be preferred to the former.

Our public lands are the common property of the union in the ratio to representation. No tax can ever be imposed, the burden of which will, in the spirit of our federal constitution, fall in the like ratio among the states. On the contrary, the revenue from customs is the most unequal and unjust plan of taxation that could have been devised; and the design of our constitution will never be fulfilled until it is wholly reformed. The agricultural states should never permit a common fund to be destroyed, or permanently distributed, in order that, by perpetuating our taxes upon manufactures, the chief burden of supporting the federal government should be thrown upon them.

In justice to the new as well as to the old states, the sales of the public lands ought not to be suspended, nor should they be converted into a fund for annual distribution among the states. Whatever reduction is made should fall upon our revenue from customs. In examining the various articles upon which duties are now levied, the committee find very few remaining that do not directly or indirectly come in competition with some branches of our own industry. Those which are exclusively foreign do not yield an aggregate amount of duty exceeding one hundred thousand dollars. Many others, which have been heretofore classed among the non-protected articles, might be included in the favored list, with quite as much justice as those which have been so considered ever since it has been the policy of government to make any such distinction. But if the duties on all that are classed with the non-protected were repealed, it would not reduce the revenue one million of dollars. An adequate reduction cannot be made without diminishing or repealing the duties on what are denominated protected articles; in other words, without modifying the act of the 2d of March, 1833, commonly called the compromise act.

In approaching this question, the committee are fully aware of the importance of the interests involved, and of the anxiety of capitalists who are extensively engaged in the manufacture or production of commodities which may be affected by any reduction of our taxes. But the question whether we shall continue to sustain their income by our laws, must yield to the indispensable necessity of reducing our revenue to the wants of the government. The actual condition of our finances demands this and makes it our duty to examine thoroughly the foundation upon which the claims of our capitalists to exclusive and perpetual protection rest, and to exhibit the very unjust operation of the compromise act upon the people and states of our confederacy.

Prior to 1816, the primary object of every duty was to support government, and pay the public debt; every tariff and every tax originated in a want of money. The duties were levied on imports generally, and the encouragement of manufactures was wholly incidental to the power of collecting a revenue from customs. There was no distinction, then, between protected and non-pro-TECTED articles; for the latter were generally taxed at the highest rates. When a duty was proposed as a tax, and defended as an incidental encouragement to some branch of industry at home, it was uniformly advocated as a temporary burden upon the consumer, for which he would be indemnified in a few years by a cheaper domestic supply. The government wanted money, the taxes were moderate, and the consumers seldom troubled themselves to inquire into the wisdom of the discriminations, or the soundness of the principles, of congress.

At the close of the war with Great Britain, the manufactures of the country had been protected for eight years by an almost total prohibition of foreign merchandise, and by the sacrifices of agriculture and commerce. When peace returned, the latter interests were destined again to prosper, and there was danger that the sudden renewal of our intercourse with foreign nations, with whom we exchanged productions, would give a blow to manufactures from which they would not recover in many years. There was a general desire to moderate the shock, and the duties levied by the tariff of 1816, were in some instances higher than would have been otherwise adopted; and necessarily much higher than they were before the war, owing to its heavy expenses. From that time a struggle occurred at almost every session, for more protection, and the duties were continually raised till they reached their maximum in 1828. Various expedients were resorted to, to sustain them. Our expenditures were rapidly increased without the least regard to economy, to create a necessity for revenue. The duties on merchandise exclusively of foreign origin were repealed to preserve our protecting duties; and now, when all these expedients have failed, an attempt is made, not only to perpetuate, but to increase them by annually distributing the proceeds of our public lands.

The system was modified by the acts of the 14th July, 1832, and the 2d of March, 1833. This last act, though proposing a reduction of duty, contains some provisions to take effect in 1842, which will probably be repealed. To exact cash duties, and to deny to our foreign trade the privilege of deposit, is a policy which has never yet been introduced into any other civilized commercial country; and to assess the duty on the market value of foreign merchandise, at every port in the United States, would give us as many rates of duties as we have ports, in direct violation of the constitution. But the committee do not propose to anticipate the discussion of these questions, or any of the provisions of the act of 1833, which do not interfere with the proposed reduction of the revenue. They deem it, however, important to examine the principle of the compromise act, and to expose its unjust operation at this time.

The modern innovation upon our ancient plan of levying duties on foreign merchandise, generally by collecting our revenue, exclusively from that portion which comes in competition with our own industry, reverses the whole design of the constitution; which certainly contemplated that our taxes for federal purposes should be levied in a ratio to representation as nearly as it was practicable.

The previous acts, repealing duties on non-protected articles, and the act of March, 1833, are calculated to make our taxes as unequal as possible. There is a wide difference between the operation of a tariff on merchandise similar to our own and on that which is exclusively foreign. When we collect twenty millions on the latter, the duties are general through the union, and the price of no corresponding commodity at home is raised by it. The tariff operates as a tax to that extent, and no further, and the whole amount goes into the treasury for the support of government. No man gains any advantage over another, and no state is made tributary to any capitalist, or corporation. But when twenty millions are collected on protected articles, the tax indirectly extends to the whole mass of our own productions, and manufactures, which are raised in price, and a much greater amount is levied upon the consumers of the country, in addition to the twenty millions for the support of government. In 1835 the merchandise imported for consumption liable to duty, deducting the value exported, amounted to about sixty-six millions, and yielded a duty of twenty millions. The value of similar merchandise of domestic origin in that year, may be estimated at about 250,000,000 dollars. Some of these branches, especially those beyond the mountains, are not so much affected by our duties; but the prices of far the largest proportion are regulated in a great measure by the tax we impose. Assuming that articles of the value of only $150,000,000, were so affected, and to the extent of 25 per cent. which is less than the actual duty on imported merchandise, the internal tax on the consumers in 1835, amounted to $37,500,000, in addition to the twenty millions which went into the treasury. It is impossible to ascertain what amount of tax these protected branches of industry have for their own profit, and to pay the difference between American and European labor, thus indirectly collected from the consumers since 1789. But we know that the latter have paid on foreign merchandise, from 1789 to 1836, inclusive, (see statement A), more than $682,000,000, besides probably thirty millions for the expenses of collection. More than one-half of this aggregate has been levied on protected articles. Although we cannot ascertain the amount of this internal tax upon the consumers for the last forty-eight years, we can form some estimate of it in late years. At the manufacturers' convention in New York in 1831, they estimated the annual product of their industry, omitting some branches, at more than two hundred millions. From their great and uninterrupted prosperity since then, the annual value of their products at the present time, ought probably to be estimated at $300,000,000. If the larger proportion of this amount is not raised in value by duties on foreign merchandise, then are they, as protecting duties, wholly inoperative and unnecessary. This indirect tax upon the consumption of our own productions, cannot be estimated at less than twice the amount of duty collected on similar foreign merchandise, or forty millions annually.

The prices of protected produce and manufactures at home and abroad, are regulated by the industry of those countries where labor is uniformly cheaper than it is in the United States. Until our population resembles that of Europe, and our climate is as genial as that of the sugar islands, our consumers must pay for both foreign and domestic merchandise, a price equal to the cost abroad, the charges of importation, the duty and the merchants' profit upon all. How much the aggregate of all these amounts to in the progress of near half a century, it is impossible to calculate. We know, however, that one of the items amounts to more than $350,000,000; and the princely establishments scattered over the U. States, and the fact that the annual produce of their industry may be estimated at $300,000,000, afford ample evidence that other treasures than that of the government, have drawn a much larger amount from the labor of the consumers.

Such is the operation of those protecting duties, which it is proposed to continue, for the purpose of dividing our surplus revenue, hereafter. Such the system of taxation which the compromise act, as it is called, makes perpetual in a confederacy of states, three-fourths of which are not engaged to any extent in these protected branches of industry. According to the provisions and indirect operation of that act, we must levy sixty millions annually upon the consumption of the country, in order to collect twenty for the use of government. The entire population of most, and a large majority of all the states, must be forever compelled by our laws to sustain immense and powerful establishments, which are overshadowing all other branches of industry; while our privileged capitalists and corporations are alone to be, in effect, exempt from taxation, well satisfied with a reciprocity of duties so long as they are ultimately indemnified by an indirect tax upon the other interests of the country.

In other countries, with a crowded population and a consolidated government, this system is less expensive, though manifestly unjust and impolitic, wherever it is adopted. But whatever may be its operation elsewhere, it is wholly inconsistent with the equal, just and free basis of our institutions; and can never be perpetuated in a confederacy of states spread over a vast continent, differing in employments, interests, soil and climate.

It is impossible to make a protecting tax equal among the states. It is, as such, wholly inconsistent with the constitutional and political rights of the members of our confederacy. We cannot permanently make twenty of the states of the union tributary, not to the other six, but to a small portion of their population. The produce of the labor of one state should, by law, enjoy no advantages over the produce of labor in another, whatever may be the character of its industry; nor should the foreign trade of any one state in the union be restricted, except from political necessity.

The commerce of a confederacy, internal and external, should be wholly free. The manufactures of Europe, as well as of the United States, require the produce of our agriculture, and we have no constitutional right to restrict the mutual exchange of our commodities exclusively for the purpose of increasing the profits of individuals in other states. The planter of the south and the farmer of the interior, or of the west, cannot be effectually and perpetually compelled by our laws to purchase his supplies from the manufacturer or producer in some distant state, on terms which give the latter an advantage of thirty, forty or fifty per cent. and in some instances more. This plan of taxation is unjust in any form and to any extent, but to collect, as is proposed, millions beyond the wants of government, merely for the purpose of distribution, would render its inequality and oppression intolerable.

These protecting duties can be no longer defended as temporary taxes upon consumption, for which the country will be indemnified by a cheap and abundant supply of domestic produce and manufactures. It will be seen by examining the statement B, how utterly fallacious have been all such predictions and speculations, from the date of the report of our first secretary of the treasury, in 1790, down to the present day. That statement exhibits the quantity and value of the most important protected merchandise imported in fifteen years to September, 1835, and some for the year ending 30th June last.

Previous to 1821 our laws did not require regular returns, and little reliance can be placed on estimates. So far from redeeming the pledges, so repeatedly given to the country, that foreign merchandise would be excluded, our importations have always been and are now steadily increasing, and almost uniformly in a ratio even greater than our rapid increase of population. Our manufactures, however prosperous, cannot more than keep pace with the growth of the country, so long as our boundaries of settlement continue to be enlarged, and our agricultural population spreads in the south and west. We have never had an adequate supply of labor, and even that is comparatively diminishing, as the spirit and facility of emigration increase, and the theatre of settlement enlarges. Such is the existing demand for labor for our modern improvements and enlarged industry—for our mines, factories, rail roads, and canals, that we can scarce procure sufficient to cultivate the soil. Besides, so long as we supply all Europe with raw materials, and our exports continue to increase, as they will do, we must take her manufactures in return. While peace continues, nations will exchange their surplus productions; and that commerce will constantly increase, in defiance of all our revenue laws. The consumers of this country can expect no relief from the protecting system till this continent shall have become settled, and a dense and impoverished population reduces the price of labor to the European standard. Till then, they must pay an annual tribute of millions, to add to the number, wealth, and power of our capitalists and corporations.

Statement B gives the importations for each year ending the 30th September, from 1821 to 1835. The returns are not complete for 1836, though a few are stated for the year ending the 30th June last. The aggregate imports for that year, including coin and bullion, was $185,631,410. Had the importations for 1836 been taken into the comparison, a much larger increase would have been exhibited; but the trade of that year was augmented by extraordinary causes, and is therefore excluded. The comparison made is between the seven years ending in 1821, and in 1835—the first and the last seven of the fifteen years. The real increase is much larger than the apparent, in consequence of constant improvements in machinery, and the competition among nations. The value of imports at the present day represents, in many instances, more than double the quantity the same amount would have represented twenty years ago.

In the last seven years, to 1835, the average increase over the first seven—that is, in seven years, is on the following articles, viz:

Brass manufactures	-	-	-	26 per cent.
Glass ware	-	-	-	60
China ware	-	-	-	150
Earthen and stone ware	-	-	-	25
Steel	-	-	-	87

Leather manufactures, the last five over the first five years, from 1826 to 1835 - - - 63½

The only article, the importation of which has not increased, is hemp; and for the very unsatisfactory reason, that the laws of other countries are more friendly to our navigation than our own, and our ships are supplied abroad.

Woollen manufactures. Stuff goods have been admitted free of duty for three years past. Other manufactures of wool have been protected by a high duty; and, more effectually to diminish importations, cash duties are exacted, to take effect from the date of importation. The aggregate increase of worsted and woollens is in the last, over the first seven years, about $1,700,000, being 22 per cent. in seven years. The greatest amount imported in any one year of the first seven, was $11,752,595, and in the last, $16,831,557; being $4,000,000 more than had been imported in any one year since these returns were ordered. If the quantities, instead of the values, could be compared, it would exhibit a greater increase. The worsted goods imported in the year ending the 30th of June, 1836, amounted to $7,099,370; woollens, $13,614,643; making an aggregate of $20,714,013.

Cotton manufactures. This branch was protected by a heavy square yard duty in 1816, which has been subsequently increased. The average increase annually in the last over the first seven years is more than a million. The highest amount imported in any one of the first seven years was $12,509,616; in the last, $16,090,224. The first year of the sixteen was $7,788,514, and the last, $15,367,585. When it is considered how much the price of this fabric has been reduced in every country in the last twenty years, and that the same value now generally represents twice the quantity it did formerly, some idea may be formed of the immense increase in this branch of our importations. The amount imported in the year ending the 30th June last was $18,927,250.

Iron and steel manufactures. By adopting specific rates of duty on many of these manufactures, the consumers are taxed much more heavily than they are aware of; besides which, the heavy charges of transportation give our own manufactures a great advantage. The importations, notwithstanding, have increased very rapidly. The aggregate amount imported in the first seven years was $19,141,183; in the last, $27,824,141; being an increase in seven years of 45 per cent. The highest annual importation, in the first term, was $3,525,433; in the last, $4,827,461; and in the first year of the sixteen $1,630,129; in the last, $4,827,461. The amount imported in the year ending the 30th June last was $7,717,910.

Bar iron. The aggregate quantity imported in the first seven years was 3,998,021, and in the last 7,106,381 hundred weight, or about 200,000 tons in the former period, and 355,000 tons in the latter; being an increase of 77½ per cent. in seven years. The consumption of iron was rapidly increasing in every country, owing to the application of it to a variety of new purposes. But another, and much more important source of consumption, has recently grown out of the improvement in rail roads, which promises to give ample employment for years to come to iron works at home and abroad. The demand for this new use cannot even be now supplied, and the price of rail road iron has consequently risen very considerably. By devoting labor to this new and increasing branch of the iron manufacture, other branches have advanced in price. Although our iron-masters find the latter more profitable than rail road iron, the British, by going largely into this new branch, have given an impulse to all others in every country. There will undoubtedly be a rapid increase of rail roads in Europe and America, which must very much enlarge the demand. Whatever may have been the motives, heretofore, for imposing a protecting duty, none is now required; for this modern improvement has created a market for it which affords it a protection far more permanent and effectual than thrice the amount of our existing duty.—As a protection, our duty is rendered wholly abortive; for all the iron-masters of Europe and America cannot, taking a series of years together, supply the demand for rail roads and all other purposes.

Sugar. This is also charged with a specific duty equal to sixty or seventy per cent. on the estimated cost of production abroad. The aggregate quantity imported in the first seven years of the statement, was 536,363,592 pounds, and in the last, 664,371,508 pounds; being an increase of about 24 per cent. in seven years. The highest importation in the first term was 94,378,814, and in the last, 126,039,239 pounds. The importation of molasses has also increased near 20 per cent. in seven years. The greatest quantity imported in the first seven years was 13,543,045, and in the last, 18,971,608 gallons. The culture of sugar is very uncertain in our climate. If the estimate made by the convention in New York be correct, there has been no increase in this branch since 1831. They estimated the crop at 40,000 hogheads in 1828, and at 100,000 in 1831. The crop of the present year has been estimated at 90,000, but, in consequence of an early frost, it is said, will not produce over 75,000 hogheads. Since the acquisition of Louisiana, the consumers have paid about $76,000,000, for the protecting duty on sugar and molasses, besides about $90,000,000 probably in the increased price of our domestic sugar. The quantity imported in the year ending the 30th of June last was 174,807,506 pounds.

Salt. The duty on salt was first laid by the tariff of 1789, was afterwards increased, but subsequently repealed by the act of the 3d of March, 1807, when we had an overflowing treasury. It was renewed during the war, as a war duty. The aggregate gate quantity imported in the first seven years of the fifteen was 32,019,575, and in the last, 38,779,371 bushels; being an increase of about twenty-one per cent. in seven years. Salt has been protected from 1789 to the present time: for although the duty was repealed from 1808 to 1814, our embargo, other restrictions, and war, were much more efficient than the duty. After near half a century we import about as much as is manufactured in the United States, even including those establishments in the interior with which foreign salt cannot interfere.

Coal. The duty on coal commenced with the tariff of 1789, at two cents a bushel. The statement referred to exhibits the importation of coal for fifteen years. The aggregate quantity imported in the first seven years was 6,088,027, and in the last 12,251,642 bushels; being an increase of more than one hundred per cent. in seven years. It is not practicable to obtain a statement of the produce of all the mines in the United States; but it will be sufficient to show the immense increase in the consumption of coal, by referring to the progress of those mines of anthracite coal, (see statement C). The annual produce, in 1820, was 365, and in 1836, 682,429 tons. The increase of all the mines in the same neighborhood, for the present year, is estimated at 250,000 tons. While our importations of foreign coal have increased in seven years, ending in September, 1835, over the seven years ending in 1827, more than one hundred per cent. a new branch of the coal trade has grown up from nothing to 682,429 tons. The whole amount of coal imported in 1821 was but 17,000 tons; and in 1836 it was about 60,000 tons, and has been more. The increased consumption in these branches alone—but a small proportion of the coal trade of the United States—since 1820, is from about 17,000 to 750,000 tons; and, as a writer in defence of the coal duty informs us, we are in the present year to add 250,000, making a million of tons. Without this, however, the consumption in these branches has increased to forty-four times the quantity consumed sixteen years ago. It is very evident that our coal companies have a much more powerful protection than any which the duty affords them. Causes far more effectual and controlling than all our revenue laws, have within a few years, created an extraordinary demand for coal, which must increase permanently. The destruction of our forests, the increase of our population, and the enlarged application of coal to manufacturing and other purposes, must enable the producers, taking a series of years together, not only to regulate the quantity, but the price of this commodity. With such evidence of the rapid and permanent increase of the consumption of coal, the continuance of the duty as a protection cannot be justified. The whole duty in 1835 was but about $100,000; and although that imported now is more than three times the quantity in 1821, the whole does not equal twice the annual consumption of the town of Wheeling, in Virginia. The statement below, though relating to other countries, will show the immense product of coal, and its various uses, and proves how utterly insignificant our importation of 60,000 tons is, when compared with the aggregate consumption of the United States.—The following is the estimated annual produce of the coal mines in England and Wales, under the different heads of consumption:

By the population	20,804,570 tons.
Iron furnaces	3,000,000
Manufactories	4,550,000
Steamboats	3,000,000
Exported	615,925
Total,	31,970,495

Wheat. A duty of 25 cents a bushel was imposed on wheat, in 1824. Notice is taken of this item in this report, merely for the purpose of proving its insignificance as a protecting duty. It is an insult to the agricultural interest to attach any importance to it as a measure of protection. Statement D shows that the whole quantity of wheat imported into all our Atlantic ports, from the time the duty was laid, in 1824, to the 30th of September, 1835, embracing a term of eleven years, was but 4,832 bushels—about 440 bushels a year. Notwithstanding the extraordinary state of trade, and the display made about Black Sea, Baltic and German wheat, during 1836, the whole quantity imported in the year ending the 30th September last, at all the ports on the seaboard, (except the third quarter of the year, at Boston), was but 317,883 bushels, paying less than $30,000 duty. In an agricultural country like this, remote as it is from other grain-growing countries, our farmers have nothing to apprehend from importations. There are but two causes that can bring wheat from abroad: a failure of crops, when importations would be desired by all; and the occasional recurrence of a redundant currency.

The importations of wheat in 1836 were not owing to the former cause. Although our crops have partially failed in some of the states, there is not famine, and the deficiency is not the sole cause of the present high price. We have had a redundant currency, which encouraged speculation, and raised the prices of commodities generally so high, as to produce importations in 1836, without regard to the actual wants of the country. A sudden and large addition to our metallic and paper currency has made us importers of wheat; and had it been practicable, the same cause might have made us importers of the soil which produced it.

The duty on wheat is of no consequence in our trade with Europe, or any other branch of our commerce abroad. By referring to the table D, it will be seen that its operation is almost entirely confined to our Canadian frontier. But even there, the importations were of very little consequence till 1835; then the duty did not amount to sixty thousand dollars, and the imports for 1836 were not half the quantity. The duty on wheat operates very injuriously on our trade with Upper Canada. When it was laid in 1824, we were the millers and exporters of the Canadians. By imposing a duty of twenty-five cents, and refusing the drawback on exportation on that frontier, we have destroyed this branch of trade, as far as the law could be executed. That, however, could not be effected on the St. Lawrence and the Niagara. The most serious objection to this duty is, that it enables the British government to carry out a policy which it wisely adopted some years ago. The produce of the United States is not only admitted into Canada free of duty, but enjoys all the advantages of Canadian produce in the consumption of Great Britain. She thus secures the carrying of our produce, while we, by our own laws, deny ourselves the profit of exporting the produce of Upper Canada, and of furnishing that country with supplies. We force trade through the St. Lawrence, instead of encouraging it through our canals, rivers and lakes; into which channels it would have long since flowed, but for our own laws. Such is the whole operation of our duty on wheat: it affords no protection whatever to agriculture, while, with the aid of other laws equally unwise, it almost destroys our commerce with Upper Canada, and increases the navigation of Great Britain.

Such is the present condition and the operation of protecting duties on some of the most prominent branches of our industry. The enlargement and prosperity of our manufactures, and the existence of these duties for near half a century, no longer warrant a continuance of these heavy charges upon the consumption of the country, under the pretended necessity of sustaining against foreign competition, capitalists and corporations, the annual produce of whose mines, factories and plantations is estimated at three hundred millions of dollars. The agricultural and commercial interests might with more justice claim the protection of government; and, as an indemnity for the sacrifices of half a century, ask for a tax upon that capital, nineteen-twentieths of which has been drawn from their labor. With a surplus of fifty millions in money and stock, and an income from customs and public lands beyond the wants of government, they have at least a right to demand that the whole burden of supporting government, and sustaining our capitalists and corporations, should not be thrown upon them. If our protected industry, great, growing, and profitable as it is, cannot now protect itself, it never will; and it is time for every consumer to determine whether he will submit to perpetual taxation for any such purpose. The statements appended to this report prove conclusively that, notwithstanding the extraordinary increase of our own manufactures, our supplies from abroad, through natural and uncontrollable causes, are constantly increasing. We cannot apologise for the continuance of these taxes, by holding out any prospect of relief, now or hereafter. It is time, therefore, that the system, as such, should be gradually reformed; that all branches of our industry should be placed on the same footing; and that our taxes should give no advantage to one man over another. No state nor section of this confederacy should hereafter be made permanently tributary to another by the operation of our revenue laws.

Unequal and unjust as our taxes are, it is not proposed to remove them in a mode which might shock any branch of industry. The immense increase of the consumption of coal, and the comparatively insignificant quantity imported from abroad, clearly show that the prosperity of this branch is wholly independent of the duty. It is required neither for protection nor revenue, and the committee recommend its repeal. They also propose to repeal the duty remaining on salt; one-half was repealed by the act of July 14, 1832, without destroying our salt works, as was predicted; and the remainder may be taken off, with little injury to them and great benefit to the country. Such a tax ought not to be continued with an overflowing treasury. The committee further recommend a general reduction of our imposts, to the extent of seven millions. For the reasons stated in this report, they have not endeavored to select articles which would not affect our industry: the duties upon all these, of any importance whatever, have already been repealed.—Nor were they disposed to repeal the duties upon articles paying a less duty than twenty per cent. while other branches of industry, with no higher claims, were protected by duties of 80, 50, and upwards of 100 per cent. So long as the principle of protection is continued, justice requires that they should at least be equalized. That is the basis of the adjustment in the act of the 2d March, 1833.—By that act, all duties over 20 per cent. were to be gradually abolished. The committee propose the same measure, but recommend a different process of reduction. By the tariff of 1833, the excess of duties over 20 per cent. were to be reduced one-tenth on the 31st of December, 1833; one-tenth the 31st of December, 1835; one-tenth the 31st of December, 1837; and one-tenth the 31st of December, 1839: the remainder of the excess was to be taken off, one-half on the 31st of December, 1841, and the other on the 30th of June, 1842. Of these, the two first reductions have already been made. In estimating the excess for future years, 1834 is considered a better criterion than 1835 or 1836, when the importations were unusually large. The excess of duty on the gross revenue accruing in the year ending 30th September, 1834, (see statement E), was $9,400,000; from this is to be deducted the drawback on the quantity exported, which would probably leave the excess of duty over 20 per cent. on the quantity remaining for consumption at seven millions. Assuming that as the net excess, and that the same amount of importations should continue till 1842, the following would be the prospective operation of the act of the 2d March, 1833:

Excess	$7,000,000
Deduct one-tenth 31st Dec. 1837	700,000
	6,300,000
Deduct one-tenth 31st Dec. 1839	630,000
	5,670,000
Deduct one-half 31st Dec. 1841	2,835,000
	2,835,000
Deduct one-half 30th June, 1842	2,835,000

Thus the act proposes to reduce the excess 1,330,000 dollars in five years, and 5,670,000 dollars in six months. If the state of our finances did not oblige us to anticipate this reduction of our revenue, motives of policy should induce us to change this extraordinary and unequal process of reduction. With a foreign trade constantly, and permanently increasing, our manufactures will be as much affected in 1842 as they will be in 1838.—If they can, as is proposed, stand a reduction of near six millions of this excess in six months, they will certainly be little affected by taking off the third of seven millions every six for eighteen months. The committee, therefore, propose that one-third of the excess should be reduced on the 30th September next, one-half of the remainder on the 31st of March, 1838; and the other half on the 30th September, 1838. Assuming an excess of seven millions, the reduction would be, viz:

One-third, September 30, 1837,	$7,000,000
	4,666,667
One-half, March 31, 1838	2,333,333
One-half, September 30, 1838	2,333,333

Such a reduction would increase and diminish with the rise and fall of importations, and could not materially affect these branches of industry, producing annually, as is estimated, three hundred millions, and distributed, as this reduction would be, among them all. Besides, even after these high duties are reduced to twenty per cent. they will still, with the charges of importation, cash duties, and short credits, enjoy a protection of forty to fifty per cent. and, on heavy and cheap merchandise, much more. As to the proprietors of our salt works, iron works and coal mines beyond the mountains, our imposts do not affect them, as they enjoy a natural monopoly, and regulate both the price and the quantity of their productions.

It is the vice of our plan of levying taxes for the support of government, that we can make no change in our revenue laws without affecting some interest. In the progress of our legislation, and of our intercourse with foreign nations for the last half century, with our tariffs, embargoes, non-intercourse and war, the burden and sacrifices have fallen on the non-protected, the profits on the protected, branches of our industry. A period has arrived, when a measure of an opposite character is demanded by the highest considerations. It is the duty of all interests to yield to the paramount necessity of reducing the revenue of the United States to the wants of the government; and the committee report a bill for that purpose.

THE RESTRAINING LAW OF NEW YORK.

To the editor of the Argus:

SIR: Having permission of the author of the enclosed letter to make such use of it as I shall deem proper, I send it to you for insertion in your paper. It contains the views of an eminent and able financier in relation to the repeal, in part, of the restraining law. These views are entitled to great consideration. They are the result of many years' observation and experience, and will doubtless be very satisfactory, not only to the members of the present legislature, but to the reading community generally. Yours, &c. LEON'D MAISON.

January 4th, 1837.

New York, 20th Dec. 1836.

SIR: I had the honor to receive your letter of 10th September last, respecting the restraining act of the state, and the conditions on which it might be repealed. You allowed so much time for the answer, that I postponed the consideration of the subject. Subsequently, an indisposition which confined me five weeks, put it out of my power to attend to it, and now I have neither the time nor the strength necessary for a thorough investigation. I pray you to excuse the delay; but the subject is familiar to me; and I feel some confidence in the correctness of the general principles, on which are founded the views which I will submit to your consideration.

Permit me, in the first place, to refer to the opinion which I expressed six years ago, and before I was connected with any bank. In the "Considerations on Currency, and the Banking System of the United States," published 1st January, 1831, I said, "The prohibition (by private persons, &c.) to issue any species of paper, that can be put into circulation as money, is perfectly proper, and indeed necessary; but that of receiving deposits, or discounting notes or bills, must have had some special and temporary object in view, and does certainly require revision. Why individuals should not be permitted to deposit their money with whom they please, is not understood. The advantages, if not the necessity of this accommodation, (discounting notes by private bankers), are such, that it is understood that the law in question is, in that respect, daily disregarded. The prohibition has no other effect than that of enhancing the premium on the discount." (Note C, page 95.)

The practical knowledge, since acquired, by my connection with a bank, of the business of this city, has strengthened the conviction, that severe and efficient restrictions are necessary in order to prevent inordinate or insecure issues of paper currency; and that every other ordinary banking transaction should, like other species of trade or commerce, be permitted to every person or association of persons, (other than bodies corporate not expressly authorized), unrestrained from any provision other than the general laws of the country.

*To which may be added the expenses of collection for 48 years.

We have, from the general practice in the United States, contracted the habit of considering the issuing of a paper currency as an essential attribute of banking. The opinion is erroneous. Banks and bankers have been in existence long before any paper currency was issued by any private individuals or association. Till very lately, there were, on the whole continent of Europe, but two or three incorporated banks which issued bank notes. There no private banker or association of persons (other than those few banks), had ever issued any species of paper currency. The right of issuing either a metallic or a paper currency, has always been considered on the continent of Europe as an attribute of sovereignty; and it has but very rarely been delegated, even to corporate bodies. Even in the British dominions, bank notes have never been issued by the London bankers, neither by those thus technically called, nor by those houses of general business which carry on banking transactions on the largest scale. The business of exchange and banking has, for centuries, been carried on throughout the whole European continent and in the most important seat of commerce of Great Britain, by capitalists who issued no paper currency.

There will ever be, in every country which adopts or tolerates paper money, an intrinsic difficulty in determining by whom it should be issued, and under what limitations and regulations. It is a subject for direct consideration; and I will, for the present, confine myself to that to which alone you seem to have called my attention, viz: the repeal of those provisions of the restraining act which forbid individuals or associations to keep offices of discount and deposit.

The proper banking business consists, not in making currency, but in dealing in existing currency and in credit; or, as both are generally expressed, bankers are money dealers. They borrow and lend money, discount notes, buy and sell bills of exchange. They are, in all those respects, useful, and often necessary intermediaries in every commercial country. Their capital, that which they bring into action, and their credit, have a tendency to reduce the rate of interest. They lessen the amount of currency wanted for commercial transactions, by increasing the rapidity of its circulation, by that concentration of payments, and by those exchange operations which, both on the spot and between different places, substitute a transfer, or exchange debts and credits, for actual payments and transportation of either specie or paper currency proper. Unlimited competition is as useful and desirable in that, as in any other branch of commerce. No satisfactory reason has ever been assigned, why dealing in money (setting aside the issuing of bank notes), should be confined to certain chartered companies, to the exclusion of every other person or persons. There is not, to my knowledge, any such legal prohibition, either in any other of the United States, or in any foreign country. The usury laws, the propriety of which is admitted to be doubtful, but which nevertheless prevail every where, apply to every money transaction, and not exclusively to bankers or money dealers. This is not one of those insulated instances, from which it may be unsafe to draw general inferences. Private banking has no where been prohibited but in New York; and the absence of such prohibition has no where been attended with any sensible inconvenience.

It seems, however, to be apprehended, that an unlimited repeal, even of that portion only of the restraining act which prohibits offices of discount and deposit, may be attended with danger. It is suggested that depositors should be specially protected; and it is feared that powerful voluntary associations might obtain a dangerous control over the money market.

Whenever the power of issuing a paper currency is vested in a banking company, and restrictions are laid in order to guard against inordinate, or insecure issues, it becomes necessary to take into consideration the amount of deposits, as well as that of bank notes. As the liability of the bank is the same with respect to both, the security of the holders of notes, is as much affected by the magnitude of the debt due to depositors, as by an excessive issue of paper money. But although it may be necessary to protect the country at large, the note-holders, and especially the more ignorant part of the community, against an excessive, depreciated or unsafe currency proper, the same reason does not apply to depositors. Whether the deposits (so called) arise from an actual deposit of currency, from a transfer of credit, or from a discounted note or bill, the depositors, that is to say, those who keep an account with a bank, require no special provision in their favor. Their transactions, in that respect, are altogether voluntary; they almost universally belong to a class quite competent to judge where to place their confidence: the repeal of the law will increase the facility of making a proper selection. Enjoying the benefit of the general laws for the recovery of debts, those who may choose to deposit their money with private banks, or with any association of persons whatever, require no greater protection in that respect, than in reference to any other commercial transaction. The legislature has probably done all that was necessary and proper on that subject, in providing by the establishment of saving banks, a safe place of deposit, as is supposed for the earnings of the poorer classes.

Provisions, whether requiring the actual payment of a certain capital, limiting its amount, or regulating its application, never have, and cannot, I think, be extended to individuals generally, or if enacted, be properly enforced. Great capitalists will ever have an influence on the money market. No other remedy can be found than in the freest competition. But it may be required that the laws should not encourage any artificial, dangerous concentration of capital in the same hands. A concentration of small capitals for the purpose of banking, (when not carried to excess) is useful, if not necessary, in a country where there is a great disproportion between the demand for capital and the supply. The capitalists were, and still are, probably too few in number, not to render it desirable that associations should compete with them. I do not apprehend, if the restraining law should be repealed to the extent above stated and no alteration is made in the existing law, that any voluntary association will be formed, with such capital as would render it formidable or dangerous. It does not seem, however, that a limitation, in that respect, could be attended with any inconvenience. But, if necessary for that purpose, the same reason would operate with equal, if not greater force against the creation of any chartered bank, with a capital exceeding that generally allowed.—An inference drawn from the late bank of the United States, would be irrelevant. If the present derangement in our domestic exchanges, and the increased rate of premium can, in any degree, be justly ascribed to the expiration of the charter of that institution, some other reason must be assigned besides its large capital, since this, under another sanction, remains unimpaired and actively employed.

The prohibition ought to continue in force with respect to bodies corporate, such only excepted as are or may be expressly authorized by law. Incorporated associations are vested with certain special powers or privileges for certain special purposes, and should always be restricted, in the exercise of those powers, to the special purposes for which they were respectively granted. It would be preposterous to authorize, by a general law, insurance, rail road, and manufacturing companies or municipal corporations, to become bankers or to transact any other business than that for which they were incorporated. Indeed the only reason why they should be excepted in repealing the restraining act, is because the prohibition is, by that act, expressly extended to corporations; a provision which was unnecessary, if, as I think they were, by their charters, confined to the business for which they were incorporated.

Some alterations in the existing laws may perhaps be proposed, in regard to voluntary associations, other than bodies corporate. May they for instance, be vested, as the new English joint stock banking companies, with the power of having a common seal, and of suing and being sued in their joint capacity, and not as distinct individuals? Shall any special provision be made for the shares into which the capital of such associations may be divided, and respecting the responsibility of the stockholders? Shall any alteration be made in the law of limited co-partnerships, which may better adapt it to joint stock companies, consisting of a great number of stockholders or partners?

To the first query I would not hesitate to answer in the negative. The essential and distinctive character of a corporation, is that of being enabled to contract, to sue and to be sued, and generally to do in its joint or corporate capacity and name, all other acts, (for the purposes specified in the incorporating law), as natural persons may perform. All other powers of a corporation are either necessarily derived from that primary character, or incidental and not essential. The right of perpetual succession, or of not being affected by the death of any of the members of the association during its existence, and that of expressing its will, by a common seal, its bye-laws, or in any other way provided for by the law, are inherent to, and necessarily flow from the conversion of an association of persons into an artificial body, acting as a natural person might do. The right of purchasing land, the exemption of personal responsibility, and other incidents, are not essential characters of a corporation. They may be, and by our laws, and those of other countries, have been omitted, or modified, according to circumstances.

The recent act of Great Britain respecting banking joint stock companies, is, as well as any act of an analogous nature, which might be passed by the state of New York, a general act of incorporation, which gives the essential character of a body corporate to every voluntary association formed for the purpose of carrying on banking business. The modifications and conditions annexed to such a general act, would not divert it from its primary and essential character. A general law of that nature, multiplying indefinitely bodies corporate, in fact, for the purpose of banking, appears to me, in every respect, liable to great abuses, and highly dangerous. But it is not necessary to dwell on that topic, since such a general law is forbidden by the constitution of the state. No law, creating a moneyed corporation, can be passed without the assent of two-thirds of the members of both branches of the legislature. This provision of the constitution has been uniformly construed to mean, that a majority of two-thirds was necessary for the creation of each distinct moneyed corporation. It clearly follows, that no general law, giving the essential character of a corporate body to every voluntary banking association, or joint stock company, that would avail itself of the provisions of that general law, can be passed consistent with the constitution.

I think, however, that all the questions, without exception, which may arise, respecting any modification whatever in the existing laws of the land connected with the subject under consideration, and beyond a simple repeal of the restraining act in the manner heretofore stated, may be satisfactorily solved by recurring to a general principle.

It is asked that the ordinary and proper banking business, (setting aside, for the present, the question respecting the issue of bank notes,) should be left as free and open to every person, or association of persons, as any other branch of commerce whatever; but not that it should be placed on a better, or different footing. There is no reason why persons, or associations of persons, should not be permitted to apply their capital and credit as freely to the dealing in promissory notes and bills of exchange, as to the purchase and sale of merchandise, of land, or of any commodity whatever. Nor is there any reason why any special provision should be made in favor of that particular branch. Let, therefore, every person, or association of persons, disposed to carry on that business, be permitted to avail themselves, without restriction of the general laws of the land. But if any modification of the existing laws, (beyond the simple repeal above stated,) is suggested, either in order to guard against any danger apprehended from the repeal, or for the purpose of facilitating banking, let the propriety of such modification be tested by the general principle, and none be adopted in reference to banking, which may not properly be applied, and which shall not, at the same time, be extended to every branch of commerce, and thus become part of the general law of the land.

Should my health and time permit, I will try, in a subsequent letter, to state the reasons, which seem to me imperiously to forbid the repeal of the prohibition to issue bank notes; and will also submit to you some modifications in the formations of banks, and further restrictions on their operations which appear to me necessary, both in order to remove some of the well founded objections against those institutions, and for the purpose of arresting the progress of excessive or unsafe issues of paper. Be pleased to state whether any part of what I have now written requires further explanation. You are at liberty to make any use you may think proper of this letter.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient serv't, ALBERT GALLATIN.
To the hon. Leonard Mason, state senator, Albany.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

January 12. In our brief notice of this day's proceedings of the senate, inserted in our last, we were compelled to omit the following—

The special order, being the bill to limit the sales of public lands to actual settlers, was called up.

Mr. Calhoun thought this a very important bill, and he had not the slightest expectation that it would have been taken up to-day. He hoped the bill would be at least postponed until Monday.

Mr. Buchanan said he would, so far as his vote would go, show that he was disposed to hear the gentleman from Ohio; (Mr. Ewing), but he thought it the best course to permit the chairman of the committee on public lands to express his views to-day, and then postpone the further consideration of the bill until Monday.

Mr. Clay said he was willing to pursue the course pointed out by the senator from Pennsylvania, provided it was understood generally that after the senator from Mississippi, (Mr. Walker), had delivered his sentiments, the subject should be postponed until Monday.

Mr. Benton stated that he would not consent to the postponement. He would not sanction the delivery of one speech a day, and then an adjournment. He would vote against all adjournment.—The friends of the administration had a majority, and if they did not carry out the measures before them, the public would be at liberty to draw such inferences as they may think fit.

Mr. Calhoun said he asked for time for every important measure to be examined, and he was not disposed to adjourn for any other purpose than to give time for the examination.

Mr. Buchanan said he professed to be one of the friends of the administration, and he knew his responsibility, and did not need to be reminded of his duty on this floor. He did not know how he himself should vote on this bill. He would not give a party vote to exclude purchasers of public lands who were buying lands for their children, and thereby sending the best settlers to the west. He would take the course which his judgment indicated as the best, without suffering himself to be directed by any other guide.

Mr. King, of Alabama, said he was always ready to give any reasonable time for examination of every subject, and whether he was in a majority or minority, he should be always prepared to evince the same disposition to accommodate. He was willing that the remarks of the senator from Mississippi should be heard, and that the subject should then be postponed until Monday to wait for the return of the senator from Ohio, whose opinions he was desirous to hear.

After some further consultation, the further consideration of the subject was agreed to be postponed until to-morrow, and to be made the special order for to-morrow, when it is understood that Mr. Walker will submit his views, and that then the further consideration of the subject will be postponed until Monday.

The bill, with some amendments offered by Mr. Walker, was then ordered to be printed.

The next special order, being the expunging resolutions, was taken up, when Mr. Benton advocated its passage. He was replied to by Mr. Crittenden. Mr. Dana remarked briefly on the subject, in compliance with the expectations of his own state, which had passed resolutions on the subject, but gave way—and on motion of Mr. Grundy the senate adjourned.

January 13. The chair presented the credentials of Thomas Clayton, elected a senator from Delaware, in the place of the hon. John M. Clayton, resigned.

Also, a communication from the treasury department, in answer to a senate resolution of the 12th inst. in relation to a breakwater and artificial harbor in Delaware bay. The communication stated that the subject belonged to the war department.

A number of petitions were presented and referred, and several bills reported and ordered to a third reading—all of which, of general interest, will be noticed hereafter, when

The following resolutions, which by rule lie over one day, were offered:

By Mr. Robbins. Resolved, That the committee on the library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of procuring suitable books for the blind.

By Mr. Davis. Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to send to the senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, any communication received by, or correspondence had between, the executive of the United States and general Santa Ana, or any other person claiming to act in behalf of Mexico, respecting the independence or future disposition and civil condition of Texas, if any such communications have been made, or any such correspondence has been had. Also, such communications, if any, as have been made from any other foreign government or governments, touching the same subject.

By Mr. Tipton. Resolved, That the judiciary committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to the corporation of Michigan city a strip of land along the shore of Lake Michigan, within the limits of the corporation, and situated between the surveys of the lands sold by the United States and the water of the lake.

By Mr. Crittenden. Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to communicate to the senate any report or letter of explanation of the military operations of the army in Florida, under the command of the governor of that territory, made by him to that department, since the report of the secretary which accompanied the president's message.

[Mr. Crittenden, in rising to offer the above resolution, said that, before doing so, he would read from that part of the president's message which relates to the Indian war in Florida, the following passage: "The result of the first movement made by the forces under the direction of governor Call, in October last, as detailed in the accompanying papers, excited much surprise and disappointment. A full explanation has been required of the causes which led to the failure of that movement, but has not yet been received."

Mr. Crittenden then stated that he had been informed that, since that, the explanation required had been received from governor Call. He hoped it had been satisfactory to the president, and would be so to the public. The object of his resolution was to bring it before the public. He had known governor Call long; he had always believed him to be a true man and a true soldier, and trusted he would so appear when his explanation and justification was made known. Mr. C. then offered a resolution requesting the president to communicate to the senate any report or letter of explanation received from governor Call.]

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Preston was taken up and adopted.

The bill for the relief of William East was considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate proceeded to the further consideration of the special order, the expunging resolution of Mr. Benton.

Mr. Dana concluded his remarks on this subject. Mr. Preston spoke on the subject generally, and in reply to Mr. Dana. Mr. Rives followed, chiefly in reply to Mr. Preston, and in vindication of the present conduct and opinions of Virginia. Mr. Preston responded, mostly on several new topics, introduced by Mr. Rives. Mr. Rives spoke again in reply to Mr. Preston. Mr. Moore, remarking that several senators were now absent who would doubtless wish to record their vote on this question, moved to postpone the subject till Monday. Negatived, 14 voting in favor, noes not counted.

Mr. Moore then addressed the senate, chiefly in vindication of the votes which he had given, and the one which he was about to give on this question. Mr. Niles spoke at great length.

Mr. Moore, seconding a supposititious invocation of Mr. Niles, suggested the propriety of so amending the resolution as to order fire to be brought from heaven by a sun glass, to consume the obnoxious portion of the senate journal, as, he said, had been once done by a legislature of Georgia. Mr. Southard, having expressed a wish to speak on this subject at a proper time, and when the minds of senators were not exhausted, moved that the senate do now adjourn. Negatived, by yeas 20, nays 21; the yeas and nays having been ordered on the call of Mr. Benton.

Mr. Southard then declined speaking at so late an hour. Mr. Moore moved and urged an adjournment, that proper opportunity might be given for further debate. Negatived, yeas 20, nays 22. Mr. Calhoun addressed the senate briefly on the subject. Mr. Clay inquired whether the question involved both the preamble and the resolution. The chair said it embraced the whole subject-matter.

Mr. Clay having enumerated some of the topics on which he had designed to speak, relating to this resolution, gave way to Mr. Moore, who again moved an adjournment, yeas 22, noes not counted.

So the senate adjourned until to-morrow.

January 14. The chair presented a communication from the treasury department, with an accompanying report, relating to the insolvent debtors of the United States.

Also, from the war department, with a statement of the names and compensation of the clerks employed in that department for 1836. Both communications were ordered to be printed.

[Communications similar to the above were received yesterday by the house.]

Mr. Tallmadge presented a memorial from the board of trade of New York through a committee of that board, praying the establishment of a national bank at the city of New York, and representing the establishment of such a bank by congress as the only remedy for the present and past deranged state of the currency and exchanges of the country, and praying congress to create such an institution according to the plan laid down in the president's message of 1832. [Mr. T. while he testified to the high character of the gentlemen composing the board of trade, and the committee through whom he received the memorial, said he wished it to be distinctly understood that he did not concur with them in their views on this subject.—His own views had been already expressed here and elsewhere.]

A number of petitions were presented, and several bills reported, read a first time and ordered to a second reading.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Davis, calling on the president of the United States for copies of any correspondence which may have passed between him and gen. Santa Ana, or any other of the authorities of Mexico, in relation to the independence of Texas, being under consideration,

Mr. Grundy suggested the propriety, under existing circumstances, of letting it lie for a few days, unless the honorable mover had some special reason for urging its immediate adoption.

Mr. Davis remarked, that as gen. Santa Ana was said to be now on his way to this city, with some purpose relating to the independence of Texas, it was to be presumed that some communications on the subject had passed between him and other authorities of Mexico and the president. It was desirable that such correspondence, if any had taken place, should be seasonably in the possession of the senate; but he was willing to let the resolution lie till Monday; and it was accordingly laid on the table.

The other senate resolutions on the table, and heretofore published, were severally taken up and agreed to.

Several bills of private or local interest having been ordered to a third reading—on motion of Mr. King, of Alabama, the senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill prohibiting sales of the public lands, except to actual settlers, and in limited quantities, as amended by the committee on public lands.

Mr. Walker spoke at large on the subjects relating to the bill, and in explanation of its various provisions.

Mr. Clay said he was gratified to hear from the chairman of the committee on public lands the assurance that the treasury order of July, 1836, would, in some way, be dispensed with. He wished to ask the chairman when the committee would probably report on this subject.

Mr. Walker could not certainly tell; but probably by Tuesday next. On motion of Mr. Morris, the bill, with the amendments, was postponed till Monday.

The expunging resolution of Mr. Benton now coming up for further consideration, and Mr. Clay having the floor, on motion of Mr. Kent, the senate adjourned—yeas 22, nays 18.

January 16. The chair presented a communication from the treasury department, in compliance with a resolution of the senate, with a statement of the amount of unexpended appropriations remaining in the treasury on the 1st of January instant. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Grundy, from the committee on the judiciary, reported a bill to establish a board of three commissioners, to be appointed by the president and senate, to hear and examine claims against the U. States.

On motion of Mr. Davis, the resolution offered by him, calling on the president of the United States for copies of such correspondence as may have taken place between the executive and Santa Ana, or any other person, in relation to the independence of Texas, was taken up, and adopted without debate.

The bill for the relief of Samuel Miller was read a third time and passed;

Also, the bill altering the time of holding the circuit court of the United States for the fifth district of North Carolina;

The bill to authorise the East Florida rail road company to construct a rail road through the public lands;

And the bill to authorise the Washington county turnpike company of Missouri to construct a rail road through the public lands.

The senate proceeded to the farther consideration of the expunging resolution, offered by Mr. Benton.

Mr. Clay addressed the senate at length in opposition to the expunging resolution, and in vindication of the principles involved in the resolution of the senate censuring the president. Mr. Buchanan followed, in vindication of the expunging resolution, and in reply to Mr. Clay. He insisted that the meaning of expunge, as used in the resolution, was not literal, but metaphorical, merely implying that the passage in the journal operated upon would not be obliterated, but that its force as an act of the senate would be annihilated. Mr. Dana made a few remarks, and was followed by Mr. Buchanan, who spoke at some length in favor of the resolution. Mr. Bayard next took the floor, and delivered a speech in opposition to it. After Mr. B. had concluded, Mr. Hendricks arose and gave his reasons for opposing the resolution.

[Mr. Hendricks voted against the resolution of 1834 which Mr. Benton's resolution proposes to expunge—his remarks shall be inserted at length in our next.]

Mr. Strange addressed the senate at considerable length in its favor, and in conclusion moved several verbal amendments in the preamble of the resolution, the import of which was to declare that the senate resolution of 1834, censuring the president, was "not warranted by the constitution, illegal," &c. instead of declaring that it was "unconstitutionally adopted."

Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, spoke in opposition to the resolution, dwelling especially on the severe and unqualified language of reprobation which had been used by the advocates of expunction, and friends of the president.

Mr. Calhoun made some inquiries as to the design of the amendments of Mr. Strange, who was understood to reply that they were designed to render the language of the preamble less severe.

Mr. Benton expressed his acquiescence in the proposed amendments. He thought it a matter of little consequence which form should be adopted.

The amendments of Mr. Strange were then agreed to.

The debate having closed, and the question being about to be taken, Mr. Webster rose, and addressed the senate as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: Upon the truth and justice of the original resolution of the senate, and upon the authority of the senate to pass that resolution, I had an opportunity to express my opinions at a subsequent period, when the president's protest was before us. Those opinions remain altogether unchanged.

And now, had the constitution secured the privilege of entering a PROTEST on the journal, I should not say one word on this occasion; although, if what is now proposed shall be accomplished, I know not what would have been the value of such a provision, however formally or carefully it might have been inserted in the body of that instrument.

But, as there is no such constitutional privilege, I can only effect my purpose by thus addressing the senate; and I rise, therefore, to make that PROTEST in this manner, in the face of the senate, and in the face of the country, which I cannot present in any other form.

I speak in my own behalf, and in behalf of my colleague; we both speak as senators from the state of Massachusetts, and, as such, we solemnly PROTEST against this whole proceeding.

We deny that senators from other states have any power or authority to expunge any vote or votes which we have given here, and which we have recorded, agreeably to the express provision of the constitution.

We have a high personal interest, and the state whose representatives we are, has also a high interest in the entire preservation of every part and parcel of the record of our conduct, as members of the senate.

This record the constitution solemnly declares shall be kept; but the resolution before the senate declares that this record shall be expunged.

Whether subterfuge and evasion, and, as it appears to us, the degrading mockery of drawing black lines upon the journal, shall or shall not leave our names and our votes legible, when this violation of the record shall have been completed, still the terms "to expunge" and the terms "to keep," when applied to a record, import ideas exactly contradictory; as much so as the terms "to preserve" and the terms "to destroy."

A record which is expunged, is not a record which is kept, any more than a record which is destroyed, can be a record which is preserved. The part expunged is no longer part of the record; it has no longer a legal existence. It cannot be certified as a part of the proceeding of the senate for any purpose of proof or evidence.

The object of the provision in the constitution, as we think, most obviously is, that the proceedings of the senate shall be preserved in writing, not for the present only, not until published only, because a copy of the printed journal is not regular legal evidence; but preserved indefinitely; preserved, as other records are preserved, till destroyed by time or accident.

Every one must see that matters of the highest importance depend on the permanent preservation of the journals of the two houses. What but the journals show that bills have been regularly passed into laws, through the several stages; what but the journal shows who are members, or who is president, or speaker, or secretary, or clerk of the body? What but the journal contains the proof, necessary for the justification of those who act under our authority, and who, without the power of producing such proof, must stand as trespassers? What but the journals show who is appointed, and who rejected, by us, on the president's nomination; or who is acquitted, who convicted, in trials on impeachment? In short, is there, at any time, any other regular and legal proof of any act done by the senate than the journal itself?

The idea, therefore, that the senate is bound to preserve its journal only until it is published, and then may alter, mutilate, or destroy it at pleasure, appears to us one of the most extraordinary sentiments ever advanced.

We are deeply grateful to those friends who have shown, with so much clearness, that all the precedents relied on to justify or to excuse this proceeding, are either not to the purpose, or, from the times and circumstances at and under which they happened, are no way entitled to respect in a free government, existing under a written constitution. But, for ourselves, we stand on the plain words of that constitution itself. A thousand precedents elsewhere made, whether ancient or modern, can neither rescind, nor control, nor explain away these words.

The words are, that "each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings." No gloss, no ingenuity, no specious interpretation, and much less can any fair or just reasoning reconcile the process of expunging with the plain meaning of these words, to the satisfaction of the common sense and honest understanding of mankind.

If the senate may now expunge one part of the journal of a former session, it may, with equal authority, expunge another part, or the whole. It may expunge the entire record of any one session, or of all sessions.

It seems to us inconceivable how any men can regard such a power, and its exercise at pleasure, as consistent with the injunction of the constitution. It can make no difference what is the completeness or incompleteness of the act of expunging, or by what means done; whether by erasure, obliteration, or defacement; if by defacement, as here proposed, whether one word or many words are written on the face of the record; whether little ink or much ink is shed on the paper; or whether some part, or the whole, of the original written journal may yet by possibility be traced. If the act done be an act to expunge, to blot out, to obliterate, to erase the record, then the record is expunged, blotted out, obliterated and erased. And mutilation and alteration violate the record as much as obliteration or erasure. A record, subsequently altered, is not the original record. It no longer gives a just account of the proceedings of the senate. It is no longer true. It is, in short, no journal of the real and actual proceedings of the senate, such as the constitution says each house shall keep.

The constitution, therefore, is, in our deliberate judgment, violated by this proceeding in the most plain and open manner.

The constitution, moreover, provides that the yeas and nays, on any question, shall, at the request of one-fifth of the members present, be entered on the journal. This provision, most manifestly, gives a personal right to those members who may demand it, to the entry and preservation of their votes on the record of the proceedings of the body; not for one day or one year only, but for all time. There the yeas and nays are to stand, forever, as permanent and lasting proof of the manner in which members have voted on great and important questions before them.

But it is now insisted that the votes of members, taken by yeas and nays, and thus entered on the journal, as matter of right, may still be expunged; so that that, which it requires more than four-fifths of the senators to prevent from being put on the journal, may, nevertheless, be struck off and erased the next moment, or at any period afterwards, by the will of a mere majority; or if this be not admitted, then the absurdity is adopted of maintaining, that this provision of the constitution is fulfilled by merely preserving the yeas and nays on the journal, after having expunged and obliterated the very resolution, or the very question, on which they were given, and to which alone they refer; leaving the yeas and nays thus a mere list of names, connected with no subject, no question, no vote. We put it to the partial judgment of mankind, if this proceeding be not, in this respect also, directly and palpably inconsistent with the constitution.

We protest in the most solemn manner, that other senators have no authority to deprive us of our personal rights, secured to us by the constitution, either by expunging, or obliteration, or mutilating, or defacing, the record of our votes, duly entered by yeas and nays; or by expunging and oblittering the resolutions or questions on which those votes were given and recorded.

We have seen, with deep and sincere pain, the legislatures of respectable states instructing the senators of those states to vote for and support this violation of the journal of the senate; and this pain is infinitely increased by our full belief, and entire conviction, that most, if not all these proceedings of states had their origin in promptings from Washington; that they have been urgently requested and insisted on as being necessary to the accomplishment of the intended purpose; and that it is nothing else but the influence and power of the executive branch of this government which has brought the legislatures of so many of the free states of this union to quit the sphere of their ordinary duties for the purpose of co-operating to accomplish a measure, in our judgment, so unconstitutional, so derogatory to the character of the senate; and marked with so broad an impression of compliance with power.

But this resolution is to pass. We expect it.—That cause, which has been powerful enough to influence so many state legislatures, will show itself powerful enough, especially with such aids, to secure the passage of the resolution here.

We make up our minds to behold the spectacle which is to ensue.

We collect ourselves to look on, in silence, while a scene is exhibited which, if we did not regard it as ruthless violation of a sacred instrument, would appear to us to be little elevated above the character of a contemptible farce.

This scene we shall behold, and hundreds of American citizens, as many as may crowd into these lobbies and galleries, will behold it also; with what feelings I do not undertake to say.

But we protest, we most solemnly protest, against the substance and against the manner of this proceeding, against its object, against its form, and against its effect. We tell you that you have no right to mar or mutilate the record of our votes given here, and recorded according to the constitution; we tell you that you may as well erase the yeas and nays on any other question or resolution, or on all questions and resolutions, as on this; we tell you that you have just as much right to falsify the record, by so altering it as to make us appear to have voted on any question as we did not vote, as you have to erase a record, and make that page a blank, in which our votes, as they were actually given and recorded, now stand. The one proceeding, as it appears to us, is as much a falsification of the record as the other.

Having made this PROTEST, our duty is performed. We rescue our own names, character and honor from all participation in this matter; and whatever the wayward character of the times, the headlong and plunging spirit of party devotion, or the fear or the love of power, may have been able to bring about elsewhere, we desire to thank God that they have not, as yet, overcome the love of liberty, fidelity to true republican principles, and a sacred regard for the constitution, in that state whose soil was drenched, to a mire, by the first and best blood of the revolution. Massachusetts, as yet, has not been conquered; and while we have the honor to hold seats here as her senators, we shall never consent to a sacrifice either of her rights, or our own; we shall never fail to oppose what we regard as a plain and open violation of the constitution of the country; and we should have thought ourselves wholly unworthy of her if we had not, with all the solemnity and earnestness in our power, protested against the adoption of the resolution now before the senate.

She question being on the adoption of the resolution, as amended,

Mr. Benton demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

He then moved that the blanks in the resolution be filled by inserting the 16th day of January. It was agreed to; and, having been done,

The question was taken, by yeas and nays, on the adoption of the resolution in the following form: Resolution to expunge from the journal the resolution of the senate of March 28, 1834, in relation to president Jackson and the removal of the deposits.

Whereas, on the 26th day of December, in the year 1833, the following resolve was moved in the senate:

"Resolved, That, by dismissing the late secretary of the treasury, because he would not, contrary to his own sense of duty, remove the money of the United States in deposit with the bank of the United States and its branches, in conformity with the president's opinion, and by appointing his successor to effect such removal, which has been done, the president has assumed the exercise of a power over the treasury of the United States, not granted him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people;"

Which proposed resolve was altered and changed by the mover thereof, on the 28th day of March, in the year 1834, so as to read as follows:

"Resolved, That, in taking upon himself the responsibility of removing the deposits of the public money from the bank of the United States, the president of the United States has assumed the exercise of a power over the treasury of the United States not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people;"

Which resolve, so changed and modified by the mover thereof, on the same day and year last mentioned, was further altered, so as to read in these words:

"Resolved, That the president, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both;"

In which last-mentioned form the said resolve, on the same day and year last mentioned, was adopted by the senate, and became the act and judgment of that body, and, as such, now remains upon the journal thereof:

And whereas the said resolve was not warranted by the constitution, and was irregularly and illegally adopted by the senate, in violation of the rights of defence which belong to every citizen, and in subversion of the fundamental principles of law and justice; because president Jackson was thereby adjudged and pronounced to be guilty of an impeachable offence, and a stigma placed upon him as a violator of his oath of office, and of the laws and constitution which he was sworn to preserve, protect, and defend, without going through the forms of an impeachment, and without allowing to him the benefits of a trial, or the means of defence:

And whereas the said resolve, in all its various shapes and forms, was unfounded and erroneous in point of fact, and therefore unjust and unrighteous, as well as irregular and unauthorized by the constitution; because the said president Jackson, neither in the act of dismissing Mr. Duane, nor in the appointment of Mr. Taney, as specified in the first form of the resolve; nor in taking upon himself the responsibility of removing the deposits, as specified in the second form of the same resolve; nor in any act which was then, or can now, be specified under the vague and ambiguous terms of the general denunciation contained in the third and last form of the resolve, did do or commit any act in violation or in derogation of the laws and constitution, or dangerous to the liberties of the people:

And whereas the said resolve, as adopted, was uncertain and ambiguous, containing nothing but a loose and floating charge for derogating from the laws and constitution, and assuming ungranted power and authority in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue; without specifying what part of the executive proceedings, or what part of the public revenue was intended to be referred to; or what parts of the laws and constitution were supposed to have been infringed; or in what part of the union, or at what period of his administration, these late proceedings were supposed to have taken place; thereby putting each senator at liberty to vote in favor of the resolve upon a separate and secret reason of his own, and leaving the ground of the senate's judgment to be guessed at by the public, and to be differently and diversely interpreted by individual senators, according to the private and particular understanding of each: contrary to all the ends of justice, and to all the forms of legal or judicial proceeding; to the great prejudice of the accused, who could not know against what to defend himself; and to the loss of senatorial responsibility, by shielding senators from public accountability for making up a judgment upon grounds which the public cannot know, and which, if known, might prove to be insufficient in law, or unfounded in fact:

And whereas the specification contained in the first and second forms of the resolve having been objected to in debate, and shown to be insufficient to sustain the charges they were adduced to support, and it being well believed that no majority could be obtained to vote for the said specifications, and the same having been actually withdrawn by the mover in the face of the whole senate, in consequence of such objection and belief, and before any vote taken thereupon; the said specifications could not afterwards be admitted by any rule of parliamentary practice, or by any principle of legal implication, secret intendment, or mental reservation, to remain and continue a part of the written and public resolve from which they were thus withdrawn; and, if they could be so admitted, they would not be sufficient to sustain the charges therein contained:

And whereas the senate being the constitutional tribunal for the trial of the president, when charged by the house of representatives with offences against the laws and the constitution, the adoption of the said resolve, before any impeachment preferred by the house, was a breach of the privileges of the house; not warranted by the constitution; a subversion of justice; a prejudication of a question which might legally come before the senate; and a disqualification of that body to perform its constitutional duty with fairness and impartiality, if the president should thereafter be regularly impeached by the house of representatives for the same offence:

And whereas the temperate, respectful, and argumentative defence and protest of the president against the aforesaid proceeding of the senate was rejected and repulsed by that body, and was voted to be a breach of its privileges, and was not permitted to be entered on its journal or printed among its documents; while all memorials, petitions, resolves, and remonstrances against the president, however violent or unfounded, and calculated to inflame the people against him, were duly and honorably received, encomiastically commented upon in speeches, read at the table, ordered to be printed with the long list of names attached, referred to the finance committee for consideration, filed away among the public archives, and now constitute a part of the public documents of the senate, to be handed down to the latest posterity:

And whereas the said resolve was introduced, debated and adopted, at a time and under circumstances which had the effect of co-operating with the bank of the United States in the partricial attempt which that institution was then making to produce a panic and pressure in the country; to destroy the confidence of the people in president Jackson; to paralyze his administration; to govern the elections; to bankrupt the state banks; ruin their currency; fill the whole union with terror and distress; and thereby to extort from the sufferings and the alarms of the people, the restoration of the deposits and the renewal of its charter:

And whereas the said resolve is of evil example and dangerous precedent, and should never have been received, debated or adopted by the senate, or admitted to entry upon its journal: Wherefore,

Resolved, That the said resolve be expunged from the journal; and, for that purpose, that the secretary of the senate, at such time as the senate may appoint, shall bring the manuscript journal of the session 1833-'34 into the senate, and, in the presence of the senate, draw black lines round the said resolve, and write across the face thereof, in strong letters, the following words: "EXPUNGED BY ORDER OF THE SENATE, THIS 16TH DAY OF JANUARY, IN THE YEAR OF OUR LORD 1837."

On agreeing to this resolution, the vote was as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Moore, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—19.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. Benton, observing that nothing now remained but for the secretary to carry into effect the order of the senate, moved that that be forthwith done.

The secretary thereupon produced the record of the senate, and opening it at the page which contained the resolution to be expunged, did, in the presence of such of the members of the senate as remained, (many having retired), proceed to draw black lines entirely round the resolution, and to endorse across the lines the words "Expunged by order of the senate, this 16th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1837."

No sooner had this been done, than hisses, loud and repeated, were heard from various parts of the gallery.

The chair, (Mr. King, of Alabama). Clear the galleries.

Mr. Benton. I hope the galleries will not be cleared, as many innocent persons will be excluded, who have been guilty of no violation of order. Let the ruffians who have made the disturbance alone be apprehended. I hope the sergeant-at-arms will be directed to enter the gallery, and seize the ruffians, ascertaining who they are in the best way he can. Let him apprehend them, and bring them to the bar of the senate. Let him seize the bank ruffians. I hope that they will not now be suffered to insult the senate, as they did when it was under the power of the bank of the United States, when ruffians, with arms upon them, insulted us with impunity. Let them be taken and brought to the bar of the senate. Here is one, just above me, that may easily be identified—the bank ruffian!

The order to clear the galleries was revoked, and the sergeant-at-arms directed to proceed into the galleries and apprehend the persons who had created the disorder. In a very few minutes the sergeant-at-arms returned, and reported to the chair that he had apprehended an individual and had him in custody.

Mr. Benton moved that he be brought to the bar of the senate.

Mr. Morris opposed the motion, and demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered and taken, stood yeas 17, nays 8. So the motion was carried.

It was suggested by Mr. Moore that there was not a quorum present, and the chair at first so decided. But, on being reminded that one of the senators from Louisiana had resigned, 25 was a majority of the 49 remaining. He declared that a quorum was present.

Mr. Moore now moved an adjournment; but the motion was lost.

The sergeant-at-arms now produced and presented an individual at the bar of the senate.

[He was a tall, well dressed man, wrapped in a black over-coat.]

Mr. Benton said that, as the individual had been taken from among the respectable audience in the gallery and had been presented in this public manner, with all eyes fixed upon him, he had perhaps been sufficiently punished in his feelings. Mr. B. was not disposed to push the proceedings any further, and therefore moved that he be discharged from custody.

Mr. Morris considered the whole proceeding as very extraordinary. If the individual had been worthy of an arrest, he ought to have an opportunity of defence. A citizen had been brought to the bar of the senate, and not informed for what reason, nor of what offence he stood charged and now it was moved that, without a hearing, he be discharged from custody. Call you this (said Mr. M.) the justice of the senate of the United States? Is it in this manner that citizens are to be treated? It appears to me a most extraordinary proceeding.

Mr. Sevier moved an adjournment; but the motion did not prevail.

Mr. Robinson, near whose seat the person apprehended then stood, proposed that the individual have an opportunity to purge himself by oath from the contempt. The senate were not to presume him guilty, and if he was willing to swear that he intended no contempt, he ought to have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. Morris demanded the yeas and nays on the motion for his discharge; and they were ordered accordingly.

Mr. Benton observed that if the individual was ready to go to the clerk's table, and there, by oath, to purge himself of the contempt, he had no objection. Let him do so.

Mr. Robinson now stated, on behalf of the person apprehended, that he was willing and ready to answer interrogatories.

Mr. Benton thereupon withdrew his motion for his discharge.

The chair reminded him that he could not do this, inasmuch as the yeas and nays upon it had been ordered.

Mr. Morris was strongly opposed to having the individual suddenly, without warning, and without opportunity to consult counsel, brought forward to take his oath, and undergo interrogatories. It would be better to give him until to-morrow, that he might have some leisure for reflection. He had been brought up here before the senate of the United States, and before the people of the United States, and to require him thus suddenly to be put upon oath in his defence was wrong.

He concluded by moving an adjournment.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. Strange thought that if the individual was willing now to be sworn, and to undergo interrogatories, he was certainly the best judge of his own rights. He best knew what he could undergo, and there was no need that senators should become his advocates.

Mr. Benton said that if the man wished to purge himself on oath, now, here, in presence of the senate, it was very well. Let him do so. But if he wanted to go away and consult a lawyer, if he must ask a lawyer to-morrow before he could tell whether he meant to insult the senate to-night, he was opposed to it. If he was ready to swear, let him do it, but no consulting with lawyers.

The chair stated to Mr. Morris that the individual in custody was not brought up without a charge, as that senator seemed to intimate. He was charged with disorderly conduct in the presence of the senate, and the law gave the senate, as it gave a court of justice, power to protect itself in all such cases, by a summary proceeding, and on the evidence of its own senses.

Mr. Robinson again said that the individual in custody wished for an opportunity of purging himself from the contempt.

Some confusion prevailed. But the motion for his discharge being pressed, the question was put, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Dana, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King, of Ala. Linn, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—23.

NAY—Mr. Wall—1.

The individual was accordingly discharged from custody.

The individual referred to thereupon advanced, and addressing the chair, said:

"Mr. President, am I not to be permitted to speak in my own defence?"

Chair, to the sergeant-at-arms, "Take him out!"

The senate now adjourned.

January 17. The journal having been read, Mr. While said he had voted against bringing to the bar of the senate the individual arrested last night, and not in favor as had been read from the journal. A correction of the journal was made accordingly.

Mr. Calhoun said he had always understood the constitution to require a majority of the entire number of senators to make a quorum, and he suggested it as an important question which ought now to be decided, whether 26 made a quorum of the senate, or 24, as had been understood last night. The question, however, not being now formerly proposed, was not decided.

A message was received by the president of the United States, by Andrew Jackson, jr. his private secretary, with certain communications from the secretary of the treasury, and from the district attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia, relating to the difficulties of bringing to conviction the persons concerned in burning the treasury building, and earnestly recommending a revision of the laws relating to this subject. Referred to the committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

The chair presented a communication from the secretary of the treasury, in compliance with a senate resolution of the 29th ult. (offered by Mr. Calhoun), with statements of the amount of exports, imports and avails of the public lands, for the year 1836, under various distinctions specified in the resolution; and also the amount of money remaining in the treasury at the end of the year. Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Kent presented the remonstrance of the grand jury of the county of Washington against petitions to congress from abolition societies, in various parts of the country, and the numerous memorials presented to congress praying the abolition of slavery in the District; and praying congress to apply such remedies as might be within their power. Mr. K. moved that the remonstrance be read, laid on the table and printed.

The memorial was then read, when a discussion took place on the question of printing an extra number of copies of this document, which were, in the end, ordered.

A number of petitions and memorials were presented—various reports, joint resolutions and bills brought in from different committees—and several bills from the house, read twice by the chair and committed, after which the senate proceeded to the order of the day, which was the consideration of Mr. Walker's land bill.

Mr. Morris made an effort to have the consideration of the bill postponed, but without success. He then went at length into a statement of his objection to the bill as reported by the committee on public lands, and his reasons for preferring it in the form in which he had himself introduced it into the senate. He compared the two, section by section, and having concluded, Mr. Ewing moved the postponement of the further consideration of the bill to Friday next. Mr. Walker opposed this, lest the passage of the bill might be endangered, and demanded the yeas and nays, which being taken, were yeas 14, nays 18. So the senate refused to postpone the bill.

Mr. Morris then offered an amendment, embracing the principle of graduation in the price of land in proportion to the time it had been offered for sale; which, after some brief discussion, was agreed to—yeas 19, nays 18. Mr. Morris proposed a further amendment, on which much desultory debate took place, and several modifications were suggested, and in part agreed to; but before any thing was decided respecting them, the senate, on motion of Mr. Buchanan, went into executive business, and afterwards adjourned.

January 18. A number of bills and resolutions were reported, which will be duly noticed next week. Among the former was a bill reported by Mr. Walker, from the committee on public lands, to regulate and restrict the payments for public lands. [This bill in effect rescinds the treasury order, and provides that the payments for lands shall be in notes of banks, which do not issue notes of a less value than five dollars.] It was read a second time and made the special order for Friday.

The special order, being the bill to prohibit sales of public lands except to actual settlers was taken up. Mr. Clay, with a view to relieve the friends of the bill from some embarrassment, occasioned by his vote on the preceding day, given under misapprehension, in favor of a graduation clause introduced as an amendment, moved the reconsideration of the vote on that amendment, in order that he might change his vote, (which happened to produce a majority for the amendment.)

After some desultory conversation it was finally agreed to postpone this motion, together with the bill itself, until Friday next; yeas 24, noes 12.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the previous orders were postponed, and the senate proceeded to consider the bill for anticipating the payment of indemnities accruing to citizens of the United States, under the convention with France, of the 4th of July, 1831, and that with the Two Sicilies of the 14th October, 1832.

The bill was advocated by Mr. Wright, and opposed by Messrs. Clay, Calhoun and others, and finally rejected by a vote of 22 to 19.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, Jan. 12. [The following is a more detailed statement of this day's proceedings of the house on Mr. Cambreleng's bill to reduce the revenue, than we could find room for in the last "REGISTER."]

The house resumed the consideration of the bill to reduce the revenue of the United States to the wants of the government; there being two motions pending, one for commitment, and the other for indefinite postponement.

Mr. Corwin, of Ohio, addressed the house for an hour and an half, in strong opposition to the provisions of the bill, and the principles promulgated in the report.

Mr. Cushman, of N. H. supported the bill and the principles of the report.

Mr. Galbraith, of Pa. with a view to give time for a better consideration of the bill and report, moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Tuesday next, and that the bill and report be printed.

Mr. Muhlenberg, of Pa. believed that the continued discussion of the bill would occupy the whole residue of the session, without any object being obtained. He moved to lay the whole subject on the table, and to print the bill and report.

Mr. Patterson, of Va. called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. A. Mann moved a call of the house.

Mr. Owens, of Ga. called for the yeas and nays on that motion, which were ordered; and were yeas 105, nays 91. The call was accordingly commenced, but had not been far proceeded in, when, on motion of Mr. Love, of N. Y. it was dispensed with.

The question recurred on the motion to lay the bill and report on the table.

Mr. Cambreleng hoped that the bill would be read by its title, before the vote was taken, in order that gentlemen might distinctly understand on what they were about to vote.

Mr. Cambreleng was called to order.

Mr. McKeon desired to know if it was not in order for him to inquire, whether he was not about to vote on a bill to reduce the revenue of the United States to the wants of the government.

The chair said, the gentleman from New York could not make the inquiry as a matter of right.

Mr. Wise said, he had been absent when the bill was read, and he wished to know, what was the bill on which he was about to vote?

The speaker said, that the title of the bill was a bill to reduce the revenue of the United States to the wants of the government.

Mr. Wise wished to know, from the bill itself, whether its contents corresponded with its title.

After some objection, the bill was read.

And the question on the motion to lay the bill and report on the table, was taken and decided in the negative; yeas 94, nays 119, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, C. Allan, Heman Allen, Anthony, Ashley, Bailey, Beaumont, Bell, Black, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Buchanan, John Calhoun, Wm. B. So the bill was not laid on the table. [By this vote, the bill and report again come up first in order of business to-morrow morning.]

Mr. Halsey, of Georgia, obtained the floor, when the house adjourned.

Friday, Jan. 13. Mr. E. Whittlesey asked the indulgence of the house to postpone the further consideration of the bill to reduce the revenue of the United States to the wants of the government, in order that reports of committees might be received. If this motion should prevail, Mr. W. said it was his design, after the committees had made their reports, to ask the house to take up and dispose of such private bills as could be disposed of in the course of the day, and as would elicit no debate.

This motion caused considerable discussion, at the termination of which (Mr. Lawrence having withdrawn his motion to postpone the consideration of the bill indefinitely) the bill to reduce the revenue was committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Some time was spent in the reception and disposition of reports upon private claims.

Mr. Howard, from the committee on foreign affairs, reported a bill fixing the compensation of public ministers and consuls general, and for other purposes.

Mr. Smith, from the committee of ways and means, reported the following resolution.

Resolved, That 10,000 extra copies of the report of the committee of ways and means, in relation to the tariff, be printed for the use of the house.

This resolution, by the rule, would lie over one day; Mr. Smith moved that it be now considered.

Objections having been made, Mr. Lawrence expressed his hope that no objection would be made to considering the resolution at this time. It was important that the country should see the report.

Mr. Lawrence moved to suspend the rule to consider the resolution at this time; which motion prevailed. Ayes 111, noes not counted.

Mr. A. Mann moved to amend the resolution by striking out "ten" and inserting "fifteen" thousand; which motion was lost.

Mr. Williams, of N. C. moved to strike out "ten" and insert "five;" which motion was also lost.

Mr. Briggs moved to amend the resolution by causing it to read "bill" and report; which motion prevailed.

And the question recurring on the adoption of the original resolution, the same was taken and carried. So ten thousand extra copies of the bill and report were ordered to be printed.

Mr. A. Mann made an ineffectual motion to suspend the rule to enable him to submit a resolution fixing the hour of eleven, after this week, for the time at which the house would meet.

Mr. E. Whittlesey asked the consent of the house to submit a motion, that the house would take up and consider the private bills on the speaker's table, which would elicit no debate; and then go into committee on similar bills, and under a similar restriction.

Objection was made, and, after some desultory conversation,

Mr. E. Whittlesey moved to suspend the rule to enable him to submit his motion; which first motion was agreed to—ayes 98, noes 30. So the rule was suspended.

And, thereupon, the motion of Mr. E. Whittlesey was taken, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 124, noes 44.

The house then proceeded to the consideration of private bills in which it was engaged until the hour of adjournment.

Saturday, Jan. 14. Mr. Adams rose and said that, on the third day of last June, a resolution reported from the committee for the District of Columbia had been adopted by the house, requesting the secretary of state to ascertain and report to the house the number of persons imprisoned for debt since the year 1820, in the District of Columbia; the time during which they had been imprisoned; the amounts of their respective debts; the portions thereof which had been paid in consequence of their imprisonment; the expense to the creditors of maintaining them, &c. &c. Mr. A. wished to inquire from the chairman of the committee for the District of Columbia, or from some other member of it, whether there had been any report from the secretary of the treasury in answer to the resolution.

[It appeared from a statement made by the clerk of the house, and Mr. W. B. Shepard, that such a report had been made during the present session of congress, that it had been placed in the hands of the official printer, but that, being very long, copies of it had not yet been furnished to members.]

Mr. A. said his reason for making the inquiry was, that amongst the prisoners was one of his constituents. The individual was confined there during the last session, at the time this resolution was adopted. He was there still, for debt; and it was Mr. A.'s firm belief that he was there only for having been too zealous in the discharge of his duty as an officer of the government; for debts vastly inferior in amount to what was due to him from the nation, if justice was done.

Mr. Pickens rose to make an inquiry from the chairman of the committee on foreign affairs. He wished to be informed at what time a report might be expected on the message of the president of the United States, which had been referred to that committee in relation to Texas? Or, whether any report at all was to be expected?

Mr. Howard was understood to say that he would cheerfully reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from South Carolina, though he (Mr. H.) did not know that it was the practice to make such inquiries in relation to the unfinished business before the committee of the house.

The committee had met several times, and had been diligently engaged in the investigation in relation to Texas. As yet, however, they had not been able to come to any conclusion.

After the reception of reports, and the house had refused to suspend the rules to permit Mr. Harlan to submit a resolution that on Monday next the states should be called for petitions in reverse order—viz: that petitions from the new states should be called first.

Mr. Bell gave notice that he would renew his motion for leave to bring in a bill to secure the freedom of elections. He had forborne to urge this subject on the consideration of the house, because he had expected that the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. C. Allan) in relation to grants of the public lands to such states as had not heretofore received them, would be disposed of this morning. But if the house would persist in these abortive motions to suspend the rule for partial purposes, he should be compelled to press his motion. He would waive it now, if the house would resume the consideration of that resolution.

The house resumed the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. C. Allan, of Kentucky, providing for grants of the public lands to such states as had not heretofore received them; together with the amendments thereto pending.

Mr. Lane, who held the floor when the subject was last under consideration, resumed and concluded his remarks.

Mr. Bell said he rose more for the purpose of submitting a few remarks on the propriety of bringing this discussion to a close, than for any other purpose, although the subject was of great interest, and though he had himself been perfectly willing it should be sent to a committee. He thought, however, that the proposition was too narrow for the time at which it was brought forward; and he thought that the necessity of broader action must have become apparent to every man. If there was one question, above all others, on which prompt action was required, it was that of disposing permanently of the various questions which had arisen in relation to the public lands. If they were to be distributed in any degree to any extent, let it be done. If it was not the sense of the country that this should be done, let congress declare that sentiment by a vote which would give proof of its permanence.

The question of graduation, for instance, was intimately connected with this subject. But he did not consider even that of so much importance, as that the question should be settled one way or another. He would give his voice at once in favor of the graduating system, provided the question could be settled permanently. Mr. B. then alluded to the question of pre-emption rights. Justice required that the inhabitants of the country should know what was to be our established policy; and that, if it was not intended to give these pre-emption rights, congress should at once declare so. He regarded the permanent settlement of these questions, however, as of far less importance than the mode by which they should be settled. He was ready to reduce the price of public lands, if such should be the sense of the house. He believed it to be for the interest of the country that it should be done, and he should hereafter, at a proper season, have something to say on this topic. He would move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until this day fortnight, in order that the states might be called in their turns for resolutions; or, if any member would suggest it, he would move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. Bond moved that the same be laid on the table. Mr. C. Allan called for the yeas and nays on this motion; which were ordered. Mr. Hunnicutt inquired of the chair whether, if the motion to lay on the table prevailed, the effect of that vote would be the final rejection of the resolution. The speaker said it would be in order to move to take up the subject at any time when motions of similar import were in order. Mr. C. Allan moved that the house proceed to the private orders of the day. Mr. Bell hoped the subject would be disposed of now.

Mr. Allan objected, and the speaker thereupon announced the private orders of the day, being engrossed private bills,—twenty two of which were severally read a third time, passed, and sent to the senate for concurrence.

The speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of the navy, transmitting a statement of the names of the officers of the navy who have, during the year 1836, received orders for service, and have asked to be excused, together with the reasons offered by them for such indulgence.

And the house adjourned.

Monday, Jan. 16. The unfinished business of the morning hour was the petition, presented on Monday last, by Mr. Adams, from 40 inhabitants of the town of Dover, in the county of Norfolk, in the state of Massachusetts, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia; the pending question being on the motion of Mr. Lawler that the petition be not received.

Mr. Bynum was entitled to the floor. Mr. Howard requested the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. Bynum), to yield the floor with a view to enable him (Mr. H.) to make another effort to give the states a chance of getting in their petitions. There were more than half the states in the union that could not have the opportunity. He proposed to suspend the rule, to enable him to offer a resolution that the states be called for petitions in reverse order. Mr. Bynum said he would have great pleasure in yielding the floor for that purpose, if it should be understood that he would be entitled to the floor when this petition should next come up. He thought the house should suspend the rule, to enable the member from Maryland to submit his resolution. Mr. Adams said he hoped the rule would not be suspended. He begged the house and the speaker to recollect that this state of things—Mr. W. B. Shepard rose to a question of order. A motion to suspend the rule he understood not to be debatable, and he hoped the chair would enforce the rule. The speaker said the motion could not be debated. Mr. Adams called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rule; which were ordered, and were—yeas 123, nays 58. So the rule was suspended.

Mr. Howard then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That in calling the states for petitions on this day, the speaker do call in the reverse order, beginning with the youngest territory.

Mr. J. Q. Adams called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution; which the house refused to order.

And the question was then taken and decided in the affirmative; ayes 125, noes 33.

So the resolution was adopted.

Petitions and memorials were now called for in the reverse order of states and territories.

Mr. Jones, of Ohio, presented the memorial of the managers of the Colonization society of Fredericksburg, Ohio, praying congress to further their objects in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Adams called for the reading of the memorial; which was read accordingly.

Mr. Pinckney moved to lay the memorial on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays on that motion, which were ordered; and were—yeas 130, nays 49; [Mr. Wise refused to vote.] So the memorial was laid on the table.

Petitions and memorials from Ohio having been further presented by Messrs. McLene, Webster and Whittlesey,

Mr. E. Whittlesey said, it having been the sense of the house that petitions relating to the abolition of slavery should not be discussed to-day, he begged to state that he had several such in his possession, but that he refrained from offering them, under the hope that, when he did offer them, he might be heard for a few moments, in relation to the direction which he thought should be given to them by the house.

The speaker presented a memorial from the grand jurors of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, soliciting that hereafter no petitions may be received or entertained by congress from societies or inhabitants of the non-slaveholding states, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Pinckney moved to lay the memorial on the table. Mr. Washington called for the reading; and it was read accordingly. Mr. Graham called for the yeas and nays on the motion of Mr. Pinckney; but the house refused to order them. And the question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative. So the memorial was ordered to lie on the table. Mr. Jenifer moved that the same be printed. The speaker said the motion was not now in order.

Mr. R. M. Johnson made an ineffectual motion to suspend the rule to enable him to offer the following resolution.

Resolved, That the committee on the post office and post roads report to this house a joint resolution making it the duty of the postmaster general to require the postage on express mail letters to be paid in advance.

Mr. J. complained of the burden imposed on members of congress in the course of their official duties on account of postages by this mail.

Mr. Wise presented the memorial of David Melville, of Newport, Rhode Island, former weigher and gauger, complaining that he had been unjustly removed from his office; asking congress to consider his case, and to adopt such measures as would protect citizens in office from arbitrary power and wanton oppression.

The petition, without having been read, was referred to the committee on commerce.

Mr. Jenifer made an ineffectual motion to suspend the rule to enable him to offer a resolution providing that the memorial of the grand jurors of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, protesting against congress either receiving or in any way entertaining memorials for the abolition of slavery in said District, as interfering with the rights of others, and endangering the peace and tranquillity of the citizens, be printed.

Mr. Heister presented the petition of 240 females of his congressional district, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and moved that the same be referred to the committee on the said District.

Mr. W. B. Shepard objected to its reception. Mr. S. said that, whenever a proper opportunity presented itself, it was his intention to offer a few remarks on this subject. He did now feel disposed now to violate the agreement which had been made with his colleague, (Mr. Bynum), that this discussion should lie over; and he moved, therefore, that the further consideration of the petition be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. Davis moved to lay the preliminary motion of reception on the table. Mr. Storer inquired if the effect of the motion to lay on the table, should it prevail, would not be to reject the petition for the time being. The speaker said the effect of the motion would be to suspend all action, and to leave the petition exactly where it was. And the question was taken, and decided in the affirmative; yeas 89, noes 37. So the preliminary question was laid on the table.

Mr. Lawrence presented the memorial of George Hallett, and four hundred merchants of the city of Boston, praying congress to establish steam and other vessels for the protection of the navigation of ships of the United States coming on our coast in the winter.

Mr. L. adverted briefly to the fearful loss of life and property which had taken place on our coast during the last year, to an extent unprecedented in our history. This loss was to be attributed in part to the want of a good system of pilotage, but mainly to the fact that vessels coming, after very long voyages, on a bleak and wintry coast, and short of provisions, required some protection and assistance which their own crews were not able to render. He moved that the petition be referred to the committee on commerce, and expressed a hope that some action would be speedily had upon the subject. The petition was referred accordingly.

[During the day, a number of petitions praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia were presented; which were, in every instance, met by the motion to lay the preliminary motion of reception on the table; and which motion prevailed.]

A number of resolutions of inquiry, chiefly relating to the claims of individuals, were offered and several bills received their first reading.

On motion of Mr. G. Lee,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so far extending the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States as to include therein all cases of robbery, larceny and theft, on property driven on shore, (or illegally taken), from vessels or wrecks of vessels on the coasts of the United States, whether above high water mark, or below that line.

On motion of Mr. Parker, the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Jan. 17. Mr. Underwood asked the consent of the house to submit a resolution, which he desired might be read for the information of the house. Mr. Jarvis objected to the reception of the resolution, and to its reading. Mr. Underwood said, if the clerk would return the resolution, he (Mr. U.) would state briefly its substance to the house.—Mr. Adams said if the gentleman from Kentucky was permitted to read the resolution, he (Mr. A.) hoped no more objection would be made to members reading papers in their places.

The speaker said the question could not be debated. Mr. Underwood inquired if it was in order to make a brief statement of the contents of the resolution? The speaker said it was in order so to do, but it was not in order to read the resolution itself.

Mr. Underwood said his object was to submit a series of resolutions, declaring the sense of this house that it was not competent, under the constitution of the United States, to change, alter, expunge, mutilate, or destroy the journals of either house of congress; that the preservation of the journals of either house of congress was a subject of national importance, and a fit subject of national legislation; that, after these journals had been faithfully kept and preserved—Mr. Cushman called the gentleman from Kentucky to order. Mr. Underwood declared that he had not yet completed the brief statement of the contents of the resolution, though he had nearly done so. The chair said he must request the gentleman from Kentucky to submit his motion to the house. Mr. Underwood said his motion was to suspend the rule to enable him to offer this resolution. Could he not read what was the purport of that resolution?

The chair said he thought not; the reading of the resolution having been specially objected to. A member could not himself read what the clerk was not permitted to read.

After a few further remarks on the point of order, Mr. Jarvis, with a view to save the time of the house, withdrew his objection to the reading of the resolution.

The same was accordingly read, and is as follows:

Resolved by the house of representatives, That the 3d clause of the 5th section of the 1st article of the constitution, in the following words, to wit: 'each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and, from time to time, publish the same, excepting such parts as may, in their judgment, require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members of either house on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal,' confers no power whatever on either house of congress, at a subsequent session, to change, alter, deface, expunge, or destroy its journal, or any part thereof, when the same has been regularly and faithfully kept during a previous session, and duly published.

Resolved, further, That the journals of both houses of congress, kept and published as aforesaid, after the adjournment sine die, become national archives, and that all attempts and acts of either house separately, or of both by joint resolution, to change, alter, deface, expunge, or destroy, either journal, or any part thereof, are violations of the constitution.

Resolved, That the preservation of the national archives from mutilation, disfigurement, and destruction, is a fit subject of legislation.

Wherefore resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be directed to report a bill, providing for the deposit of the original journals of each house after their adjournment sine die, in the office of the secretary of state; and for the punishment of every and all persons, their aiders and abettors, who shall alter, change, deface, expunge, or destroy, any part of either journal after such adjournment."

Mr. Morgan called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend, which were ordered, and were, yeas 77, nays 118. So the rule was not suspended.

A number of reports were received from different committees on the petitions of individuals, and appropriately disposed of, and some business transacted which will be noticed in its progress, after which the house proceeded to the unfinished business of the morning hour, being the resolution of Mr. C. Allan, providing that certain grants of the public domain be made to such states as have not yet received them; together with the several amendments thereto proposed.

The pending question was on the motion heretofore submitted by Mr. Boyd, to lay the resolution and amendments on the table, on which motion the yeas and nays had been heretofore ordered, and having been now taken, were—yeas 114, nays 82.—So the resolution and amendments were laid on the table.

Mr. Thomas moved to postpone the orders of the day, for the purpose of taking up at this time the bill from the senate to provide for the admission of the state of Michigan into the union on an equal footing with the original states.

Mr. Culhoun, of Massachusetts, called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and were—yeas 127, nays 71. [Two-thirds not voting in the affirmative.] So the rule was not suspended.

The house proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, heretofore offered by Mr. Wise:

Resolved, That so much of the president's message as relates to the "condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation," be referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said departments, or their bureaus or offices, or any of their officers or agents of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured or impaired the public service and interest; and that said committee, in its inquiries, may refer to such periods of time as to them may seem expedient and proper.

To which resolution it will be recollected Mr. D. J. Pearce offered an amendment; for which Mr. French had offered a substitute.

Mr. McKee addressed the house at some length in opposition to the resolution, and in favor of the amendment of Mr. D. J. Pearce. Mr. Jenifer also spoke at great length in favor of the original resolution, and in reply to the remarks heretofore made by Mr. Hamer. Mr. Vanderpoel said he took it for granted that those gentlemen who had made speeches in favor of the appointment of this committee, and those who proposed it, were in earnest; and were desirous to have it done immediately, in order that the work of investigation might go on, and something effectual might be done before the termination of the session.

We shall talk (said Mr. V.) to the end of the session, and then, what would those who originated the resolution say? They would say, you made your long speeches to the end of the session, and we had no time allowed us. For the purpose of obviating these objections, and in order to give to the friends of this investigation the broadest power that they could wish, and also for the purpose of doing justice to the administration party, and of saving them from the imputation that would rest upon them if this inquiry were not allowed, he would move the previous question.

After some little conversation between Mr. Wise and Mr. Vanderpoel, the latter gentleman withdrew his motion, on the pledge of the former that he would renew it.

Mr. Wise then briefly addressed the house against the course which had been pursued in relation to this resolution, and concluded by renewing the motion for the previous question—which was ordered. The main question was then taken, and the resolution carried; yeas 165, nays 9.

Mr. Bell gave notice that he intended to renew the motion he had heretofore made for leave to bring in a bill to secure the freedom of elections. On motion of Mr. Graves, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Jan. 18. After receiving reports and resolutions, the house proceeded to dispose of the unfinished business on the speaker's table.

A resolution, offered by Mr. Hawes, providing that all memorials, &c. on the subject of the abolition of slavery, should be laid on the table, without being referred or printed, and that no further action should be had thereon, was adopted (debate having been cut off by the previous question), by the following vote: yeas 129, nays 69.

Several engrossed bills were read a third time, and passed; and the consideration of sundry other bills, on their second reading, was postponed until to-morrow.

The bill to regulate the pay and mileage of members of congress coming up in its order,

The previous question was moved and seconded. The main question, being on the engrossment of the bill, was put, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading: yeas 186, nays 16.

The house, by a vote of yeas 86, nays 110, refused to commit the bill providing for the admission of Michigan into the union; and the same comes up in the order of business to-morrow.

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In the senate. Hon. Thomas Clayton, senator elect from the state of Delaware, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

The following message was received from the president of the United States, through Andrew Jackson, jr. his private secretary:

To the senate of the United States:

In compliance with the resolution of the senate dated the 16th instant, I transmit a copy and a translation of a letter addressed to me on the 4th July last, by the president of the Mexican Republic, and a copy of my reply to the same on the 4th of September. No other communication upon the subject of the resolution referred to, has been made to the executive by any other foreign government, or by any person claiming to act in behalf of Mexico.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Washington, January 18, 1837.

[TRANSLATION.]

The president of the Mexican Republic to the president of the United States.

To his excellency general Andrew Jackson, president of the United States of America. Columbia, (in Texas), July 4, 1836.

MUCH ESTEEMED SIR: In fulfilment of the duties which patriotism and honor impose upon a public man, I came to this country at the head of six thousand Mexicans. The chances of war, made inevitable by circumstances, reduced me to the condition of a prisoner, in which I still remain, as you may have already learned. The disposition evinced by general Samuel Houston, the commander-in-chief of the Texian army, and by his successor, gen. Thomas J. Rusk, for the termination of the war—the decision of the president and cabinet of Texas in favor of a proper compromise between the contending parties, and my own conviction, produced the conventions of which I send you copies enclosed, and the orders given by me to general Filisola, my second in command, to retire from the river Brassos, where he was posted, to the other side of the river Bravo del Norte.

As there was no doubt that gen. Filisola would religiously comply, as far as concerned himself, the president and cabinet agreed that I should set off for Mexico, in order to fulfil the other engagements; and, with that intent, I embarked on board the schooner Invincible, which was to carry me to the port of Vera Cruz. Unfortunately, however, some indiscreet persons raised a mob, which obliged the authorities to have me landed by force, and brought back into strict captivity. This incident has prevented me from going to Mexico, where I should otherwise have arrived early in last month: and in consequence of it, the government of that country, doubtless ignorant of what has occurred, has withdrawn the command of the army from gen. Filisola, and has ordered his successor, gen. Urrea, to continue its operations. In obedience to which order that general is, according to the latest accounts, already at the river Nueces. In vain have some reflecting and worthy men endeavored to demonstrate the necessity of moderation, and of my going to Mexico, according to the convention; but the excitement of the public mind has increased with the return of the Mexican army to Texas. Such is the state of things here at present. The continuation of the war, and of its disasters, is therefore inevitable, unless the voice of reason be heard, in proper time, from the mouth of some powerful individual. It appears to me that you, sir, have it in your power to perform this good office, by interfering in favor of the execution of the said convention, which shall be strictly fulfilled on my part. When I offered to treat with this government, I was convinced that it was useless for Mexico to continue the war. I have acquired exact information respecting this country, which I did not possess four months ago. I have too much zeal for the interests of my country to wish for any thing which is not compatible with them. Being always ready to sacrifice myself for its glory and advantage, I never would have hesitated to subject myself to torments or death, rather than consent to any compromise, if Mexico could thereby have obtained the slightest benefit. I am firmly convinced that it is proper to terminate this question by political negotiation; that conviction alone determined me sincerely to agree to what has been stipulated; and, in the same spirit, I make to you this frank declaration. Be pleased, sir, to favor me by a like confidence on your part; afford me the satisfaction of avoiding approaching evils, and of contributing to that good which my heart advises. Let us enter into negotiations by which the friendship between your nation and the Mexican may be strengthened, both being amicably engaged in giving being and stability to a people who are desirous of appearing in the political world; and who, under the protection of the two nations, will attain its object within a few years.

The Mexicans are magnanimous when treated with consideration. I will clearly set before them the proper and humane reasons which require noble and frank conduct on their part, and I doubt not that they will act thus as soon as they have been convinced.

By what I have here submitted, you will see the sentiments which animate me; and with which I remain your most humble and obedient servant,
ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANA.

The president of the United States to the president of the Mexican republic.

Hermilite, September 4, 1836.

To gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana:

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th of July last, which has been forwarded to me by general Samuel Houston, under cover of one from him, transmitted by an express from general Gaines, who is in command of the United States forces on the Texian frontier. The great object of these communications appears to be to put an end to the disasters which necessarily attend the civil war now raging in Texas, and asking the interposition of the United States in furthering so humane and desirable a purpose. That any well-intended effort of yours in aid of this object should have been defeated, is calculated to excite the regret of all who justly appreciate the blessings of peace, and who take an interest in the causes which contribute to the prosperity of Mexico in her domestic as well as her foreign relations.

The government of the U. States is ever anxious to cultivate peace and friendship with all nations. But it proceeds on the principle that all nations have the right to alter, amend or change their own government, as the sovereign power, the people, may direct. In this respect, it never interferes with the policy of other powers, nor can it permit any on the part of others with its internal policy. Consistently with this principle, whatever we can do to restore peace between contending nations, or remove the causes of misunderstanding, is cheerfully at the service of those who are willing to rely upon our good offices as a friend or mediator.

In reference, however, to the agreement which you, as the representative of Mexico, have made with Texas, and which invites the interposition of the United States, you will at once see that we are forbidden, by the character of the communications made to us through the Mexican minister, from considering it. That government has notified us that, as long as you are a prisoner, no act of yours will be regarded as binding by the Mexican authorities. Under these circumstances, it will be manifest to you that good faith to Mexico, as well as the general principle to which I have adverted, as forming the basis of our intercourse with all foreign powers, make it impossible for me to take any step like that you have anticipated. If, however, Mexico should signify her willingness to avail herself of our good offices in bringing about the desirable result you have described, nothing could give me more pleasure than to devote my best services to it. To be instrumental in terminating the evils of civil war, and in substituting in their stead the blessings of peace, is a divine privilege. Every government, and the people of all countries, should feel it their highest happiness to enjoy an opportunity of thus manifesting their love of each other, and their interest in the general principles which apply to them all as members of the common family of man.

Your letter and that of general Houston, commander-in-chief of the Texian army, will be made the basis of an early interview with the Mexican minister, at Washington. They will hasten my return to Washington, to which place I will set out in a few days, expecting to reach it by the 1st of Oct. In the mean time, I hope Mexico and Texas, feeling that war is the greatest of calamities, will pause before another campaign is undertaken, and can add to the number of those scenes of bloodshed which have already marked the progress of their contest, and have given so much pain to their Christian friends throughout the world.

This is sent under cover to gen. Houston, who will give it a safe conveyance to you. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

The message and documents having been read,

Mr. Preston made some remarks upon the present condition of affairs in Texas and Mexico, and urged the propriety and justice of immediately recognizing the independence of Texas. Mr. Walker concurred with Mr. Preston. Mr. Calhoun also expressed himself willing to vote for the independence of Texas, and the earlier the better.—The message and documents were then laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The remainder of this day's sitting was chiefly devoted to private bills.

In the house of representatives, after the expiration of the hour devoted to the reception of bills, resolutions, &c. the house proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the admission of Michigan, the question being on ordering it to a third reading. Mr. Thomas then addressed the house in favor of and Mr. Hardin against the bill—after which the house adjourned.

DOMESTIC CHRONICLE.

Morris canal and banking company. It is stated in a communication in the "New York American," that the directors of this company have made an arrangement with another incorporated company, whereby they will secure an income of six per cent. upon the entire cost of the canal and the works connected with it for the next five years, and provisionally for ten.

Attempt to rob the mail. The United States mail between Washington city and Georgetown, is carried on horseback, by a boy of about 17 years old.—On Friday evening the 13th inst. he was attacked by robbers, who seized the mail bag and would have made off with it had they not been frightened off by the arrival of a young man who most seasonably "came to the rescue."

Mortality in New York. The total number of deaths in the city of New York during the year 1836, was 8,009, being 917 more than in the year 1835. Precisely one-eighth of the whole number took place at the public institutions. There were 89 deaths by apoplexy, 40 by burning, 9 by cancer, 114 casualty, 1,514 by consumption, 90 by drowning, 503 by scarlet fever, 8 by hydrophobia, 73 by intemperance, 10 by lock-jaw, 453 by measles, 173 by small pox, 83 by suicide, &c. &c.

In 1835 the deaths, according to the population, were one out of every thirty-eight, and in 1836 one out of every thirty-four.

Mortality in Baltimore. According to the report of the health office, the number of interments in the city of Baltimore for the year 1836, was 2,374. Among them there were two white women, one aged 102 and one 112 years! Also six free colored women aged 120, 111, 105, 100, 100, 100 years.

Express mail. The editor of the New York "Courier and Enquirer" has established a private express mail between that city and Washington. This liberal enterprise is undertaken as a small return for the unprecedented patronage bestowed on that paper.

Maryland finances. The revenue proper of this state for the year 1836, amounts to $414,650 72, to which may be added for revenue accruing before 1826, but actually received within the last fiscal year, the sum of $31,029 46. The actual expenses of the state (including $4,065 97 to the sinking fund and $11,218 80 to the public buildings, and including stocks purchased in rail roads and canal companies) amount to $379,819 75.

Fires in Boston. There were in 1836, two hundred and eight alarms, seventy of which were false—twenty-seven out of the city, and twenty-nine caused by the burning of chimneys. Forty-four fires and attempts to fire, are supposed to have been caused by incendiaries. The estimated amount of property destroyed is $151,000, on which there was $62,800 insured.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 22.—Vol. I.]

BALTIMORE, JANUARY 28, 1837.

[Vol. LI.—Whole No. 1,322.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

63-In the senate of the U. States a bill was passed on Thursday last, by a vote of 25 ayes to 18 nays, (see page 352) which virtually repeals the late obnoxious treasury order relative to payments for the public lands. The bill was reported from the committee on public lands by Mr. Walker, and provided that the United States should receive the paper of such banks only as from this time issue no notes of less than $5, and of none issuing less than $10 after the 30th of December 1839—but was amended on its final passage, on motion of Mr. Rives, by extending the prohibition to the notes of banks issuing notes of less than $20 after the 30th of December, 1841. It also places certain restrictions upon the deposit banks, under the direction of the secretary of the treasury.

That this bill will pass the house, we cannot permit ourselves to doubt—and we may therefore, in advance, congratulate the country upon the prospect of a speedy removal of those difficulties which have embarrassed every honorable branch of industry and enterprise.

64-We have published the memorial of William B. Lloyd, esq. of Ohio, (the individual who was arrested in the gallery of the senate at the instigation of Mr. Benton, on the charge of having "hissed" on the passage of the expunging resolution) and his card complaining of the refusal of Mr. Morris, of Ohio, to present it to the senate. We have also, in justice to the latter gentleman, published his explanation of the reasons which induced him to decline the request—see page 248.

Another communication from Mr. Lloyd has been received for publication by the editors of the "National Intelligencer," in which he replies to the statements made on the floor of the senate by Mr. MORRIS, reaffirming what he had before said in reference to his communication with the senator, and his refusal to present his memorial: stating that his statement and Mr. MORRIS', closely examined, do not in fact conflict, only appearing to do so from the ambiguity of the language in that gentleman's explanation. In reference to the invitation from another quarter, to persist in presenting the memorial, he says—"As to the proposition of the honorable Mr. BENTON to the senate, for a further investigation of the matter, I have nothing to do with it. That body will do as it deems fit, and if senators wish me to answer any questions under oath, I am ever ready; but so far from attempting again to demand a hearing, the recollection of the specimen I witnessed on Monday night of their mode of administering justice, is sufficient to show me that I have erred in hoping for any thing of the kind."

MICHIGAN. On Wednesday last the bill for the admission of Michigan into the union, passed the house of representatives, and on the following day received the sanction of the president, and became a law of the land. On the same day Messrs. Lyon and Norvell the senators, and Mr. Cray the representative, of the new state took the oaths of office and their seats in the respective houses. The union now comprises twenty-six states, precisely double the number on the Declaration of our Independence.

DEPARTURE OF SANTA ANA. This officer and suit, arrived in Baltimore on Thursday last, and in the afternoon departed for Norfolk in the steamboat, from whence, it is said, he is to proceed to Vera Cruz in one of the U. States' vessels. During his stay in Washington he had several interviews with the president and was treated with much courtesy. It is not known, however, whether any thing was settled in relation to the object of his visit; but his departure was not expected a few days since; for we see it stated in the "Intelligencer," that it was understood he was to dine at the president's on Thursday in company with a large official and diplomatic party. It is presumed, however, that he departed with the knowledge of the president; or he could not be conveyed from the country in a public vessel.

It is probable that Santa Ana's departure has been hastened by the peculiar condition of affairs in Mexico; as by the last accounts, Bustamente had been called to the head of affairs, and Santa Ana declared an outlaw, and all persons invited to shoot him should he again appear in the Mexican territory.—

Vol. LI.—Sic. 22.

The last report is, probably, unfounded; but it is certain that Bustamente dreads the arrival of Santa Ana, whose party is still powerful. In the last "REGISTER" we announced the arrival of Gorostiza at the city of Mexico. On his arrival judge Ellis, the minister of the United States, demanded his passports and left the city on the 28th ult.—according to one account, without them. If they were withheld, it is rightly inferred that the Mexican government was in possession of the fact that the troops of the United States had been ordered to repossess into our own territory, and hence was unwilling further to interrupt the relations of the two countries; for it is not to be supposed that that government, with a knowledge of that fact, would increase the difficulties with which she is surrounded, by creating a new belligerent enemy.

Great preparations were making in Mexico to open the spring campaign against the Texans with vigor. The troops amount to about 16,000, well clothed and amply provided for. General Bustamente at a procession of monks, priests, &c. swore extermination to every being he could find in Texas, without regard to age or sex.

A letter, under date of January 3, from Vera Cruz, states that California has declared her independence of Mexico. If true the Mexican troops may be diverted from the contemplated campaign in Texas.

Filasola had been tried, and would have been condemned if the common people had not shown a disposition to protect him at all hazards.

By an arrival from Tobasco we learn that Gutierrez of the federal army, was about entering that place with a force of about 1,600 men. It was believed that he would meet with but a slight resistance. The American consul at Tobasco had arrived at New Orleans, having left it in consequence of the misunderstanding with Mexico.

P. S. Mr. Ellis has arrived at Pensacola in the U. S. ship Boston.

RECOGNITION OF THE INDEPENDENCE OF MEXICO BY SPAIN. The Courier des Etais Unis, (of New York), contains an article from the Paris Sun, which is thus translated in the N. York Evening Post, and is at this moment of a good deal of interest:

"SPAIN has done an act of justice and wisdom in determining to recognise, at length, the independence of her ancient colonies in South America.—The assembly of the cortes, in the discussion which took place on this important question, offered a spectacle of the highest interest. Never had it been so full; one hundred and forty deputies were present, and the resolution was adopted without a single voice raised against it. The treaty with MEXICO had been already prepared and signed, subject to the ratification of the cortes. This measure had been taken to avoid all delay. It is not generally known that the negotiations with the diplomatic agents of VENEZUELA have been broken off, the Spanish government not being willing to renounce the indemnities justly due by those of the American states, which, like VENEZUELA, have confiscated Spanish property during the war of the revolution. The case was different with Mexico, the independence of which is therefore declared without any condition."

GEN. SCOTT has completed his defence before the military court at Frederick, which has been laid before the public through the "National Intelligencer," whose reporter was present at its delivery.—It is an eloquent and able production, and though of great length shall be speedily inserted.

The court will now proceed regularly with the case of gen. Gaines, whose defence, when delivered, shall also have a place in our pages.

We have purposely abstained from noticing the highly graphic sketches of the personages and proceedings of the court of inquiry which have appeared in the Baltimore papers; but will, on the conclusion of the trial, present an abstract from the official account of the testimony for the information of our readers.

FLORIDA. In addition to the information contained in the letters from general Jesup, we learn that he was in close pursuit of the Indians, but as yet has not fallen in with them. Some negroes had been taken by the friendly Indians, after a skirmish in which some of the hostiles are supposed to have been killed. A white man named Jesse Bandy is stated to have been killed, and another named Sistrunk wounded. There was much sickness among general Jesup's volunteers, and the friendly Indians were completely broken down.

CUBA. The government paper of Havana of the 21st December contains the official account of the surrender of the revolted troops under the late governor Lorenzo, the departure of Lorenzo in a British ship of war, and the restoration of tranquility in that city and throughout the whole island, from the energetic measures of the captain general Tacon. The blockade of St. Jago de Cuba by the Spanish squadron is officially announced to be raised.

BURNING OF THE TREASURY. We learn from the "Intelligencer" of yesterday that immediately on the opening of the circuit court on Thursday morning, the court proceeded to deliver its decision in the case of Richard H. White. It will be remembered that in this case the jury had brought in a verdict of not guilty, on account of the statute of limitations, though they stated they believed him to have been guilty of the charge contained in the indictment of burning the treasury building. On this verdict the counsel for R. H. White had moved for the discharge of his client, and had been opposed by Mr. KEY, the prosecuting attorney, on the grounds that the verdict was not conclusive, it being argumentative, &c. Judge MORSELL first delivered his opinion, stating his reasons why he thought the verdict should be set aside. Judge THRUSTON next read his opinion, and concurred in sentiment with the abovementioned judge, that the verdict should be set aside, and a "venire facias de novo" should be ordered. Judge CRANCH then delivered his opinion, differing from his two learned colleagues. The majority of the court, however, being in favor of a "venire facias de novo," judge CRANCH concluded by stating the decision of the court to be that the verdict be set aside.

In consequence of this decision, Richard H. White remains still in prison, and his case will be tried over again.

Case of Harry White. This was the decision of the court on the motion, made on a former day by Mr. Brant, for an arrest of judgment for reasons apparent on the record.

Judge Morsell delivered his opinion in favor of the motion; judges Cranch and Thruston then delivered severally their opinions, with the reasons thereof, against the motion. The majority of the court therefore decided against the motion, and consequently the verdict of guilty against Harry White remains undisturbed. The prisoner, who was present in the court, was then remanded to prison, and will be brought up this morning to receive judgment.

THE TARIFF. Resolutions have been introduced into both branches of the legislature of Pennsylvania deprecating, in strong terms, a repeal of the duties established by the compromise act. They will pass, of course, by large majorities—but will be little heeded by those politicians of the day, who consider the triumphs of a party of more importance than the welfare of the country.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS. The following gentlemen compose the committee appointed by the speaker of the house of representatives in pursuance of Mr. Wise's investigating resolution: Mr. Wise, Mr. Pearce, of Rhode Island, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Mann, of N. York, Mr. Chaney.

U. STATES BANK. A preamble and resolution appointing a committee to investigate the manner in which the bank of the United States obtained its charter, and to inquire if it has not violated said charter, passed the house of representatives of Pennsylvania on Saturday last. The resolution was passed by a vote of 82 to 11; but the preamble, which strongly intimates that unfair means were used to obtain the charter, was passed by a much less majority, many of the Van Buren members voting against it.

GOLD COINAGE. Treasury department, Jan. 20, 1837. Notice is hereby given, that, under the provisions of an act of congress, approved the 18th January, 1837, all coins of the United States, both of gold and silver, bearing the date of 1837, and subsequent years, will have the standard such, that of one thousand parts by weight, nine hundred will be of the pure metal, and one hundred of alloy; that the weight of the gold coins will be the same as established by the act of June, 1834, the eagle having the weight of two hundred and fifty-eight grains, and the parts in proportion; and the weight of the silver coin will be reduced, so as to retain the same quantity of pure silver as heretofore, the dollar having the weight of four hundred and twelve and one-half grains, and the pure parts in proportion.

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the treasury.

OHIO SENATOR. William Allen (formerly a representative in congress, and a friend of the present administration) has been elected a senator of the United States from the state of Ohio for six years from the 3d of March next, to succeed Mr. Ewing, whose term of service will then expire.—There were thirteen ballotings, on the last of which Mr. Allen received 55 votes, and Mr. Ewing 52.

LOUISIANA SENATOR. Alexander Mouton, esq. has been elected, by a majority of six votes, to the U. S. senate from the state of Louisiana in place of judge Porter, resigned. Mr. Mouton was one of the Van Buren electors of that state.

THE NEW SENATE. The senate of the United States after the fourth of March next, will stand as follows:

VAN BUREN.

Maine—Messrs. Ruggles and Dana.
New Hampshire—Messrs. Hubbard and Pierce.
Connecticut—Messrs. Niles and Smith.
New York—Messrs. Tallmadge and Wright.
New Jersey—Mr. Wall.
Pennsylvania—Messrs. McKean and Buchanan.
Virginia—Messrs. Rives and Parker.
North Carolina—Messrs. Brown and Strange.
Georgia—Messrs. King and Cuthbert.
Alabama—Messrs. King and McKinley.
Louisiana—Messrs. Nicholas and Mouton.
Mississippi—Mr. Walker.
Tennessee—Mr. Grundy.
Ohio—Messrs. Morris and Allen.
Indiana—Mr. Tipton.
Illinois—Messrs. Robinson and Young.
Missouri—Messrs. Benton and Linn.
Arkansas—Messrs. Fulton and Sevier.
Michigan—Messrs. Norvel and Lyon—34.

OPPOSITION.

New Jersey—Mr. Southard.
Delaware—Messrs. Bayard and Clayton.
Maryland—Messrs. Kent and Spence.
South Carolina—Messrs. Calhoun and Preston.
Vermont—Messrs. Prentiss and Swift.
Rhode Island—Messrs. Robbins and Knight.
Massachusetts—Messrs. Webster and Davis.
Mississippi—Mr. Black.
Tennessee—Mr. White.
Kentucky—Messrs. Clay and Crittenden.
Indiana—Mr. Smith—18.

HONORABLE TESTIMONIALS. We have seen the swords manufactured in pursuance of the resolution of congress passed Feb. 18th, 1835, for presentation to the officers engaged under col. Croghan in his gallant and memorable defence of Fort Stevenson.—They are six in number, being intended for the oldest male representatives of lieut. Benjamin Johnson, captain James Hunter, lieutenant Cyrus A. Baylor, John Meeks, and ensign Joseph Duncan, and the nearest male representative of the late ensign Edmund Shipp, and were made by Mr. Robert Keyworth, of Washington city, who has reflected great credit on the state of art in this District, by the very handsome manner in which he has executed these costly presents.

The swords, with the exception of the names, are of a similar pattern. The handle and scabbard are of solid gold, richly chased. In form, the handle resembles a cross, with flat sides; on of which is the word "Sandusky," surrounded by rays in bright relief. On the obverse is a plain scroll for the inscription, and on the sides thirteen stars on a ground of frost-work. The knob at the end, has on one side a shield of the United States, and the figures "1818;" and the other a military scroll surrounding the letters "U. S." The guard is formed of rich foliage-work; and on an ivy leaf in the centre appears the word "Croghan," in relieved letters. The similar leaf on the opposite side being inscribed in like manner with the name of the officer for whom the sword is intended. The blade is richly ornamented, and bears in bright letters the name of each officer, with appropriate ornaments. Though the work has neither all the high finish nor elegance of design about it which we have observed in similar presents, it has the appearance of plain yet costly solidity, in good taste, and characteristic of the purpose and the occasion.

We understand that these splendid swords have cost the manufacturer near $1,000 each; a sum which has considerably exceeded that appropriated; but which, however, there can be no doubt that congress will make good to him, as the work could not be executed in a manner suitable to the dignity of the body ordering them to be presented, for less.

The same resolution ordering these swords, directed colonel Croghan to be presented with a gold medal, to which we think, in these matter-of-fact days, there should have been added a tract of land, or some other national reward suitable to the importance of the service performed, to make all these congressional rewards proportioned to the responsibility and agency of the commander and his officers.

THE BANKS OF PENNSYLVANIA. We publish to-day a carefully compiled abstract of the report of the auditor general in relation to the condition of the banks of this commonwealth. It presents a picture calculated to inspire entire confidence in the solvency of the institutions enumerated, and indeed we may well question if any banks in the union are better managed, or are safer as places of deposit than the banks of Pennsylvania. They all yield large dividends, and are conducted by men of high character and superior intelligence.

There are 17 banks in the city and county of Philadelphia, and the number of country banks is 32, making in all 49, and the aggregate of the whole number is as follows:

	City and county.	Country.	Whole amount.
Capital stock,	$51,180,205	$7,046,680	$58,226,835
Notes in circulation,	89,261,327	7,887,333	47,148,630

THE PATENT OFFICE. By the report of Mr. Ruggles in the senate, it appears that the destruction of this great national repository may be in a good degree repaired. The number of patents granted is about 10,000, and the commissioner believes that most of these may be obtained and recorded again. The whole number of models burnt was 7,000 and 3,000 of the most important of them it is believed may be replaced. The importance of these models, both for the protection of the rights of patentees, and as the most intelligible record of the history of inventions, to enable the proper officers to judge of the originality of new inventions, is distinctly spoken of by the committee.

There were also destroyed 168 large folio volumes of records; 26 large port folios, containing 9,000 drawings, many beautifully executed, and very valuable; 10,000 original descriptions of inventions, besides caveats and many other documents. There were also 230 volumes of scientific books. The report says the office contained the largest and most interesting collection of models in the world. No model had been preserved of Fulton's first steamboat, but there was deposited in the office a volume of drawings executed by his own hand, embracing, besides the various parts of his machinery, three beautiful representations of his steamboat passing interesting points on the Hudson, with sketches of the scenery. There were about 1,500 agricultural models; upwards of 2,000 in factory machinery; and 1,000 relating to navigation.

The sum required to replace the 3,000 models, which would include the most desirable, is estimated at $33 each, or $100,000 in the whole; the expense of procuring drawings, descriptions, &c. at $53,000, so that, with sundry incidental expenses, the whole expense of thus restoring the office would not exceed $156,100. This the committee think the government may well afford to pay, as this office has paid into the common treasury $156,906 more than its expenses. The commissioner believes a complete list of all patents issued can be procured. For the purpose of thus restoring this important establishment the committee report the bill which is now before the senate.

A WOMAN BURIED ALIVE. The Philadelphia Ledger gives an account of the burial of a mulatto woman in that city whilst still living. She was supposed to be dead, and about twenty hours after her supposed death, her body was conveyed to a burying ground. The mourners departed; and the grave digger, a white man, proceeded to his task of filling up the grave. He had thrown a few shovels full of clay upon the coffin when he thought he heard a noise within the grave; he listened awhile, then threw in a few more shovels full—but now he distinctly heard a groan proceed from the corpse.—Seized with a panic, he dropped his shovel and fled for assistance. The coffin was after some time disinterred, and the lid was found to be partly forced off. It was immediately unscrewed, and the corpse discovered, not in the position in which it had been placed, but turned round upon the side, and showing other evidence of having been alive while in the grave. It was taken into the church and kept there until the next morning, when no signs of life appearing, it was again interred.

WRECK OF THE MEXICO. In the present sheet we have published the report of the grand jury of New York on the wreck of the Mexico, which presents a melancholy picture of the sufferings of the passengers and crew. A subscription has been opened at all the newspaper offices in New York, for the benefit of Mr. Smith, who with his sons and grandsons, so gallantly plunged into the sea at Rockaway, in their little skiff, and took off the only persons saved from that awful disaster. Speaking of that noble act, the Philadelphia National Gazette says:

The patriarch, with his sons and grandsons, who, after dragging their boat for miles, launched it into such a surf under such an atmosphere as is described by those who witnessed the wreck of the Mexico, and rescued eight human lives at the risk of their own, would have earned statues from an ancient state, and poets would have made them immortal. The daily press can do little, perhaps, for such purposes, but it ought not to suffer their exploits to pass without emphatic and reiterated commendation. The spirit that prompts such exertions is of the best and brightest character—noble, brave and disinterested. Happily for the honor of our nature it is not often wanting when occasion demands its exercise, though it is seldom called into action under circumstances so appalling as those to which we allude. That boat's crew deserve to have their names enrolled as public benefactors, and to receive the thanks of every philanthropic society throughout the union.

LETTER FROM THE PRESIDENT. The following letter from the president of the United States to Mrs. Donelson, was received by her a few days previous to her death.

Washington, Nov. 27, 1836.

MY DEAR EMILY: Your kind and acceptable letter of the 11th inst. was received on the 23d, whilst I was confined to my bed by a severe hemorrhage from the lungs, which threatened a speedy end to my existence; but with sincere thanks to a kind Providence, who holds our existence here in the hollow of his hand, I have so far recovered as to be able to write you this letter, to acknowledge the receipt of yours, and to offer up to Him who made us, my most sincere and hearty thanks for his kindness to you in restoring you to health again, and with my prayers for your perfect recovery, and that you may be long spared to superintend the bringing up and educating of your dear children, and be a comfort to your dear husband, who has a great solicitude about you, and great anxiety to speedily return to you, but my sudden attack has detained him.

I rejoice, my dear Emily, to find your spirits are good, and that you are able to take exercise daily. This is necessary to your perfect recovery; and I trust in a kind Providence, that in time, you will be completely restored to your health. You are young, and with care and good treatment, will outgrow your disease; but you must be careful not to take cold this winter, and as soon as Dr. Hunt's prescription reaches you I would advise you to pursue it. The digitalis, I fear, is too exciting to the pulse.

The doctor tells me I lost from the lungs, and by the lancet and cupping, upwards of 60 ounces of blood, which stopped the hemorrhage, without the aid of that potent, but pernicious remedy to the stomach, sugar of lead. I am now mending as fast as I could expect, and if I can keep clear of taking cold this winter, I hope to be spared, and be able to return to the Hermite in the spring, and again have the pleasure of seeing you and your dear children, to whom present me affectionately.

My dear Emily—this chastisement by our Maker we ought to receive as a rebuke from him, and thank him for the mildness of it—which was to bring to our view, and that it may be always before us, that we are mere tenants at will here. And we ought to live daily, so as to be prepared to die; for we know not when we may be called home. Then let us receive our chastisement as blessings from God, and let us so live that we can say with the sacred poet:

"What though the Father's rod
Drop a chastising stroke,
Yet, lest it wound their souls too deep,
Its fury shall be broke.

Deal gently, Lord, with those Whose faith and pious fear,
Whose hope, and love, and every grace,
Proclaim their hearts sincere."

I must close with my blessing to you and the children. May God bless you ALL. Emily farewell. Affectionately,

ANDREW JACKSON.

THE GREAT RAIL ROAD. The project of extending the rail road from Harrisburg to Sunbury, and from Sunbury to Erie, is one of the noblest, most useful and practicable of any of the day.—One-third of the whole distance is nearly completed. The whole length from Philadelphia, by the state rail road to Lancaster, the Middletown rail road to Harrisburg, and a rail road by the way of Sunbury and Williamsport to Lake Erie, will not exceed 400 miles. The whole of this distance can be made without a single inclined plane where stationary engines must be used, and following the waters of the Susquehanna, the Sinnemahoning, the Tioga, the Allegheny and the Brokenstraw, three-fourths of the whole distance there will not be a plane of any kind of an inclination of 50 feet to the mile. The state rail road from Lancaster to Philadelphia, will have the highest grades upon the whole route. This alone will give the Pennsylvania rail road the advantage over every other rail road from the Atlantic to the lakes, that has ever been, or can be projected. Its length, too, is one-fifth less. Besides, it will run through one of the richest mineral regions in the world. The products and trade of the great lakes will not only seek an outlet to the ocean by this route, but the great iron, as well as the bituminous coal region of the West Branch, and the anthracite mountains and rich agricultural valleys of the Susquehanna, will swell the vast stream of wealth, that will pour into the lap of our commercial metropolis, when this great work shall have been completed.

¶ We have lately read the report of the engineer that surveyed the New York rail road, through the southern counties of that state, from Dunkirk, on Lake Erie, to Tappan, 24 miles from the city of New York, on the Hudson river. The following is its length:

Western part,	260 miles.
Eastern part,	222 do.
From the eastern termination, to the city of New York,	24 do.

Whole length, 506 miles.

¶ Thus, it will be seen, that the route through Philadelphia, and then across New Jersey, will be nearer to New York itself, from her own termination, Dunkirk, than on her own rail road, when it is finished. But this is not all the advantage we have in distance. Dunkirk is about 40 miles farther down the lake than the town of Erie, and this distance, added to the New York road, will show, that no passengers from the western states will take the New York road, when our road is finished, when Philadelphia can be reached through Pennsylvania, by a route 150 miles shorter, and New York itself is 50 miles nearer, than on her own contemplated rail road. But even this great saving of distance is not our greatest advantage. The New York rail road has a number of inclined planes. By the report now lying before us we perceive, that there are eleven planes, with an inclination of 50 feet to the mile. Six planes with inclinations varying from 50 to 60 feet per mile, and five having inclinations from 50 to 70 feet per mile. Twelve miles have a grade of 70 feet inclination to the mile.—Four miles and nearly one-half ascend at the rate of 72 feet per mile. Three-fourths of a mile, at 100 feet per mile; and more than one mile and a half at 316 feet per mile. The following are only a few of the planes, with their grades, length and distance from Tappan on Hudson river, 24 miles from New York:

AMERICAN ENTERPRISE. A writer in the London Morning Chronicle says, "active measures must be resorted to, or commerce in the Archipelago will be at an end. We have active and enterprising rivals in the Americans, who will be glad to take advantage of the disuse of our manufactures to introduce their own. The trade of the west coast of Sumatra is almost entirely in their hands, and their knowledge of the Archipelago is superior to our own, for while we trust to the natives to bring the produce to market, they trade in their own ships, the commanders of which are generally experienced merchants. With the easternmost islands they are particularly well acquainted, owing to their ships having formerly been much employed by the Dutch, and they frequently call there for the purpose of picking up articles for the China market; but their profits cannot at present be very great, as from the want of a depot, they are obliged to go from place to place to collect them, which takes up a considerable time."

AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY. The hon. Henry Clay, of Kentucky, has been unanimously electd president of the American Colonization society, in the room of ex-president Madison, deceased. Annexed is Mr. Clay's note to the secretary, accepting the appointment.

Washington, Dec. 22, 1836.

Dear sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 19th inst. informing me that, at the last annual meeting of the American Colonization society, in this city, I was unanimously elected its president. I receive, with very great sensibility, this distinguished proof of the confidence of the society, and request you to communicate my acceptance of the office, and my respectful acknowledgements to those who have bestowed it.

Regarding the American Colonization society as the only practical scheme ever presented to public consideration for separating, advantageously to all parties, the European descendants upon this continent from the free people of color, the descendants of Africans, with their own consent, and of ultimately effecting a more extensive separation of the two races, with the consent of the states and individuals interested, I shall continue to cherish the highest interest in the success of the society, and will contribute whatever is in my power to promote its prosperity. I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

WAR IN FLORIDA.

We lay before our readers extracts from two letters, dated 23d December, recently received at the war department from maj. gen. JESUP: [Globe.

Fort Brooke, Dec. 23, 1836.

SIR: After writing to you on the 18th instant, I ascertained from my Indian scouts and spies, whom I had kept constantly employed in scouring the country, that not a sign of hostile Indians could be discovered at or near any of their strongholds on the Wythlacoochee. All the trails are in a south easterly direction, and Powell, if he has not been deserted by his followers, has probably determined to draw the war into the neighborhood of Micanopy, Jumper and Philip, to compel them to adhere to him with their warriors.

As the enemy could not be found where we expected him, and the term of service of the Tennessee volunteers having expired, I determined to avail myself of the movement of that corps to send the wagon train to Tampa Bay, for supplies for the depots which I had found necessary to establish.

I left brigadier general Armistead in command of the forces on the Wythlacoochee, with orders to scour the country from Fort King to that river, and to take the most active measures to find the enemy; and I came through with a small escort to Fort Foster, for the purpose of designating the point to be occupied as depots, in addition to those already established.

I have ordered lieutenant colonel Foster to erect a work on the Wythlacoochee at the place where the Fort King road crosses it. It will be completed in a few days, and a wagon train will leave here to-morrow to supply it with subsistence, forage, tools, &c.

Learning by express from colonel Henderson of the arrival of commodore Dallas, I came hither to arrange with him a plan of combined operations for the campaign. He is several miles below, but I expect him here to-day.

I have established an abundant depot at Fort Foster, twenty five miles in advance of this place; the fort which lieut. col. Foster is erecting on the Wythlacoochee, is twenty nine miles in advance of Fort Foster. Fort Armstrong is fifteen miles further north, near the point where the road from Volusia unites with the road to Fort King; the two last posts command the principal retreats of the enemy on the Wythlacoochee. These posts, with that near the mouth of the Wythlacoochee, and that at Volusia, will be sufficient for the present.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient serv't, (Signed) T. S. JESUP.

HEAD QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE SOUTH,
Fort Brooke, Tampa Bay, Dec. 23, 1836.

Sir: Since I wrote to you this morning, com. Dallas has arrived, and has offered to furnish men from the ships of war under his command, to defend my depots, and to perform any other service at the posts, or in water expeditions, which the public interests may render necessary.

The commodore has acted on this occasion with the same disinterested and magnanimous zeal which distinguished his conduct during the Creek campaign.

His co-operation, which I most readily accept, will relieve me from many embarrassments, and will enable me to take the field several days sooner than

I had hoped. He will send an officer, with a party of sailors, to ascertain the practicability of navigating the Wythlacoochee, and will furnish the force to garrison Fort Clinch, on that river.

You shall not be disappointed in my efforts, though you may be in their results. The country is so extensive, and contains so many hiding places for large as well as small parties, that the enemy may escape from me.

Major Nelson, with a battalion of four companies of mounted volunteers from Georgia, arrived, and reported this evening. He came through direct from Fort Clinch to this place. Two companies of his battalion were retained by brig. gen. Wool in the Cherokee country. The four companies here amount to about two hundred men; these, with the Alabama volunteers, will make my mounted force near five hundred men.

I am greatly embarrassed by the difficulty of obtaining laborers, drivers and artificers. If the war should not be brought to a close in a few weeks, I shall send to Cuba for mule drivers, and to New Jersey for artificers and laborers.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
TH. S. JESUP.

The hon. B. F. Butler, sec. of war, Washington city.

A valedictory letter from governor Call to gen. Armstrong, commanding the Tennessee troops lately serving in Florida, appears in the southern papers. It seems to be due to the governor to publish the following extract from it:

Volusia, Dec. 8, 1836.

GENERAL: In retiring from the command of the army of Florida by order of the president of the U. States, there is nothing which I more regret than a separation from yourself and your brave companions in arms.

The important services rendered by you, general, and by them to the territory, which it has been my lot to govern, has imposed on me an obligation of gratitude which a lifetime of efforts could not repay.

To leave you, then, still struggling in the field, and laboring, by your manly efforts, to render further and still more important services, fills me with a regret which I cannot express.

Deprived of my command, and covered with the reproaches of the highest authority of the country, it was my fixed determination to follow where I could not lead, and participate with you in the remaining dangers and privations of the campaign.—But here, too, fate has decreed against me, and I must submit to my destiny.

My health, feeble as it was at the commencement and as it continued throughout the campaign, is now rendered more precarious and distressing by an attack of the lungs, from which I should not only be useless in the field, but by which I am admonished of the necessity of seeking relief without delay.

I must confess there are other causes of regret with which I retire from the field. I have been superseded in command, with deep and wounding censure.

I complain not of the act of depriving me of command, but of the manner and the cause for which it is alleged to have been done.

I complain that I was condemned unheard, and on rumor unsustained by truth.

To have been superseded in command in courteous terms by the government would have been no disgrace; as you will find in my successor a more able and experienced general, and one who has cut his way to distinction on the blood-stained and glorious fields of Chippewa, Bridgewater and the Thames. But the act was done by a rude and unfeeling hand, and, as I conceive, with the greatest injustice.

Here, however, are my own wrongs, general, and as such I will not dwell upon them. My object is not to excite your generous sympathy: I must stand or fall on the facts hereafter to be exhibited. My intention is to express my deep sense of gratitude, and to take an affectionate farewell of you, and through you of the brave officers and men of your command.

GENERAL SCOTT.

From the Richmond Enquirer.

We lay before our readers, the following card from gen. Scott, with great satisfaction. It serves to correct some of the errors which have been set afloat concerning the interesting scenes which are now exhibited at Fredericktown. We did not decline as the general states, the republication of the sketches which have appeared of the evidence before the court—but we republished them with some caution as to certain political allusions. From all that we can hear, we entertain no doubt of general Scott's honorable discharge of all blame or censure in the events of the southern campaign:

Frederick, Md. Dec. 29, 1836.

To the editor of the Enquirer:

SIR: Amidst laborious occupations, a paragraph in your paper of the 24th instant, has just been pointed out to me, in which you decline republishing, for reasons, the reports which, I understand, have, from time to time, been given in the public papers of the proceedings of the court of inquiry at this place. I thank you for that forbearance; for, with the Enquirer, another paper was shown me, containing the report of major Kirby's evidence, in connection with which, I am made to speak in terms both disrespectful and injurious of a high functionary, his excellency, the governor of Alabama. I assure you, that this is an error. Not a syllable of that character escaped my lips; nor have I uttered a political sentiment before this court. I did, however, on the occasion alluded to, regret or complain that his excellency had not condescended to acknowledge either of my letters to him of the 31st of May last—both of which, as I stated, were conceived in respect, and expressed in the language of courtesy; and I showed, by major Kirby, that they were sent in duplicate and by two several conveyances.

Who the reporter in question may be, I do not certainly know. I think it probable, however, that he was introduced to me a few days ago at the court room. I had never known that person before, or have had any other communication with him in any form. From two or three of the printed reports that I have seen, the writer evidently entertains for me the sentiments of good will, for which I am duly thankful; but in those particular reports, he has certainly given my language but very partially, and in several cases, like that noticed above, has made me speak disrespectfully, and even harshly, when no disrespect was expressed or intended. This may, in a great degree, be accounted for from the fact, that the supposed writer has never been seen, as I learn on inquiry, to make a note in court.

I pointed out to the court some embarrassment that I had experienced in my operations, (owing to a combination of untoward circumstances), from the non-reception of any answer, and added that, if I had thought of it in time, I might have caused an interrogatory to be sent to his excellency; but that, possibly, he might in that case, have treated my interrogatory as he had treated my letters. In this, I may have done an injustice rather to myself than the governor, and which I may sincerely regret on better information. With him I have not the honor of being personally acquainted, and know of no reason in the world why I should not entertain for his private, as well as his public character, the highest respect. Probably, it occurs to me, on reflection, he came to the conclusion, that the information I sought for, from him would be, or had been, obtained through another channel, but that also having failed me, it became important to me to show to the court that I took every measure to ensure the reception of my letters. Hence the questions to major Kirby.

At the commencement of the court, a friend, every way qualified, intimated to me a desire on his part to report the proceedings from time to time, for one of the public journals. At my urgent solicitation he promised to abstain, and I know from him, that he has made not a single report or note.

You are at liberty to make such use of this note as you may please, and if published, it will be the first line from me which has been printed by my permission or procuration, in a twelve month—save a letter to my friend, capt. Robinson of Augusta, on the subject of troops of long and short periods of service. In haste, I remain, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant, WINFIELD SCOTT.

LIBERATION OF SANTA ANA.

To the editor of the Natchez Courier:

SIR: The Mexican general Santa Ana and his friend and aid-de-camp, colonel Almonte, have been released from their captivity in Texas, and passed up the river a few days ago on their way to the city of Washington. They are escorted on behalf of the Texian government by col. Hockley, inspector general of the army, col. Bee, late secretary of the treasury, and capt. Patton. I accompanied them from this place to Vicksburg, and the views which have induced the visit of Santa Ana to our capital have been placed in my possession with the request that I should make public so much of them as might be interesting to the people of this country.

In view of a speedy and pacific adjustment of the sanguinary war which has existed between Mexico and Texas, the captive general solicited permission, from the Texian government to throw himself upon the protection of the United States, and claim the interposition of the mediatory offices of their chief magistrate. He proposed to acknowledge the republic of Texas as an independent and sovereign nation—or to agree to the incorporation of her territory into the North American union if the other parties interested should so determine. Being a prisoner of war—and the Mexican government having expressly declared that it would hold no negotiation with Texas through gen. Santa Ana while he so remained in duress, it became necessary, if his authority and influence were to be made available at all, that he should at once be placed in a different attitude, in which he might,—set free and untrammelled, unbiassed by any disparaging circumstances, but according to his unquestioned legal right—that he should, in fact, be restored to the full and complete possession of all his lawful authority and power as president of Mexico. To effect this his immediate and unconditional release by the government of Texas was indispensably requisite—and under the peculiar circumstances which exist in connection with his captivity, it was deemed advisable that the pacificatory offices should be invoked of some neutral power, friendly to both of the belligerent parties, and impartial between them. General Santa Ana therefore proposed to visit Washington, and solicit the mediation of the president of the United States, and his proposal was acceded to by the executive of Texas, who believed that nothing could possibly be gained by detaining him longer. On the first of March next the term of his presidency will expire, after which time he would be utterly valueless as a prisoner.

The people of Texas are anxious to terminate the war. They wish to live at peace with Mexico.—They desire most heartily to establish their government, and if possible to annex themselves to our own union. They could hardly hope to attain their object while they held the chief of their enemy in the bonds of imprisonment. They have therefore, in a spirit of magnanimity deserving of all praise, voluntarily surrendered him to his liberty, on the pledge of his word of honor that the war shall be terminated, that peace shall be restored, that the relations of amity and friendship shall be cultivated and cherished. Respectfully, your ob'd servant,
JNO. M. ROSS.

Natchez, 21st December, 1836.

The following has allusion to an article in the last "REGISTER" under the head of "Texas and Mexico."

To the editors of the "National Intelligencer."
Washington, January 21, 1837.

MESSRS. GALES & SEATON: I have this moment observed in your paper of this morning an extract from the Philadelphia Gazette, well calculated to have an injurious effect on the interests and character of Texas, and therefore requiring at my hands an immediate correction. It seems that the extract alluded to, originally appeared in the New Orleans Standard, and "furnishes," as the editor says, "a curious account of the action of the different branches of the Texian government in relation to the release of Santa Ana." It happens, however, that this "curious account" is more curious than true. I was a member of the senate of Texas at the time spoken of, and can therefore speak from my own knowledge. A resolution, (as is correctly stated), was passed by the senate, requiring that the president should not release general Santa Ana and colonel Almonte, without the consent of that body; which resolution was immediately vetoed by president Houston.—Thus far the newspaper account is true, but here a total perversion of the real state of the case takes place, in representing president Houston as releasing Santa Ana in violation of law. When the president returned the resolution, with his objections, the senate did not attempt to repass it with the constitutional majority of two-thirds, but without a dissenting voice acquiesced in the views of the president, and admitted his right to release the prisoners without the consent of either house of congress.

The house of representatives also passed a special resolution, in which they stated that the custody and release of the prisoners belonged exclusively to the president. It is due to truth to state that many in both houses disapproved the policy of the measure.

The "extract" which has called forth this communication, also conveys the idea that the president used the army for the purpose of overawing congress. Now, the truth is, the army was not within 150 miles of the seat of government, nor was the transaction known at head quarters for a fortnight afterwards. Respectfully, yours, &c.
WM. H. WHARTON.

[The paragraph above referred to was, by an error of the press, credited to the Philadelphia Gazette, instead of the Alexandria Gazette, from which we took it. The same news in substance has, however, been published in nearly all the public journals, and it is proper that, so far as it is erroneous, it should be corrected.] [Editors.]

The New Orleans Courier, speaking of Santa Ana's liberation in Texas, and his condition here says:

"It is evident that Santa Ana is still in duress, virtually, if not actually; for being liberated conditionally, on going under an escort, as a guard, to Washington, to ask the mediation of the United States government, cannot be considered legal and uncontrolled freedom."

There is not the slightest pretext for the assertion that Santa Ana "is still in duress, virtually, if not actually;" that he is "liberated conditionally," and comes "under an escort, as guard, to Washington." The two or three gentlemen who, on the part of the Texian authorities, have attended Santa Ana, and his secretary, Almonte, to this place, did so at his request, and doubtless for the purpose of smoothing his way through the United States, and introducing him to the public authorities here. The idea that two or three citizens of Texas would be permitted to make the United States a prison for those who have fallen into their power in Texas, is in itself preposterous. No prisoner of war to a foreign power could, after having come within our neutral limits, be considered longer a prisoner. The moment Santa Ana touched our soil, he was as free as the air he breathed.

The suggestion that he is still in duress becomes the more ridiculous, when the absolute manner in which he has been absolved from the existing government of Texas is understood. He is liberated by the Texians, as we understand, not merely that he may be restored to perfect personal freedom, but that he may be restored to his official station in Mexico before the term of his office expires. Their object doubtless is to enable him to bear home a thorough knowledge derived from actual observation, of the condition of things in Texas, and of its posture as it regards Mexico and this country, and that he may do this under circumstances to put a stop to the unnecessary effusion of blood, if his opinion in regard to the profitable character of the war should lead him to that course. [Washington Globe.]

WRECK OF THE MEXICO.

To the honorable the court of general sessions in and for the city and county of New York.

The grand inquest in and for the body of said city and county upon their oaths present—

That they have felt themselves bound by the great excitement produced by the recent fatal shipwrecks in this vicinity, to inquire into the causes thereof, for the purpose of ascertaining how far they could be attributable to any culpable neglect on the part of the pilots of this port, and in the hope that such inquiry might in any event be conducive to the public good.

Their investigation has been particularly directed to the loss of the barque Mexico, as bearing more directly on the question of negligence; and although they were unable to procure the attendance of the captain in consequence of his absence from the city, they believe they have obtained every important fact from the witnesses examined.

It appears that the vessel made the light house at Sandy Hook on the 31st of December; that on Sunday she was standing off and on, firing and making signals for a pilot without success, and part of the time with a signal of distress flying, although it was not observed by the steamer, which came within five miles of her. On Monday her position is a matter of some doubt; it being alleged by the captain that she was cruising within a short distance of the Hook, while the pilots say that on that day they went out to sea many miles and saw nothing of her.

On that night she was blown off by a severe gale from north west, and on Tuesday, 3d January, she regained her station, and encountered the catastrophe which has so deeply wounded the public sensibility.

It is evident that both in the case of the Bristol and Mexico, that their loss is not attributable to the wind, which was moderate and off shore, and the grand inquest feel bound to state their conviction that both these casualties might have been avoided by the exercise of a suitable degree of caution on the part of the officers and crews of these vessels.

It appears the Mexico approached Sandy Hook, [December 31.] The pilot boat whose turn it was to be at that station, having exhausted her stock of pilots, returned to the city, and that her place was to have been supplied by another boat, which relied upon being towed out on Sunday by a steamer, but was disappointed, and attempted to go down without her, and got among the ice in the Narrows, and was unable to get to the Hook until next morning.

So that during the whole of Sunday their being from 12 to 15 sail of vessels waiting for pilots, and only one ship (the George Washington) got supplied, and that was obtained from the steamboat New Brighton, which having towed a ship to sea, brought the Geo. Washington up to the city, and the captain of this steamboat is positive that no signal of distress was exhibited by the Mexico while he was in sight of her, nor any guns fired until she had taken the other ship in tow.

The grand inquest believe the preceding statement of facts is a fair analysis of the extensive examination entered into by them in relation to this unhappy event.

Desirous, however, of prosecuting their inquiries in the hope of eliciting information, calculated to promote the security of the lives and property of their fellow citizens, the grand inquest required the attendance of many of our most active ship owners, ship masters, port wardens and pilots from whom the following was obtained.

It appears, that forty years since the number of pilots actually in service in this port, was about 30; in the year 1819, when the existing laws regulating the pilot system were enacted there were thirty-eight, and the number now limited by law to sixty, although from various incidental causes, those actually fit for duty do not exceed fifty, and probably on an average the number is less, which the grand inquest feel constrained to say from the information before them, is wholly inadequate especially during the quarantine season to the wants of this port.

It appears that there are but six pilot boats in commission, to each of which are attached, exclusive of the licensed pilots, from three to five apprentices to the profession, who constitute the crew.

These apprentices are bound by law to serve five years before qualified to act as pilots, and as they generally enter at an early age, this qualification is generally attained at or before the period of majority.

Taking these data and the probable period of their subsequent services as pilots, to be thirty years, it shows that nearly 150 are fitted for the calling, while not more than sixty being eligible by law, it follows that three-fifths of the number fitted for employment by the devotion of several years of their lives to obtaining information so important to themselves and their fellow citizens are prohibited by law from the service of their vocation; an abridgment of natural rights, which, in the opinion of the grand inquest, is not only prejudicial to the public interest, but is wholly inconsistent with the spirit of our government and the clearest principle of public policy.

It further appears that there are several partners to each boat, but that the total amount of pilotage paid on vessels arriving at, or leaving this port, is treated as a common fund and divided equally among all the branch and deputy pilots; this dividend is stated by the pilots to amount on an average to 1,200 a 1,300 per annum, to each, and it is contended by the pilots, as the grand inquest conceived with much reason, that this is not more than a fair compensation to men who lead lives of great exposure and responsibility.

The grand inquest are compelled to state that, without exception, the testimony of every merchant and ship master, examined by them, was such as to reflect great discredit on the vigilance and activity of the pilots of this port, as compared with the pilots of any other port of our own coast, as well as of the principal ports of Europe.

It seems to be the inevitable result of a system which selects so small a number for so great a work, and which secures to them, by legislative provisions of the strictest character, the exclusive enjoyment of these offices, and in certain cases giving them a moiety of the compensation where no service is performed.

And to the combination before alluded to, the greater portion of the existing evils may be fairly attributed; for being secure of a rateable proportion of the entire income of the profession, the indolent are placed on a footing with the enterprising and moral, and every incitement to emulation is completely paralyzed.

It is true that the wardens of the port are by law authorised to interfere in case of any mal-conduct or neglect of duty on the part of the pilots; but the natural reluctance to become an accuser, and thereby invite the hostility of the party accused, as well of the transient character of those who would be the complainants, and the formalities requisite to produce effect, occupying time and trouble, has seldom placed the charges before that body in any specific shape. That there is room at present for their interference, by causing the dismissal from office of members of this body, whose general habits render them notoriously unworthy of so high a trust, was made too palpable before the grand inquest to admit of a doubt, and in their opinion calls for the exercise of authority in some quarter to apply a remedy, which is due not only to the welfare of society but to the character of the otherwise respectable association upon whose habits and conduct they are a reproach.

So sensible have the pilots been of the necessity of greater discipline in their own body, that they have from time to time established regulations for their government, and especially as to the stationing of their boats; and have imposed penalties on their infraction, but not being legally authorised to enforce them, they have proved nugatory and ineffectual.

The grand inquest feel that they have dwelt sufficiently long on a topic fraught with such painful interest to every member of the human family, and especially to every citizen of the metropolis of the commerce of the western hemisphere, whose reputation and prosperity are so deeply involved in the question now before them.

That great abuses exist in the operation of the present system they think has been fully demonstrated, and that the system itself is at war with the fundamental principles of a government which professes to cherish a fair competition in every branch of industry, leaving the community to extend their patronage in proportion to the merits of the competitors.

Various suggestions have been made, having in view an improvement of the present system, and of affording relief to vessels approaching the coast, among which have been proposed the erection of a light house and artificial harbor outside of Sandy Hook—throwing open the business to the licensed pilots of New Jersey, &c. but the grand inquest do not consider this a subject within their province to discuss. To the wisdom of a more competent tribunal must be left the selection of a remedy, and they cannot doubt that the rigid investigation which the subject is now undergoing in the minds of the whole community, will cause such an organization as shall place our city on a footing with the proudest seaport of the old world, and make the approach to her shores a matter of security to the millions whom the glorious institutions of our country invite to visit them.

Signed in behalf of, and by the unanimous order of the grand inquest.

CINCINNATI PORK MARKET.

The following interesting account of the manner in which hogs are slaughtered in the great pork market of the west, is from a letter to the editors of the New York Express, dated Cincinnati, Dec. 31.

Some of the items I gave you in my letter of the 9th inst. on the subject of pork, and particularly on the slaughtering, I had collected sometime since.—Having visited the packing and slaughtering houses within the last day or two, I found additions and improvements had been made this year, I was not before aware of. I will therefore give you another letter on pork, and go somewhat into particulars. Less is doing this winter in pork, than was anticipated during the past summer. It was known that hogs were plenty throughout the country, and it was believed that the prices would consequently be low—or lower than last year—but the uncommonly high prices paid last winter, induced the drovers to scour the country and purchase all the hogs they could find, and on driving them to the city, they demanded what our packers thought an exorbitant price—say for hogs weighing 200 to 250 pounds, $7 00 per hundred—the consequence was, that the packers generally declined purchasing, and the drovers would not sell for less, so that but few hogs were packed for the first three weeks of the season. In fact, up to this time, only about 50,000 hogs have been slaughtered, whereas two years ago, at the same time, more than 120,000 were slaughtered and packed. Some of our pork merchants are not packing at all, others are doing a little, and none to an extent of former years. Hogs, however, remain firm at the prices demanded by the drovers, and sales were made yesterday at $7 25 per hundred pounds, for hogs weighing about 250 pounds. The pork season generally lasts about eight or ten weeks—last year it closed in less than eight weeks—in fact, but few hogs were slaughtered after the first of January. Eighty thousand was the number packed last winter. (In the publication of my letter of the 9th, by a typographical error, the number is set down at 60,000.) It is supposed that there will not be more packed in the city this winter than last, and about a half of the number of winter before last. Hogs are driven to this market from the interior of Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky. I will now give you the modus operandi of slaughtering, which is performed with such expedition at the slaughtering houses of John W. Coleman, esq. who has made a large fortune at this business. I find, on visiting these houses, which are situated on the north east extremity of the corporation line, and bordering on a small stream called Deer creek, or, as it would more properly be called at this season of the year, Bloody Run, that the number of slaughter-houses now amount to nine, the largest of which is 160 feet long by 80 wide. The others average 100 feet long by 60 wide; Mr. Coleman has also another slaughter-house at Covington, on the Kentucky shore, which makes in all, ten houses. At each of these houses, he has now employed, 36 to 40 men—making altogether, about 380 men, to whom he pays $1 25 to $2 per day each. Near these houses are pens of various sizes, and covering altogether, about forty acres of ground—into these pens are driven the different droves of hogs by their respective owners, as they come into the city, preparatory to the operation of slaughtering. These pens hold from 100 to 1,000 each. In these slaughtering houses there are large kettles at each end, filled with water, which is kept constantly boiling, and the operation of killing, scalding, dressing, &c. goes on simultaneously at both ends of the several houses—the hogs are hung up in the centre to be dressed, before removing them to another part of the building to cool. Attached to each end of these houses is a small pen that will hold about 50 to 60 hogs—into these pens the hogs are driven until they are so compact, that the executioner walks in on their backs, bearing in his hands a large sledge hammer with which he “deals death and destruction” all around him. When they are all knocked down, they are removed within the building where the knife is passed into the throat. After bleeding, they are thrown into the kettle of water (one at a time) and thence, after sufficient scalding, removed to a bench, when the bristles are scraped off by iron scrapers, made expressly for the purpose, and thence hung up, when the “gutter,” as he is called, passes his knife from one end of the hog to the other, and removes the offal, and completes the dressing; and so scientific have these surgeons become, that any one of them can complete the inside dressing, removing all within, washing out, &c. of three hogs within the minute—and, as I stated in my letter of the 9th—each set of men, at each kettle and bench, at either of these houses, will knock down, bleed, scald, remove the bristles, and complete the inside dressing of fifty hogs within the hour—which would be one hundred hogs at each house, or one thousand at all the 10 houses, in a single hour. I learn they now work about eight hours per day, and were it necessary—to such perfection has Mr. Coleman brought this science of “hog killing”—that he could at this time at his ten houses, slaughter, and have completely dressed and hung up to cool, eight thousand hogs in one day. I will venture to say, there is no place in the world, out of Cincinnati, where this can be done, and here it can be done. In past years, before Mr. Coleman had arrived at such perfection in the art, he has slaughtered, dressed and hung up, in four houses, and some of them not in double operation, as now—twenty-seven hundred in a day—say 8 or 9 hours work. The same ratio for ten houses, would make 6,750. Mr. Coleman has no competition in this line of business, and I am now informed, that the gut lard, soap grease and bristles (which is the only compensation received for slaughtering) is worth about 50 cents for each hog—which would amount to fifty thousand dollars for slaughtering a hundred thousand hogs. No mean business, this—and all accomplished within 8 or 10 weeks.

When the hogs become cool, they are conveyed on large wagons made expressly for the purpose, to the packing-houses, which are the largest and most splendid warehouses in the city—there they are cut up and packed, the lard rendered and put in kegs, and the hams cured for smoking.

In the winter and spring of 1835, we exported about sixty thousand barrels of pork! and one hundred thousand kegs of lard! Last winter and spring we exported about half that quantity, and the winter and spring of 1837, we may possibly export more than last year, although it is somewhat doubtful.—The quality of the hogs this year is better than it was last, and consequently more clear pork will be packed than then. There is so far a good demand for all the new pork and lard; sales have been made, and are now making, at the following prices;—clear pork $22; mess $20; prime $18; lard 12 cents. Two weeks since, sales were made at prices ten per cent. lower than these. These prices are higher than this time last year, and it is thought they will be maintained.

In the article of hams, our pork merchants (those who turn their attention to it,) furnish better hams than can be found in any other part of the country. I will venture the assertion, that the sugar hams, cured by William M. Walker, and Miller & Lee, cannot be surpassed in flavor and goodness of quality, generally, in the United States. I am aware that the Virginia hams are good. I am also aware, that the hams cured in or about Boston are good—very good—and there is a reason for it. The hogs are fed wholly on corn, the meat is solid, and the hogs generally fat; but still they cannot match the family hams put up by Mr. Walker, and Miller & Lee, of this city—they know how to cure them—and that is the great secret, and a secret known but to few. Others of our pork merchants cure most excellent hams, and perhaps equal to any. I have not had an opportunity of knowing. One thing is certain, not only the hams, but the pork and lard, exported from Cincinnati, stands high in all the southern and eastern markets.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

The anniversary of the battle of New Orleans was celebrated by the democratic citizens of Philadelphia at the Old Masonic Hall, in Chesnut street, on Monday the 9th inst. George M. Dallas, esq. presided, assisted by nineteen vice presidents.

After the regular toasts, the following letters from the president and president elect, were read by colonel Henry Simpson, on behalf of the committee of invitation.

Washington, Jan. 4, 1837.

GENTLEMEN: The kind manner in which you have addressed me, inviting me to meet my friends of the city of Philadelphia, on the 8th of January, affects me deeply. The honor you do me as a public man, although well appreciated, is not half so dear to me as the feeling of personal attachment among my fellow citizens, which you inform me solicits an opportunity of giving me a heartfelt welcome before bidding me a sincere farewell to the shades of the Hermitage. Personal debility and the pressure of public business, with other causes, will deprive me of this last occasion of showing how strongly I reciprocate the kind and disinterested regard which has animated my friends in Philadelphia to support me through so many trials, and at such sacrifices to themselves. They will, I trust, find some reward in the consciousness that they have toiled for one who, at least, meant well for his country. With sincere regard, your friend and fellow citizen,

ANDREW JACKSON.

To Messrs. Henry Simpson, Henry Horn and others, committee of democratic citizens of Philadelphia.

Washington, Jan. 5th, 1837.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your polite invitation to join my democratic friends of the city and county of Philadelphia in their celebration of the anniversary of the victory of New Orleans. The obliging and truly kind terms in which your invitation is couched, as well as the feelings of respect and gratitude with which I have been impressed by the incorruptible patriotism and steadfast friendship of those you represent, increase my regret in being compelled, by official duties, to deny myself the pleasure of joining you upon the interesting occasion. There is no portion of the people of this country whose opinion of the high deserts of general Jackson is entitled to more weight than that of the people of Pennsylvania.

They were amongst the first to rally under his political standard—have been amongst the most constant of his supporters—his administration has undergone in that state the test of rigid scrutiny, and it doubtless will be amongst the most cheering of his recollections, that Pennsylvania, powerful and respectable as she is, has sustained it to the last. Political history does not afford an example of a more useful or a more honorable connection between a representative and his constituents.

I am not insensible, gentlemen, how much there is of personal kindness in the flattering, but undeserved comparison which you are pleased to institute between my humble services and those of the distinguished individual, one of whose heroic achievements you are about to celebrate.

To be thus associated with him, however, in the confidence and affections of the democracy of the city and county of Philadelphia, excites my liveliest gratitude; and I beg you to be assured that no exertion shall be spared on my part, to realize the flattering anticipations which you have had the goodness to express. Accept my friendly salutations, and believe me to be, very truly, yours,

M. VAN BUREN.

To Messrs. Henry Simpson, Henry Horn, H. D. Gelpin, B. E. Carpenter, J. Thompson, Peter Hay, A. L. Roumfort, committee.

ÆOSTATION EXTRAORDINARY.

CROSSING THE CHANNEL. On Monday, Nov. 14, Mr. Green and his companions dashed off in the royal balloon, with intention to reach (wind and weather favorable) the metropolis of France. The ascent was intended to be a private and not a public one, so far as the admission to the gardens or giving notice in the newspapers; but the secret was communicated to a few, and those persons, with their friends, eagerly embraced the opportunity of witnessing so remarkable an event. Mr. Holland, Mr. Monck Mason, and Mr. Greene, had the honor and the risk of departing on this voyage of discovery.—They proposed, by regulating the ascent, to seek for such a stream of air as would take them, if possible, towards Paris, and if that should not be practicable, they would be guided by the current, which might lead towards the Belgian capital; and in case they could not make the opposite coast, whether French or Belgian, they determined to remain in the air all night. The inflation commenced about seven o'clock in the morning. The balloon was inflated almost to its utmost dimensions, and appeared capable of sustaining an aerial flight for many hours or even days.

In the car were upwards of a ton of ballast, several gallons of brandy and wine, a large supply of coffee, cold fowls, ham, &c. an apparatus with unslacken lime for heating the coffee, and every other appliance to insure comfort and prevent starvation and cold. There were also a supply of blue lights, stars, and other fireworks, to be let down at night, if the voyage was not accomplished before dark, in order to enable the aeronauts to reconnoitre the country from their elevation, and choose the point of their descent, and a number of parachutes, to which letters were fastened, to be dropped at intervals in the course of progression, for the purpose of apprising the public of their transit, arrival and safety—in a word, a more complete equipment cannot be conceived. They were moreover, furnished with passports from the French and Dutch embassies, and with a letter from the king of Holland from his representative in this country. The ascent took place at half past one P. M. The balloon took at first, as near as possible, the direction of Maidstone, and crossed the Medway seven miles south of Rochester, at 12 minutes to three o'clock.

At four the aeronauts were two miles south of Canterbury, and caught the first glimpse of the sea within a quarter of an hour afterwards. They quitted England precisely at twelve minutes before five; being then about one mile east of Dover Castle. The passage from London to Dover was therefore effected in three hours and eighteen minutes. At ten minutes to six the balloon made the French coast, about one mile to the east of Calais. The transit across the water, occupying one hour and two minutes, appears to have been the quickest part of the passage. It appears to have passed close by Cassel, and within a few miles of Lille, and by the south of Waterloo and Brussels, and over Namur, where it arrived at half past eleven. Hitherto the course taken had been east south-easterly; but at this period a direction due east must have been taken. This, however, could not be accurately ascertained, as at midnight they were in almost total darkness; nor did the day begin to break till towards five o'clock. At ten minutes past five the greatest altitude during the whole trip was attained; measuring twenty inches to the barometer, giving an elevation of two miles.

The balloon crossed the Rhine to the north of Coblenz at about six o'clock, and effected a perfectly easy and safe descent a mile or two beyond Weilburg, in Nassau, on an estate of the grand duke, who has, it is said, (but for this part of the story we do not vouch), lent his palace to the aeronautic party for the accommodation of themselves and their balloon. The exact extent of the distance traversed it is difficult to calculate with nicety, on account of the different currents which may have occasioned a deviation from the direct line, which, supposing it to have been precisely kept, would be as nearly 345 miles as possible. Weilburg is situated equi-distantly from Coblenz, Wisbaden and Frankfurt, at about thirty miles from each, nearly due north of Wisbaden. For this novel experiment in the art of balloon travelling, and for any results important either to science or locomotion which may accrue from it, the public are indebted to Mr. Robert Holland, a gentleman who has turned much attention to the subject, and at whose sole expense this enterprise has been carried into effect.

EXHIBITION OF SILK GOODS.

The following highly interesting article from the Nantucket “Inquirer” has been on file for some time, and we regret we could not find room for it until now. What will become of this interesting branch of American industry if Mr. Cambreleng’s grand scheme of reducing the revenue to the wants of the government, is carried into effect?

A sort of fair was holden at the establishment of the Atlantic Silk company on Thursday and yesterday, which was visited by between two and three thousand persons—all of whom expressed their surprise and gratification at the perfection of the works, and the beauty of the products. Among the various articles offered for inspection, we have only time to enumerate the following:—

Raw silk. Samples of the kinds imported by the company from Bengal, Canton, Smyrna, Naples and Calabria respectively—some of the skeins measuring when opened, near thirty feet in circumference—the winding of which required the construction of reels especially for this purpose: Samples of American silk, reeled in Wilmington, N. C. in Worcester county, Mass. at New Bedford, by J. Rotch, esq. and in Nantucket. The three latter specimens were decidedly the best, and were indeed of a quality superior to any others exhibited.

Cocoons. Specimens of different kinds—mostly produced in this state; among which were noticed some which were perfectly white, others varying from a greenish yellow to a deep orange color.—One lot, very splendid, and of extraordinary size, from Rochester, (Mass.) attracted much notice, being probably the largest and best ever exhibited in the United States.

Cloths. Samples of silk cloths intended for handkerchiefs, woven in the gluten. These comprised specimens of the fabrics made in July last, being the company's first attempt, and of those now in course of manufacture. The astonishing improvement made in the course of a few months, was obvious at a glance. White and nankin colored velveteens, of silk warp and cotton filling, for vestings, pantaloons, &c. very stout, and displaying all the lustre and high finish of goods composed entirely of silk. Here was also a piece of handkerchief goods, sent hither from Spitalfields, Eng. as a specimen of the fabrics woven in that place by hand looms, from a certain quality of stock, a lot of which was imported at the same time: lying with it was a sample of the goods manufactured in this mill by power looms, from precisely the same stock. The great difference in favor of the latter, excited the admiration of every observer.

Finished goods. These consisted mostly of silk aprons and handkerchiefs—the latter of almost every conceivable pattern, and varying, from pure white, with a neat pencilled border, to hues of great brilliancy—some comprising six or eight gorgeous colors and dazzling figures intermingled. These articles being on sale, were rapidly bought up—most of the visitors feeling desirous to possess a memento of the early establishment, of this important branch of industry upon our island. We noticed an eager preference for the white sort, which, unluckily, constituted but a small proportion of the whole number. Among the handkerchiefs were two placed in contrast—one woven in July, the other in October—showing a wonderful advancement in the art. Also, a beautiful handkerchief, woven by hand loom, the silk of which was raised, reeled, thrown and manufactured by Mrs. A. Brooks, of Scituate, Mass.; the whole machinery used in the several processes, we understand, having been made in the family of Mr. Brooks.

The above colored and stamped goods were all printed by Mr. J. W. Halliday, of the Boston and Lynn Printing and Dyeing company, and were manufactured under the superintendence of Mr. Lloyd A. Waite, agent of the Atlantic Silk company.—The construction and operation of the manufacturing apparatus, the product of Mr. Gay's inventive ingenuity, excited great interest. The medal awarded by the New York Mechanic's Institute, was also presented for examination; it bears a characteristic device, and the following inscription:—"Awarded to the Atlantic Silk company of Nantucket, for specimens of silk, and silk goods.—Sept. 1836"—to which compliment, we doubt not, every visitor on this occasion will cheerfully render a favorable response.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

MEMORIAL TO CONGRESS.

To the honorable the senate and house of representatives of the United States in congress assembled,

THE MEMORIAL OF THE BOARD OF TRADE OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK,

Respectfully represents—

The subscribers, in behalf of the board of trade, embracing merchants and traders, citizens of New York, beg leave respectfully to invite the attention of congress to the present deranged state of the currency and exchanges of the United States, and ask their interposition to remedy it. They do this, not merely in their character as citizens, but because their residence and their occupations, necessarily connecting them with the general business of the United States, make them the earliest witnesses and the first sufferers by any disorder in our monetary system, and impose upon them the special duty of giving the earliest notice of its existence.

It is an obvious truth that the great object of commerce is to convey the products of industry from the original producer to the ultimate consumer, and that all obstructions, and all charges upon their passage, although apparently borne by the intermediate agents, must yet fall at last on the productive classes, and are, in fact, only another form of tax on the industry of the country. The undersigned, therefore, deem it right, not merely for themselves, but for all the great interests of the union, to state that the advantages which the U. States have for some years enjoyed in regard to their currency and exchanges, have ceased, and that while every thing in the country, all the branches of industry, every species of its produce, the rapid extension of its internal improvements, its relation with foreign countries, all indicate a high degree of prosperity, yet great inconvenience and distress are felt in consequence of the uncertain and vacillating condition of the currency and exchanges. The want of a uniform circulation of universal and equal value is a source of constant embarrassment. The exchanges, the charges upon the carriage of the produce of the country to its destination, have become so disordered as to interpose a commercial barrier between different sections of the union, while, as an inevitable consequence, the interest of money has risen to a rate so oppressive as to threaten ruin to all branches of industry. A correct view of the change may be obtained by comparing the rates of exchange between parts of the United States and the city of New York, in the years 1829 and 1836.

But few banks deal in exchanges at the lowest rates here quoted and when they do it, it is to a very limited amount, when compared to the immense wants of the mercantile community.

The extent of those evils upon all the operations of industry, will be readily seen by congress, and needs no illustration from your memorialists, who will proceed to the more agreeable task of suggesting what seems to be the appropriate correction of them.—It is this:

The whole moneyed system of the U. States is in the hands of certain corporations called state banks who furnish directly or indirectly all the currency, and negotiate by far the greater part of the domestic exchanges. That their instrumentality has been eminently useful, if not necessary, is willingly conceded. But to their safe administration it was early deemed essential that the general government, charged with the care of the circulating medium, and with the commercial regulations between the states, should by means of its revenue superintend and to a certain degree control their movements. For this purpose was devised the national bank, which since the foundation of the government has formed a part of our monetary system, except in a single interval when evils produced by its absence occasioned its re-establishment. The country was still languishing under the exhaustion of the revolutionary war, when the bank of the United States in 1791 re-established its credit, furnished a sound currency, and gave safety to its internal exchanges. When it ceased in 1811, the creation of a multitude of state banks produced a suspension of specie payment and a total derangement of the currency and the exchanges, which nothing could retrieve but

Since the institution has ceased to possess the power of control given by the public deposits, both the currency and the exchanges have relapsed into confusion, and the question now forces itself upon congress, by what process the restoration can be accomplished. The memorialists do not hesitate to recommend as the most easy, simple and effectual expedient, the return to the known and tried system of a national bank, which our own experience and that of the great commercial nations of Europe concur in recommending. That some controlling power is necessary, must be manifest. According to the report of the secretary of the treasury to congress at its present session, within less than three years the paper circulation of the banks has increased from 76 millions to 120 millions, the banking capital increased from 200 millions to 300 millions; and the legislatures of 27 states and territories exercised the power of augmenting at will their number. Here then are 27 sovereignties with an indefinite power to make banks. Here are several hundred banks with an indefinite power to make currency. They cannot control each other, the state governments cannot control them, since the power of the state government is fitted more to prepare than to prevent the excesses of banking, so that there is no efficient check on the exercise of a power upon which every man's property depends for its value, and every man's industry for its reward. That such a state of things can long be endured is impossible. That it must end in total derangement, to be rectified only by a great confusion is manifest, and it seems therefore the part of true wisdom to anticipate, and, if possible, to prevent these excesses. This can be done in two ways only. By the power of the treasury, or by a national bank. But the power of the treasury, over such a multitude of institutions, is necessarily very imperfect. It can operate only on banks which are the depositories of the public revenue, comparatively few in number, and not able, however disposed, to superintend the operations of other banks.

The extreme penalty too which the treasury could apply to any bank negligent of its credit, would be the refusal of its notes for revenue, a penalty which would be rather a benefit by withdrawing its supererogation from the offender. With every possible respect too, for those who have been, or may hereafter be at the head of the treasury, it is obvious that there is no peculiar fitness in that department for the superintendence of banks, and that there may be great danger in thus making the moneyed concerns of the country a mere appendage to a subordinate department of the executive. The present scheme was examined by Mr. Gallatin, the secretary of the treasury, in 1809, and he said of it, that the state banks could not transact the public business as well as the bank of the United States; "nor," added he, "is it desirable that the general government should, in respect to its own operations, be entirely dependent on institutions over which it has no control whatever. A national bank, deriving its charter from the national legislature, will, at all times, and in every emergency, feel stronger inducements, both from interest and from sense of duty, to afford to the union every assistance within its power." It was tried by Mr. Dallas, in 1814, and he declared that "the establishment of a national institution, operating upon credit, combined with capital, and regulated by prudence and good faith, is, after all, the only efficient remedy for the disordered condition of our circulating medium." If this plan of insulated state banks, supervised by the treasury, be insufficient, there remains only one expedient, the national bank, which has the obvious recommendation, that, during forty years of its existence it succeeded perfectly. Placed at the head of the banks of the United States, with the public revenue to collect and disburse, coming into constant business contact with all the state banks, it, and alone, can exercise that habitual and gentle, and salutary supervision, which is at once the check of each and the security of them all. In short, such an establishment has existed, and is familiar to the habits of the country, and your memorialists desire nothing better than to return to that system under which the commerce and currency of our country so long prospered.

As to the power of the government to recognize such an institution, it is presumed that no doubt can now be entertained. It was established during the administration of Washington, and has received in some form, more or less direct, the sanction of all his successors. Even in refusing his assent to the act of congress passed in 1823, the present chief magistrate said "that a bank of the United States competent to all the duties which are required by the government, might be so organized as not to infringe on our own delegated powers or the reserved rights of the states, I have not a doubt. Had the executive been called upon to furnish the project of such an institution the duty would have been cheerfully performed."

Your memorialists accordingly request, that as the moneyed concerns of the country are already deranged, and are tending to still greater confusion, congress will, without delay, create such an institution as is suggested by the president, by which great advantages may be conferred on the country, while the rights of the general government and of the states, may be scrupulously protected from encroachment and injury.

From the relation which exists between this city and every section of the United States, in the operations of trade, as well as the receipts of the public funds, your memorialists also request that the said institution may be located in New York.

In behalf of the board,

The above memorial was unanimously adopted by the board of trade, at a meeting, January 4, 1837.

THE POST OFFICE CONFLAGRATION.

In the house of representatives, Friday, January 20.
Mr. Connor, from the committee on the post office and post roads, which was, on the 15th December, instructed to inquire into the causes of the recent conflagration of the post office department, made the following report:

The committee on the post office and post roads report that, in obedience to the resolution of the 15th ultimo, instructing them "to inquire into the causes of this morning's conflagration of the general post office building; and also to inquire what losses have been sustained by the government, and whether any, and, if any, what legislation is rendered necessary by such conflagration;" "and that they be authorised to send for persons and papers in investigating the causes of the burning of the post office building," did, at an early day thereafter, proceed to the investigation. They summoned and examined, on oath, all persons whom they could learn or suppose any information could be obtained from on the subject. Among those, were the postmaster general, the city postmaster, the commissioner of patents, the watchmen, messengers, and several clerks belonging to each office, together with citizens who were ascertained to have been upon the ground immediately after the alarm of fire was given.

It appears from the testimony that the fire was discovered between the hours of three and four o'clock in the morning. As to the precise time, it will be seen there is some difference in the statements of witnesses; and it is but reasonable there should be, in the hurry and bustle of getting out of bed at that hour, and hastening to the scene. Samuel Crown, a messenger, who was sleeping in the city post office, and Joel C. Reynolds, a watchman in the general post office, seem to have been the first persons to discover the smoke, and give the alarm. Crown was awakened from sleep by the smoke. He rose. Finding the room filled with smoke, he examined the fire in his room; went into the passage; it was filled with smoke. He waked up Mr. Summers, a watchman, and Mr. Cox, a clerk, both of whom were sleeping in the city office. He ran out of the east door, and found smoke issuing from beneath the platform or steps, by which you enter the east end of the building. He passed round to the south side, fronting on E street, broke open the cellar windows. He felt the heat sensibly at the third window from the east corner, and at the fourth window it was quite hot. Mr. Cox, on rising, opened necessarily two doors connecting with the great letter-room, and passed through one corner of that room in getting to the east door; his own room adjoining and the letter-room were filled with smoke, but no light was to be seen. He heard the fire crackling beneath his feet as he passed out.

Mr. Kennedy, one of the clerks in the city office, resides near the building; heard the alarm, and was on the ground shortly—and made several ineffectual efforts to enter the letter-room, as did others. But such was the density of the smoke when the first discovery was made, and very quickly afterwards of heat, that it is believed an effort at any time after the discovery would have been unavailing. Very shortly after this, the fire was seen bursting through the floor in the letter-room, as is supposed some fifteen or twenty or thirty feet from the east door of that room. The fire increasing rapidly, very quickly appeared at the window on the south side, and burnt through the second window on the east side of the south delivery-door. In the testimony of those who reached the ground early, there is scarcely any difference in relation to the smoke issuing from the cellar windows, and proves conclusively that the fire originated in the cellar, under the city post office. About the time that the fire burst from the cellar windows and the window above on the east side of the delivery-door, an engine had arrived and was in readiness, and commenced playing, first into the cellar window, and then in at the upper window into the letter-room. A momentary hope seems to have been entertained that the fire might yet be extinguished. But the water failed, and the building was given up by all for lost. Other engines arrived, but too late to render any service. An engine belonging to the post office department was, very shortly after the discovery of the fire, brought, but was ascertained to be out of repair and useless. That, and some buckets belonging also to the post office department, are the only means which seem to have been provided at any time to meet such contingency. Not a ladder of any length could be obtained in the neighborhood of the building. Several witnesses expressed the opinion, that, had there been engines and other means necessary at the building within a reasonable time after the discovery and alarm, the fire might have been extinguished.

The officers, clerks and messengers, reside in different parts of the city, many of them at so great a distance from the office as not to have heard the alarm; others at so late an hour as not to have gotten to the ground until the building throughout was in flames. Those who were present seemed to exert themselves in doing whatever could be done.—The postmaster general, residing within a few rods of the building, was, very shortly after the alarm was given, at the office, and, apprehending the consequences, went directly into his office, and commenced, with some two or three others there, the getting out of the books and papers belonging to the post office department. Those on the first and second floors were gotten out, except the files and some books belonging to the offices of appointments. Those were in cases in the rooms and around the walls adjoining the patent office. Some books from the third story were saved; the greater part were lost.

Your committee have examined thirty-two persons, whose testimony they here present. That testimony, taken together, is conclusive to the minds of your committee, that the fire did originate in the cellar under the city post office; but in which room in the cellar they will not undertake to say certainly, and are unable to charge the fire with certainty to any particular cause. From the testimony of the messengers in the city post office and patent office, it appears that they were in the habit of depositing ashes in the cellar; a practice that your committee views as highly improper and dangerous. On the morning preceding the fire, the messenger attached to the patent office did deposit a small quantity of ashes in the third room from the east corner. They were taken up, he states, the morning before their deposite, and remained there that day and night in an iron vessel; and such was their precaution, that they never did deposite the ashes in the cellar on the day they were taken up. Those ashes are represented as being placed in a pine box that would contain from fifteen to twenty bushels. In this room the patent office had their winter's wood stored. The box stood near a brick wall, and some four or five feet distant from the wood. Yet other boxes were near the one used as an ash-box.

It further appears, from the testimony of several, that, some year or more ago, a box placed in the passage in the cellar for the purpose of depositing ashes in, did take fire, but was fortunately discovered in time, and ousted, before any injury was done. It is possible that the fire may have originated in this box containing ashes, but from the evidence your committee are left in doubt and uncertainty. The box was placed near a brick wall, some four or five feet distant from the wood. Other boxes, dry, and of inflammable material, (pine), were near and on the side that stood the ash-box, and, on being set fire to, would have produced a flame that would probably have been seen by those who first discovered the smoke. Yet those witnesses who were earliest on the ground saw no light in the cellar, but all agree in seeing smoke issuing from the windows, and most freely from those in the second and third rooms from the east corner. That the fire originated in one of two rooms in the cellar, (the second and third rooms from the east corner), there is no difference of opinion with your committee; as to the particular room, some difference of opinion is entertained, the majority being unable to decide in which of the rooms it commenced.

The testimony of Mr. Cox, a clerk, and Mr. Crown, the messenger, both of whom slept in the office, as well as others, proves that all was safe in the office at about half after two o'clock that morning; a portion of the clerks were necessarily in the office every night until about that hour; that morning, about half after two, the business was closed, and the clerks left the office for their homes; on their retiring, the fires in the hearths and stoves were examined by Mr. Cox and Mr. Crown, and so secured that there was believed to be no danger before they went to bed. Mr. Summers, the watchman, whose duty it is also through the night to give out the mails, states in his testimony that about three o'clock that morning, he was called up by the driver for the southern mail; that, after delivering it, he went out of the east door and over the platform or steps, under which smoke was afterwards discovered; at that time all was calm and quiet, and there was no appearance or smell of smoke.—It appears that charges to be careful about fire were almost daily given by the postmaster to those around him. In the post office department there were two watchmen employed, who took it by turns in watching through the night, one of whom was on duty until midnight, when the other was aroused to his duty, and continued up until sunrise; they were required often through the night to be out, and look around not only that part of the building occupied by the post office department, but the whole building.

The diagrams marked A and B will exhibit the position of the rooms in the basement or cellar, and the first floor or city post office. C exhibits the building after the fire, with the marks of fire and smoke. The old building was occupied entire by the general post office, and the new part or east end, erected some ten or twelve years since, the first floor of which was occupied by the city post office, and the second and third stories were occupied by the patent office. The passage in the cellar, in connexion with that in the old building, was continued quite through the new one, and on either side were divided into rooms which have been used for wood, coal, lumber, &c. The first room in the south east corner had in it pine wood and coal; the second, west, was filled with oak and pine wood, both belonging to the city office; the next or third, was stored with wood belonging to the patent office, and in which stood the ash-box before mentioned. On the north side the first room had in it wood, the second was not occupied, the third occupied by the patent office, the fourth had in it coal belonging to the general post office; the windows in the rooms on the east, south side, had wooden shutters hung on the upper side, that fell too of themselves, and might be entered without difficulty by any person who wished to pass in on the first floor. The postmaster occupied the room in the south east corner, and in which the messenger slept at night. The next and large room fronting south on E street, was the letter and newspaper room; the front room on the north side from the east corner was used by Mr. Summers, the watchman as a sleeping room, and had in it also portmanteaus, bags, &c.; the second contained candles, oil, portmanteaus, old letter cases, paper, &c.; in this room fire at no time was kept; the third was used by Mr. Cox, the fourth by colonel Corcoran, assistant postmaster.

In relation to the losses sustained by the government, your committee are unable to offer any opinion satisfactory to themselves, or that might be so to others. Much of that lost none could fix a value on; the models, the drawings, the books, and all else connected with the patent office, are lost—nothing saved. The letters, papers, and mails that remained in the post office, with the furniture, all destroyed, with the fuel belonging to the offices.

The necessity for the erection of a building for the accommodation of the post office department must be obvious to all. The great object of the government should be the safety and preservation of the records. Those can be secure only in buildings strictly fire-proof. It was the practice in the post office building, and perhaps is the same in the other departments, necessarily so, of stowing in the cellars of the buildings their fuel. The danger that the buildings are always liable to of being fired accidentally or otherwise, can be prevented only by the erection of out-buildings for the stowing in of wood and coal; and for that purpose your committee have instructed me to report a bill.

The bill accompanying the report was twice read, and referred to a committee of the whole.

MEMORIAL OF WM. B. LLOYD.

To the editors of the National Intelligencer:

GENTLEMEN: The accompanying memorial was this morning enclosed to the honorable THOMAS MORRIS, and delivered to him in his seat in the United States senate, with a note from myself, desiring him as a friend, and demanding, as one of his constituents, that he should present it to the senate. This he refused to do, and returned me the paper without a reply. From the honorable stand taken by Mr. MORRIS on the night of my seizure, in making an almost unaided effort to rescue a citizen from injustice and oppression, I was led to believe that I might rely on him to procure the means of being heard, and of denying the charges and abuse heaped upon me by Mr. Senator Benton.

I might procure the presentation of the memorial through other members of that body, who are my friends, but as no one of them took part or lot in the matter, I do not think it proper to trouble those gentlemen with it.

A proper sense of self-respect, and a due regard to my own dignity, will not permit me again to ask any favor or right from those members who have shown such an entire disregard to individual justice, and the rights of "that people" whose servants they are.

Nothing then is left me but to lay the matter before the country by the same means which have already made a part of the transaction known to the world—the public papers.

The late hour prohibits my entering further into the matter at present. Respectfully yours, &c.

WM. B. LLOYD.

Washington, Jan. 19.

To the honorable senate of the United States:

The memorial of William B. Lloyd, a citizen of the state of Ohio, respectfully represents: That on Monday, the 16th of January, at a late hour of the night, your memorialist was present, with a large number of citizens, (all of whom to him were entire strangers), in the gallery of the senate.

That, while the clerk of the senate was discharging the office imposed upon him of "expunging" a certain resolution from the journals of your body, a loud, sudden and continued hiss proceeded from the people in various parts of the galleries, apparently at the same instant.

That your memorialist heard an order issued by the presiding officer to clear the galleries, which order your memorialist was ready and willing to obey. But immediately after the issuing of that order, and before it was carried into effect, he heard the doors ordered to be closed. And your memorialist then heard an individual senator, in a tone of command, say, in substance, and as nearly as your memorialist can recollect, in the words that follow:

"Let the hired ruffians of the bank, who are here, as when the bank was in power, armed to the teeth, attempting to overawe the proceedings of this senate, not escape. Let them be seized! Seize the ruffians! There!—there is one who can be easily recognised. Seize him!"

Your memorialist was then arrested by the sergeant-at-arms, and imprisoned in one of the rooms of the capitol until conducted into the presence of the senate, where he was also detained in close custody, until, after being declared by an individual senator to have been "SUFFICIENTLY PUNISHED," your memorialist was ordered by the presiding officer to be discharged.

Your memorialist heard no charge preferred against him, except as implied in the conversation of senators during the time he was in custody, and from the language of the individual senator before referred to. He saw no written process, nor does he know or believe that any warrant or legal authority existed for his arrest.

Nor were any interrogatories addressed to him. And when your memorialist, in a respectful manner, asked the presiding officer "if he might be permitted to speak a word in his own behalf," the privilege of speech and defence was denied him—his voice was attempted to be drowned by cries of "remove him!"—"remove him;" and, by order of the presiding officer, he was thrust ignominiously from the door of the senate.

Your memorialist believes that he was thus deprived of those rights and privileges which are guaranteed to him by the letter and spirit of the constitution—of those rights which the people of England so long struggled to secure—which our forefathers deemed of so high importance that they have individually specified them in our own sacred charter, and one of which was reaffirmed by your body in the eighth sentence of the preamble of the expunging resolutions which were passed a few minutes previous to the arrest of your memorialist, in the following words: "And whereas, the said resolve was not warranted by the constitution, and was irregularly and illegally adopted by the senate in VIOLATION OF THE RIGHTS OF DEFENCE WHICH BELONG TO EVERY INDIVIDUAL CITIZEN," &c.—And, also, of the declaration contained in the tenth sentence of the same preamble.

Your memorialist has heretofore, from his earliest youth, entertained the most exalted feeling of respect for the senate of the United States, as a constituent branch of the government. He has ever regarded its members as the guardians of the sacred liberties of the people, as well as of the dignity of the nation, and he has ever considered it his duty as well as his high privilege, in that capacity, to honor and respect them. That belief and those feelings he wishes ever to be able to maintain.

Your memorialist, therefore, confidently and respectfully asks of the senate that his denial of the truth and propriety of the degrading epithets applied to him on the floor of the senate, and that this his statement and protestation against the course pursued in thus prejudging and punishing him without a hearing, may be read and received by the senate.

Your memorialist denies that he is a "ruffian." And so far from being, as charged and convicted, "hired by the bank," he is not even acquainted with any of its officers, nor does he know that he has seen any one of them within the last ten years. Nor has your memorialist at any time been indebted in any sum of money, or in any amount of service, to that bank, nor has he any amount of interest or concern in that or any bank whatever.

Your memorialist, with all due respect to your constituted body, cannot allow his own private character to be considered of less importance than that of any other man living; nor can he, for a moment, believe that his own conscious rectitude of intention is not equally well founded with that of any member of your honorable body.

As a free-born American citizen, entitled to the full and free enjoyment of all those rights, and to that protection which the constitution and laws of our country promise to the humblest as well as to the highest individual, your memorialist respectfully demands the only redress which can now be extended to him—the reading and reception of this his solemn declaration and protest.

Washington, January 18, 1837.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Previous to the passage of Mr. Wise's resolution, on Tuesday the 17th inst. for an inquiry into the manner in which the various executive departments have conducted their business that gentlemen addressed the house as follows:

Mr. Vanderpool having withdrawn his motion for the previous question, on a pledge from Mr. Wise, that he would renew it—

Mr. Wise then said that the parliamentary practice had been that the gentleman who had offered a resolution and opened a debate, should be indulged in replying to members who had opposed it, and in concluding the debate. He had intended to avail himself of this indulgence, but now the previous question was forced upon the house. Now, it appeared, gentlemen seemed disposed to pass the resolution: to pass it, in order to save the administration party from the imputation of delaying action on the resolution by debate. He would ask, however, and he would thank gentlemen to answer him, whether they could now relieve themselves from this odious imputation—an imputation which they deserve. I tell you and the country (said Mr. W.) that I have been asking for this investigation for nearly two years. And how far are we now from the end of the session? Within six weeks of the end, with all our other duties to attend to, and we are told that this is a sufficient space of time to investigate the huge, the mammoth operations of this corrupt and profligate administration. Six weeks, sir. I have been detained two weeks at home, detained by the state of the weather, and I find, on my return, that the administration has already carried out their own work for me, by which I am detained from ten until nearly midnight in wading through one single branch of this investigation.

Gentlemen now propose to give me this Herculean task. Gentlemen, it is like all your candor, all your plans, and all your honesty. Make the most of it. Go, with a blush on your cheeks, without shame or confusion, before the people, and tell them this!

Mr. Speaker, the whole of a short session is not sufficient to investigate Reuben's concerns alone; the whole of a long session, the whole time for which a congress is elected, would not be time enough to call up all the witnesses from the extreme borders of this immense republic to testify against your government—witnesses that I know can be brought up to testify against you—witnesses who can change inquiries into specifications, and can change your notes of triumph and your strains of eulogy into humble notes of shame and looks of confusion.

Sir, I will say, for one, to the gentleman from N. York, (Mr. Vanderpool), that it is too late to grant the investigation proposed by this resolution. It is now the 17th day of January, and more than one-half of the session is gone, necessarily terminating on the 4th of March. It is too late for any investigation. If any good can be done by it; if any clues can be afforded to the corruptions of the government, they must be afforded by the indulgence of the freedom of debate on this floor. Will you refuse that indulgence? Will you require that all our lips should be hermetically sealed, now that this farce of an investigation has been gotten up? You have given us one committee that has no power to investigate abuses. All questions of corruption or no corruption are limited and bound down to facts that were already notorious. Yet that investigation alone will take all our time.

How can I or my friend from Tennessee (Mr. Peyton) attend to both these committees? We are held up as persecutors; we are no persecutors, but we are placed in this odious light in relation to these charges against the government. If gentlemen intend to hold us responsible for a failure, give us time, means and opportunity, and do not drive us into the space of a moment, and contract us into the compass of a nut-shell. Bind a man hand and foot, and then tell him to arise and walk! Tie him fast with your power, and then tell him to war against a giant! Is this your justice? It is your justice!—Heaven defend me from such justice! Heaven defend the country from such guardians as these! Sir, I have witnessed enough within the last twenty-four hours to make me feel that the country has no guardians.

I now renew the motion made by the gentleman from New York for the previous question. And the house seconded the call—ayes 94, noes 51. Mr. Morgan called for the yeas and nays on the question of taking the main question; which were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 121, nays 52. So the house determined that the main question should now be put. Mr. Huntsman asked for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered. And the main question being on concurring with the committee of the whole on the state of the union, on the original resolution of Mr. Wise, reported therefrom, was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 165, nays 9. So the resolution was adopted.

REMARKS OF MR. HENDRICKS, ON THE EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

[In senate, January 16. The following remarks of Mr. Hendricks upon Mr. Benton's expunging resolution were unavoidably omitted in the last "REGISTER."]

Mr. Hendricks said that, at this late hour of the day, it would be out of place to attempt an argument or a speech to the senate, and such was not his purpose in the few words he had at present to say. It had been his intention, some time ago, to have troubled the senate with his views somewhat at large on this subject; but he would content himself now with saying a very few words; and this was perhaps necessary, owing to the peculiar position he occupied in relation to the proposition before the senate. It would be recollected that he had voted against the resolution of 1834, so much complained of, the resolution which it was now proposed to expunge from the journals of the senate. He did so for many of the reasons contained in the preamble to the resolution now on our tables. In some of the reasons, however, contained in that preamble, he did not concur, and, of course, could not vote for it. For some of the reasons contained in it he could most cheerfully vote. No member of the senate more than himself (said Mr. H.) regretted the passage of that resolution. No one could have been more opposed to it. He viewed it as an apple of discord set in motion, a firebrand thrown into the community, calculated to do more harm than any other measure proposed at that eventful session; and he now believed that it had done more harm in exciting party spirit to its present dangerous height than any other measure which could have been proposed. The danger apprehended to the constitution by this act of expunging (said Mr. H.) is a natural consequence of the measure of 1834; as much so as that one act of violence should succeed another. A party in power to-day, and who shall use that power indiscreetly, will be sure to meet with retaliation as soon as the opposite party shall triumph. Hence, violent measures of this kind are as sure to succeed each other in the mutations of party power as effect is to follow cause.

Much, however, as he was opposed to the resolution of 1834, he could not vote to expunge it from the journals. That was a question, in his opinion, having nothing to do with the merits or demerits of the original proposition. The question before the senate was one of power to expunge the journal, no matter what journal it might be. He thought that no such power existed in the senate, nor any where else; and his oath to support the constitution of the United States was imperative, and prohibited him from giving any such vote, whatever may have been his opinion of the resolution proposed to be expunged. It was, in his view of the constitution, as much a duty to keep and preserve the journals of unconstitutional proceedings, if such there be, as of any other. Our constituents have as much right to know our bad acts as our good ones; because it is for these they will call us to account, and it would be strange doctrine, that we could shield ourselves from responsibility by expunging the journals. The argument, then, of the senator from Pennsylvania, that the resolution of 1834 was unconstitutional, and therefore ought to be expunged, did not in the least relieve his mind. He understood, too, that this was the basis of the votes of other members of the senate in favor of expunging. Much as he disapproved of the resolution of 1834, he believed that it was constitutional, and that it was such a proposition as the senate might entertain and adopt. He saw nothing unconstitutional about it. It might, or it might not, be considered an abstract proposition. It had, indeed, remained as a mere declaratory expression of the senate, but it might have been the basis of legislation. Whether it be true or false, is a matter of opinion. Those who voted for it, unquestionably believed its affirmations to be true. They believed that the president had, in relation to the revenue, exercised authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both. He, who voted against it, believed that the authority and power exercised by the president was not in derogation of the constitution and laws; and however much he dissented on the ground of expediency from that which had been done, he never doubted the constitutional and legal power of the president to do what he did.

It had been said (continued Mr. H.) that the resolution of 1834 contains impeachable matter against the president, and that, on this account, it is not entitled to a place on the journals. He did not think, however, that it contained any impeachable matter. It charged no evil or corrupt intention, which was the essential ingredient of impeachable matter. He referred to the case of Peck's trial before the senate, and stated that the absence of proof of corrupt intention was the basis of his acquittal by the senate. This had been the reason of his own vote of acquittal, and this he had good reason to believe, was the basis of votes of acquittal generally.

In voting against expunging, he did not vote to affirm the truth of the resolution of 1834. He had already stated the reverse. He believed that the president had the power, whatever he might think of its exercise, under the circumstances of that case. But his opinion that the resolution proposed to be expunged was, and is untrue, had nothing to do with his duty in the present case, and could not, in any degree, influence his vote. The senate had no power to expunge the journals. He could, without the least difficulty, vote upon the journals of the present session, a resolution to rescind that of 1834, or to affirm a contrary proposition. This, while it would clearly assert the opinion of the senate in relation to the proceedings of 1834, would not obliterate the journals of that day, and would have all the effect of the mode proposed.

Mr. H. here referred to the constitution, which says that "each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their opinion require secrecy," and said, that the obligations of his oath to support the constitution of the United States made, in his conscience and judgment, his duty on the present occasion clear and imperative. The constitution required the journal to be kept. He could not vote to destroy, or expunge, or obliterate it. But it is contended (said Mr. H.) that the black lines proposed to be drawn around the journal of 1834 will not expunge it in reality; that they will take nothing away from it. It will not, however, be contended that writing the words required to be written across the face of it will not deface, and, to a certain extent, obliterate it. But suppose these black lines and this writing upon the journal of 1834 takes nothing away from that journal, it will surely not be denied that a material addition will be made to it. The constitution requires the journal to be published, but how was this to be published? Could it be published as the journal of 1834? No. That had been published three years ago. There were in that publication no black lines; no writing across the face of the record. If you publish it as the journal of 1834, you falsify the former publication. You cannot publish it as the journal of 1837, because it is the journal of 1834. There, and there only, are the black lines and labellous writing to be found.—No page of the journal of 1837 contains any thing like it. In what shape, or form, or manner, then, will you obey the injunction of the constitution, in publishing the journal of these proceedings? The truth is, (said Mr. H.) the more we look at this thing, the more difficultly we must see in it; the more certainly will it appear to be a proceeding, not contemplated by the constitution, but incompatible with it. It makes a case, which, in the simple publication of the journals, the constitution will not warrant or defend.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

January 18. The chair presented a communication from the war department, with a report of the chief engineer, in relation to the Delaware break-water;

Also, a communication from the treasury department, with a report of the register of the treasury, in relation to imports and exports for the year 1836;

Also, a communication from the post office department, in conformity to a resolution of the senate at the last session, stating the entire emoluments received by each and every postmaster in the United States, &c. All ordered to be printed.

[Petitions were presented by Messrs. Moore, Davis, Linn, Kent, Southard and Strange, all of which were referred. The memorial presented by Mr. Moore was from the legislature of Alabama, praying the extension of pre-emption rights to citizens in the Cherokee country, to citizens of the state generally; and praying also the passage of a law to allow citizens having lost their improvements by means of speculators, to enter other lands in lieu thereof; also asking congress to pass a law in relation to the two per cent. allowed to the state on sales of the public lands.]

By Mr. King, of Georgia—Resolved, That the secretary of state be requested to transmit to the senate copies of all correspondence in his department, not heretofore communicated, (or so much thereof as may be communicated without injury to the public interest), showing the present relations between the United States and Texas.

By Mr. Crittenden—Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to communicate to the senate, in addition to the report or letter of explanation of governor Call concerning military operations in Florida, required by resolution of the 14th instant, the communication calling for that report, and any other communication from or to the said governor on the subject thereof.

By Mr. Ewing, of Ohio—Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to the senate a statement of the amount of moneys received for public lands in each month of the year 1836, so far as he has returns thereof.

Also, resolved, That he inform the senate what amount of money has been expended in each month of the year 1836 in removing gold and silver from the land offices to the deposit banks; (and whether any, and, if any, the amount of losses sustained thereby).

The parenthetical part of the resolution was accepted as an amendment on the suggestion of Mr. Clay.

Several bills were reported, read and ordered to a second reading, which will be noticed in their progress.

Mr. Walker, from the committee on the public lands, to whom was referred the subject of the treasury order of July 1st, 1836, made a report accompanied by a bill; which was read twice, by consent, and made the order of the day for Friday next.

[The bill provides that the United States shall receive the paper of such banks only as from this time issue no notes less than $5, and of none issuing less than $10 after December 30th 1839. It also places certain restrictions on the deposit banks, under the direction of the secretary of the treasury.]

The bill to prohibit the sales of the public lands, except to actual settlers, and in limited quantities, came up for consideration as the special order.

Mr. Walker said, if any gentleman wished now to speak on the subject, he desired that he might have the opportunity of so doing. Otherwise, he moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill till to-morrow.

Mr. Ewing moved to postpone it till Monday next, he not having had time to prepare to proceed with the discussion. Agreed to.

The bill anticipating the payment of the indemnities becoming due under the French and Neapolitan treaties was discussed, the question being on ordering it to a third reading.

Mr. Wright explained the object of the bill. [It advances to the claimants under those treaties the amount of the instalments remaining yet due, viz: a million and a third from France, and a little over a million under the Neapolitan, which remain on an interest of 4 per cent. About one-half the money will return into the treasury in May next, if the French treaty is complied with.]

The bill was warmly opposed by Mr. Clay, both on financial and constitutional grounds. He insisted that the arrangement amounted to nothing but a loan of so much money to those claimants at 4 per cent, when the money was worth 2 per cent. a month. It involved a guaranty on the part of our own government that the money would be paid by foreign governments, and if any failure took place, it was lost to the treasury. He denied the right of congress to enter into any such arrangement.

Mr. Wright replied, and defended the bill. The money would be in the treasury, and he considered it a safe and proper application of it; it would benefit our own citizens, and relieve the money market at points where it most needed relief. The money would otherwise remain in the deposit banks, and would yield to the government but 2 per cent.; whereas, thus applied, it would be bringing 4 per cent. And as to the constitutional question, the money might as well be advanced to these claimants on a larger interest as to the banks on a less.

Mr. Calhoun reminded Mr. Wright of the predictions made at the opening of the session by the secretary of the treasury, of a probable deficit in the amount needed to meet appropriations, so that money deposited with the states would have to be recalled to meet the wants of the government. He deprecated the principle of the bill, that the government had a right to loan the public money to individuals, and apprehended the vast increase of power which this would place in the hands of the general government.

The bill was further debated by Messrs. Benton, Clay, Wright, Calhoun, Buchanan, Davis, and Bayard, when the yeas and nays being taken, stood: Yeas 19, nays 22.

So the bill was rejected.

The senate next took up, on motion of Mr. Wright, a bill to repeal certain provisions in the tariff law, touching articles of a compound character, which require the duty to be paid at the rate of that substance which chiefly enters into their composition. Great confusion and injustice was stated to have arisen from conflicting interpretations of the bill by different collectors.

The bill was not opposed, and having been read twice, was ordered to its third reading.

The bill allowing a drawback of duties on imported hemp was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. [The amendment of the committee on finance, requiring an absolute and unqualified oath, and not according to the best knowledge and belief of the deponent, was negatived, and the bill left in its original form, the usual form in such cases.]

On motion of Mr. Tallmadge, the senate spent some time in executive session, and then adjourned.

January 19. The message of the president and the correspondence with Santa Ana (see page 336) having been read, Mr. Preston, (observing that Mr. Davis, on whose call the correspondence had been transmitted to the senate, was not present) said he would take this opportunity of making a few remarks. It would strike the senate that, since the date of the correspondence which had just been read, the situation of Santa Ana had been greatly changed. He was then a captive, but had since been released, was now at large and in the city of Washington.—Notwithstanding the protest of the Mexican ambassador, it might be that the president would think Santa Ana sufficiently sui juris as to act on the behalf of Mexico, and up to April next, when his presidency would expire, as having the capacity to negotiate in relation to Texas.

Mr. P. did not know whether the president would enter into such negotiation under existing circumstances; nor was it at all material. What disposition the senator from Mississippi (Mr. Walker) proposed to make of the resolution which he had offered on the subject, Mr. P. did not know; it was in his own discretion. But it appeared to Mr. P. that this message and correspondence did not at all change the question involved in that resolution; and concurring, as he did, in the views of the mover of that resolution, he was prepared to assert and maintain, that on all the principles of national law, by the practice of this government, and on all considerations of expediency, congress were called upon to make an absolute recognition of the independence of Texas; and he hoped this would be done independent of any agency which Santa Ana might claim to exercise. Texas, in her own right, had an absolute claim that her independence should be recognised. In saying this, Mr. P. did not think he ran counter at all to any purpose of the executive. He understood that, as the affair was not without embarrassment, the president had referred it to congress, that their best counsel might be obtained in the case. The president, in his first message, had put the recognition of the independence of Texas on the contingency of the invasion of Texas by gen. Bravo. Since that period two important circumstances had taken place: first, the liberation of the president of Mexico; and, secondly, the abandonment of the enterprise, on the contingency of which the president had rested the propriety of the recognition. It was now known that the force which had been sent for the subjugation of Texas was in a state of dissolution, and that Bravo had resigned his command. Mr. P. therefore urged the propriety and justice of immediately recognizing the independence of Texas.

Mr. Walker read a letter, and made a few remarks, going to confirm what Mr. Preston had stated.

Mr. Calhoun said he had never from the beginning indulged the belief that Texas would remain under the domination of Mexico. Under this impression, he thought it our duty to recognise, at the earliest period, the independence of Texas, for the good both of that country and Mexico. If this were not done, and if the contest should continue, Texas would not be confined within the limits of the Del Norte. She would pass it over, and shake the Mexican confederacy, or whatever else it might be called. Mr. C. was willing to vote for the recognition, and the earlier the better.

The message and documents were now laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The chair presented a communication from the navy department, with a statement of the contracts made by the commissioners of the navy in 1836.

A number of petitions and memorials were presented and referred, and several reports ordered to a second reading, &c. when the following bills were read a third time and passed, viz: To allow drawbacks on imported hemp; to repeal certain provisions of the tariff act of 1832; to continue in force the provisions of the act to carry into effect the treaty with Spain.

The bill authorising the relinquishment of the 16th sections granted for the use of schools, and the entry of other lands in lieu thereof; (amended, as proposed by the committee, so as to allow the entry of the substituted lands in quarter sections) was ordered to be engrossed.

The remainder of the session was occupied in considering private bills, a large number of which were ordered to be engrossed; after which the senate adjourned.

January 20. The chair presented a communication from the war department, in reply to a resolution of the senate of the 11th instant, calling for surveys of Owl's Head harbor, &c. stating that the surveys in question had not been made.

Mr. Grundy, from the committee on roads and canals, reported the bill referred to them to authorise certain rail road companies to construct certain rail roads through the public lands in Florida, without amendment; and by consent, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. Tomlinson, from the committee on pensions, reported a bill to continue the office of commissioner of pensions till March, 1840. Read, and ordered to a second reading.

Several house bills on the table were read and ordered to a second reading.

The bills which were yesterday considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to a third reading, were to-day read a third time, and passed.—Among them, the bill to authorise the relinquishment of the 16th sections, for the use of schools, and the entry of other lands in lieu thereof, in quarter sections, and in any part of the respective states, was passed by the following vote; the yeas and nays having been ordered on the call of Mr. Ewing, of Ohio:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King, of Alabama, Linn, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, of Ohio, Kent, Knight, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Strange, Swift.—13.

Mr. Ewing moved to take up the bill designating and limiting the funds receivable by the United States; which motion, after a brief discussion, was decided in the negative.

On motion of Mr. Walker, the previous orders were postponed, and the senate proceeded to the farther consideration of the bill prohibiting the sales of the public lands, except to actual settlers, and in limited quantities. The question being on a motion of Mr. Clay to reconsider Mr. Morris' amendment, requiring that land which had been ten years in the market should be sold at 75 cents; less than ten, and more than five years, at $1; and all other lands at $1 25 per acre.

Mr. Clay said he had two reasons for moving this reconsideration. One was the avowed embarrassment under which it had placed several gentlemen. The other related to himself, being under a mistake as to the import of the amendment.

The motion to reconsider was carried in the affirmative: yeas 19, nays 14. Mr. Morris' amendment being now before the senate, Mr. Clay called for the yeas and nays on the question; which were ordered. Mr. Morris, on the suggestion of Mr. Benton, added to his amendment the proviso, that no person should enter more than a quarter section at a reduced price.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. Morris, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Clayton, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, King, of Ala. Linn, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Tipton, Walker, White—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Dana, Ewing, of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Wright—19.

So the amendment to the amendment or substitute was lost.

Mr. Walker observed that a very important principle had been stricken from the bill, and moved that it be recommitted to the committee on the public lands. Mr. Grundy said he did not see why this should be done. The bill, by the failure of the amendment, was left in the same form as when it came from the committee. Mr. Walker said he foresaw that the bill in its present form would fail; and he thought it of the utmost importance that some such measure should be carried, for the purpose of reducing the public revenue; and he regarded such a measure as the only one which could be adopted to prevent the accumulation of a dangerous surplus. Mr. King, of Alabama, opposed the recommitment. If the graduating principle should not be introduced, he hoped its friends would not reject the bill on that account. He hoped the senate would go on with the bill. Mr. Ewing was in favor of the recommitment. The bill in its present form would not only stop fleas, but camels would go through it. Mr. E. had thought of a project which he believed would effect the objects in view. He would endeavor to prepare it by Monday, and hoped for the opportunity of presenting it. Mr. Moore spoke in favor of recommitting, and expressed the hope that some such measure would be adopted as was proposed by the original bill, (of Mr. Morris).

Mr. Benton asked Mr. Ewing to point out the places in the bill where a camel could go through. He intimated that the design was to delay the bill.—For himself he wished to proceed with the bill, and obtain all he could get. Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, said it would give him much pleasure to point out those places on Monday.

Mr. Walker's motion having been withdrawn or suspended, he moved to alter the amount of land cultivated by a settler, by making it one-tenth, instead of one-eighth of the whole; which motion prevailed. Mr. Clay made some inquiries as to the bearing of the bill on such lands as might be used for grazing and not for cultivation. Mr. Walker replied that a provision in the bill which authorised an entry of the land, after a residence of three years, was designed to supply this apparent deficiency. Mr. Walker moved to amend the bill by requiring one year's residence instead of three. Mr. Grundy objected to this motion. It would serve to defeat one of the great objects of the bill; for if one year only should be required, it would become a business to procure portions of the public land successively by means of one year's residence on each. He was however willing to vote for two years.

Mr. Tipton declared himself opposed to the form of this bill, and in favor of the original one by Mr. Morris. If the graduating principle which had been lost should not be embraced, several states would derive no benefit from the bill. If he could not get that principle he should go to defeat the bill. Messrs. Moore and Sevier also declared their determination to do so. The latter urging, at some length, the passage of a proper bill on this subject.

After some further remarks, by Messrs. Walker, Niles, Black and Morris, the action on the bill was suspended by consent, and several bills from the house were read twice and referred. The senate then adjourned till to-morrow.

January 21. After the reading of the journal, Mr. Morris rose, and said that he begged the indulgence of the senate to make a short statement respecting an article which had appeared in one of the city papers this morning. It might be considered by gentlemen as partaking more of a private than a public nature, and one with which he ought not to trouble the senate; and could he consider the paragraph as intended, or even bearing on its face a mere private individual allusion to himself, he would not thus publicly notice it; but it went further, it was a comment in severe terms, say the least, on his conduct as a senator, and that, too, by a citizen of his own state, and as such it required of him an explanation. The charge is, (said Mr. M.) that he had neglected the just rights of one of his fellow citizens, and refused, as his representative to present his memorial to the senate, and thus had treated him with disrespect. It is due, then, (said Mr. M.) to the citizens of the state, it is due to myself, that this publication should not pass without notice. It will be found in the Intelligencer of this morning in the following words.

[Here Mr. Morris read the communication referred to, which we have inserted in page 845.]

It is true, sir, (said Mr. M.) that, on yesterday morning after the time for the presentation of petitions and memorials had elapsed, and the chair had called for reports of standing committees, one of the young gentlemen who attend the senate came to his seat and handed him a paper, which he found to be a memorial, and which he believed was correctly published in the Intelligencer of this morning, and with the memorial he also received a note, of which the following is a copy:

"DEAR SIR: As a friend I ask you to present the accompanying memorial to the senate. As one of your constituents I demand it. Yours, with the highest respect,
WM. B. LLOYD.

"If you do not present it please return it immediately to me in the sergeant's room.

W. B. L."

Mr. M. said that on reading the note he wrote at the bottom the following words:

"Senate chamber.

"SIR: Your memorial was handed me after the time in which memorials can be received on this day had elapsed. I return it: am willing to see and converse with you on the subject. What your rights are I am not prepared at this moment to determine.
THOS. MORRIS."

He said that after he had endorsed the name on the note, it occurred to him as proper to keep the paper and send back the memorial only. He immediately sought an interview with the person who sent the memorial, with an intention of handing it back himself; and for this purpose he went to both doors of the senate chamber, but was unable to meet with him at either. He returned to his seat; and soon after one of the young men came to him and informed him that the gentleman was in the ante-chamber. He then handed the young man the paper, to return it to the author. He said, had time been afforded him for examination of the memorial, he might or might not have presented it, as justice and propriety should seem to require. He acknowledged that it was not only his duty, but a pleasure, when requested so to do, to present memorials or petitions on all or any subjects within the power or control of the senate, and which were in proper language, not only from the citizens of Ohio, but also from citizens residing in any part of the United States. Whether the memorial in question was or was not of that character, the hasty manner with which he perused it did not enable him to determine, nor did he wish to be understood as expressing any opinion on that point; and while he considered the note of the gentleman as containing some biting sarcasms, of which he did not complain, it also contained a kind of left-handed compliment for the humble part which he took in the transaction to which the memorial referred. What transpired then is well known and need not be repeated. As to the part he took, and the observations he made, they had been correctly, or at least substantially, reported in the National Intelligencer: the impression made on his mind at the time the proceedings respecting the memorialist took place, he probably could not, nor did he wish to make an attempt to describe.

He said he was hastily led to make the remarks he did, because he thought the proceedings of the senate, with regard to the individuals who created the disturbance in the gallery, was wrong; but whether right or wrong, not himself, but after time must determine; for himself, he said he had as yet seen no cause to change his opinions as expressed at the time; and he would further state that, while the proceedings in the senate were going on, after the person was arrested, he was entirely ignorant who he was, or of what state he was a citizen. Near the close, and but a minute or two before the senate adjourned, he was informed by some gentlemen that the person was from Ohio; he inquired his name, and was told it was Lloyd; he then had a recollection of having seen him some days before, and had understood from Mr. Lloyd that his business in the city was to endeavor to obtain the passage of an act of congress, making an appropriation to improve the harbor at Cleveland, by the erection of a sea wall. He said his efforts, be they what they may, were not made in defence of a friend, or in opposition to an enemy; he should have made the same efforts had he known the individual to have been both a personal and political opponent; he merely intended to discharge his duty as a senator, in sustaining what he believed to be the rights of an American citizen.—Sir, said Mr. M. I think I understand this publication; it is intended to go to the state in which I live, and I have troubled the senate with this explanation, that it may immediately follow, and that my conduct, in this particular, may be correctly understood. He said, so far as in him lay, no citizen of Ohio, or of any other state, should have it in his power to misrepresent his course in the senate. He said the peremptory language contained in the gentleman's note he considered as the mere effect of excitement, and, as such, could readily be excused; he said it was but human nature to do and say things in excited moments which we would gladly alter or amend on future reflection; he said he had no idea that the language used was intended as any personal disrespect to himself; when he read the note, he thought it would be better to see and converse with the person as to the propriety of the course to be pursued; but he denied that he had, in this case, been either negligent or unmindful of his duty; at least he had the approval of his own judgment, and should under like circumstances pursue a like course. It was very strange indeed that Mr. Lloyd should complain, when his instruction was to return him the memorial immediately, if it was not presented; and it is still more strange when, in his publication, he says that he might procure the presentation of it through other members of the body who were his friends; and the very reason he assigns for not applying to some one of them is a reason why he ought so to have applied. There is no doubt he can obtain the presentation of his memorial through some member of the senate if he yet desires it, or if he ever did desire it. Should he fail to make a further request, the citizens of our own state will be able to draw correct conclusions.

Mr. Benton said Mr. M. was correct in regard to every thing on which he had offered an explanation. That senator had said it was not his fault that the arrest was made, and that the person arrested was brought to the bar of the senate. Mr. B. now wished to show that it was not his own fault that the memorial was not presented, referred and considered. He had been aware that a consultation was going on, and that some movement was intended, and, without the least reference to the terms of the memorial which he supposed would be presented, he resolved that, so far as he was concerned, it should have its full force. He had therefore drawn up a motion, which he intended to make whenever the memorial should be presented, that the memorial should be sent to the judiciary committee, with power to send for witnesses, and to report to the senate the proper course of proceeding; and that the expenses should be paid from the contingent fund of the senate. This motion he had shown to various senators; and his friends had been kind enough to say that it should be done. If any gentleman would do him the favor to present the memorial, he would vote for its reference. He hoped there would thus be an occasion of giving to the public, in an authentic form, the details of the outrage. He asked for the presentation of the memorial.

Mr. Clay presented the petition of sundry inhabitants of Wirtsborough, Sullivan county, N. York, and as it was not long, he asked that it might be read.

The document was accordingly read, and proved to be a kind of remonstrance, on the subject of Roman Catholic emigrants to the country, brought in under the auspices of popes, cardinals, bishops, &c. It insisted on the impropriety and inexpediency of allowing so many persons to enter the country whose practice and tenets were avowedly and directly hostile to our republican institutions, and especially prayed congress to institute commissions, in various parts of the country, to procure information and report on the subject.

Mr. Clay said some of the objects prayed for, this government had no power to grant, however alarming to these good and religious people the evils complained of, and the progress of the papacy, might be. But there was one object which Mr. C. thought might be a proper subject of inquiry, being within the power of congress; and that was a change in our laws of naturalization. He, therefore, moved that the memorial be referred to the judiciary committee; and it was so referred.

Petitions and memorials were presented by several other gentlemen and referred, after which Mr. Walker, from the committee on public lands, to whom the motion of Mr. Benton for an inquiry into the conduct of the deposit banks, &c. was referred, moved that the above committee be discharged from the further consideration of said motion, and that it be referred to the committee on finance.

Mr. Benton said he thought it a grand joke that three or four days after a bill had been brought in by the committee on the public lands, on the subject with which his motion was connected; after the occasion for which that motion was presented had entirely gone by, the gentleman should now propose to have the examination proposed by the motion, and by another committee. He thought the land committee ought to have acted on the motion, or turned over the whole subject to another committee.

Mr. Walker said that, inasmuch as the committee on the public lands had been arraigned before the senate by the mover of that resolution, ("motion"), he hoped he would be pardoned for giving the reasons for discharging the committee on the public lands. That resolution was not transmitted to the committee till some time after the committee had commenced considering the subject of the treasury order; or, at least, it had not come simultaneously with the treasury order to the committee. It was, moreover, the opinion of the committee, that if they proceeded to act on the matter of the resolution, (Mr. Benton's), there could be no action by congress, this session, on the subject of the treasury order; and it was the desire of every member of the committee that such action should be had.—It would have consumed the time of the committee for months, and it would even have been necessary to carry the required examination into the recess of congress.

Mr. W. said that, although he had assented to the reference of the subject of the treasury order to the committee on the public lands, he had done so with the utmost reluctance.

Mr. Benton said the subject of the treasury order was referred to the land committee late on the evening of the 11th inst. and his resolution was sent to that committee as early as it could be on the morning of the 12th. That resolution had also been laid on the table at the very commencement of the proceedings on the treasury order, so that every one might see it. But if there was not then time to carry that resolution into effect, why, at this late day, was it proposed to refer it to another committee, and to a committee, too, of which Mr. B. was a member? How would this thing tell in the newspapers, that the gentleman who moved to make these inquiries should proceed to make them himself?

Mr. King, of Alabama, said this resolution passed without attracting his attention, or else he would have opposed its passage. If it was intended to impede the action of the committee, it would have done so effectually. And if there was a real intention of obtaining the information called for, it could not be obtained during the session. He could see no practical good to result from its reference now to the finance committee. He therefore called for a division of the question, and that the motion for a simple discharge should first be tried. The gentleman might then make such disposition as he thought proper of his resolution.

Mr. Ewing said the subject of the resolution properly and exclusively belonged to the finance committee. He also had known nothing of the resolution since it was first laid on the table till this morning. He thought it better to divide the question, and leave the resolution in the hands of the mover.

The question was then taken on discharging the committee and carried in the affirmative.

Mr. Benton said he would here state to the whole senate that he desired his resolution to be referred to the committee of which he was a member. It was accordingly referred to the finance committee.

The following bills were read a third time and passed, viz:

The bill to authorize certain rail road companies to construct rail roads through the public lands in Florida;

And the bill to alter the times of holding the circuit court of the United States in the state of Tennessee.

The senate then proceeded to the special order of the day, which was the land bill, as amended by the committee on the public lands.

The question being on so amending the bill as to require a residence by the settler of but one year to get a title to his land, it was negatived—yeas 12, nays 23.

Mr. Grundy then proposed to substitute a residence of two years. The motion was supported by Messrs. Walker, King, of Alabama, Linn and Tipton, and opposed by Mr. Ewing, as being wholly inefficient to the object proposed. Mr. E. stated that he had a different proposition to offer, which, as he supposed, would secure the object of confining the sale of public lands to actual settlers, and which he sent to the table to be printed. The printing was ordered; but the question being, in the meanwhile, taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. Grundy, it was carried—yeas 27, nays 11.

Mr. Benton gave notice of an amendment he should hereafter offer; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Walker, from the land committee, proposed sundry minor amendments, not touching the general principle of the bill. The whole of the various amendments were directed to be embodied, and printed all together, in their order; when the further consideration of the bill was made the order of the day for Monday next.

After a desultory conversation as to the order of bills, the senate resumed the calendar of bills at the point where they had left it yesterday, when a number of bills for the relief of individuals were considered and ordered to their third reading.

The following resolution was offered by Mr. Bayard, and adopted by consent:

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the construction of a mole or pier at or near Cape Henlopen, to facilitate the communication between the Delaware breakwater and the main land, in conformity with the report made on that subject by the secretary of war on the 28th January, 1836.

Adjourned.

January 23. A message was received from the president of the United States, through Andrew Jackson, jr. his private secretary, with the annual report of the directors of the mint at Philadelphia. Referred and ordered to be printed.

[For an abstract of the report, see this day's proceedings of the house, page 351.]

After the presentation of memorials and petitions, a number of bills were reported and ordered to a second reading. [Among the bills was one from the committee on manufactures, reported by Mr. Niles, for the repeal of the duty on coal.] Some business of minor importance was next transacted, after which the bills ordered to a third reading on Saturday, were severally read a third time and passed.

The senate then proceeded to the special order of the day, which was the bill to confine the sale of the public land to actual settlers only.

Mr. Walker, chairman of the committee on the public lands, who has charge of the bill, expressed his approbation of an amendment offered on Saturday by Mr. Ewing, and which provides that land entered, and forfeited, by non-residence under the bill, might be entered by others who shall prove the fact of such non-residence by the first occupant, and proposed to modify it by a provision that, when two or more persons should so claim the forfeited land, who inhabit the same quarter-section, the preference shall be given to the first occupant; and that none of the others should get "floats," (i. e. pre-emption rights to be located on any land not entered elsewhere).

In consequence of some objections to the term "float," as unknown to the law and undefined, he agreed to waive the latter clause entirely, as being, in substance, provided for in other parts of the bill. The residue of his amendment to the amendment proposed by Mr. Ewing was then agreed to.

Mr. W. also proposed several other verbal amendments which were agreed to.

Mr. Tipton then moved an amendment, introducing the principle of graduation, and providing that land remaining unsold for ten years should be sold for one dollar an acre; and if remaining for fifteen years, at seventy-five cents the acre, with a proviso that not more than 160 acres be sold to any one man; on which he asked the yeas and nays; and they were ordered by the senate.

Mr. Ewing, thinking this a fit opportunity to go into the general principles of the bill, and the subject of the public lands generally, addressed the senate in a speech which, with his consent, was interrupted by a motion for adjournment. The motion, having been suspended for some previous motions for the printing of documents, prevailed.

The senate then adjourned.

January 24. After the presentation of memorials and petitions, and the transaction of other business of minor importance, the senate again passed to the consideration of the land bill, when Mr. Ewing resumed and concluded his speech on the general subject.

The question still being on Mr. Tipton's amendment, which proposes to graduate the price of the public land in proportion to the time it has been offered for sale, viz: such as has been offered for ten years, to sell at $1, and such as has been offered for fifteen years, at 75 cents,

Mr. Clay pressed for reasons why, when it was acknowledged that the lands were selling vastly below their value already, it was now proposed to reduce the price still lower? Mr. Dana followed on the general merits of the bill, touching on the occupation of part of his own state by the British.—Mr. Tipton went briefly into an explanation of the grounds of his amendment, and took occasion also to reply to some of the objections which had been urged against the bill. Mr. Clay rejoined, pressing more strenuously his former argument against the reduction of price. The yeas and nays were then taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. Tipton, when it was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Dana, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Hendricks, King, of Alabama, Linn, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Tipton, Walker, White—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Georgia, Knight, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Swift, Tallmadge—19.

Mr. Benton then offered an amendment, which he said he had a little altered from one formerly offered by Mr. Webster, and which allows the land to be sold, under certain circumstances, at 45 cents an acre.

This also was rejected, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Dana, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Hendricks, Kings, of Alabama, Linn, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Tipton, Walker, White—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Georgia, Knight, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Swift, Tallmadge, Wright—20.

Mr. Sevier offered an amendment, which granted the actual settler a pre-emption right, on his showing that he had occupied a quarter section six months immediately previous to a land sale. This was agreed to.

Mr. Morris now observed that the bill, since its first being reported by the committee, had undergone so many modifications, and the pre-emptive feature in it had been so much changed for the worse, that, by way of testing the opinion of the senate whether that principle should be retained, he would move to strike out the entire section (the 4th) on that subject.

The motion was supported by Mr. Clay, and opposed by Messrs. Linn, Sevier and Benton, and with great vehemence by Mr. Walker, who observed that, if the two features of graduations and pre-emption were stricken out of the bill, he should abandon it at once; when

Mr. Morris expressed a wish to address the senate in behalf of his motion, and moved, thereupon, an adjournment, which prevailed.

And the senate adjourned.

(Portions of this debate were interesting, and may be given hereafter.)

January 25. The chair presented a communication from the war department, with statements of all contracts made by that department in the year 1836.

Mr. Grundy, from the committee on the judiciary to whom the president's message and the documents relating to the burning of the treasury building, and the repeal of the law of limitation, were referred, reported a bill to render more effectual the detection and punishment of crimes against the United States in the District of Columbia. Read twice, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

The following resolution, which lies over one day, was offered by Mr. Nicholas:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to the senate any information in his possession, obtained through any agent specially deputed, to investigate the frauds, by floats or otherwise supposed to have been practised in the purchase of public lands in the state of Louisiana.

The senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the relief of the executrix of Richard W. Meade.

The subject of the bill having been debated at great length by Messrs. Clay, Hubbard, Walker, Calhoun, Wright and Buchanan,

Mr. Calhoun moved to lay the bill on the table for further examination. Negatived; yeas 19, nays 22.

After further debate, on motion of Mr. Hubbard, the bill was amended so as to limit the amount to be allowed by the commissioners named by the bill, to the proportion allowed to other claimants, from the $5,000,000, under the treaty with Spain.

Also, the secretary of the treasury was substituted on the commission for the secretary of state, who, Mr. H. stated, had already given a favorable judgment on the claim. Yeas 25.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to extend the port of New Orleans, and the bill to extend the jurisdiction of the United States district court for the district of Arkansas were next severally taken up. The first was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and the last read a third time and passed.

The senate then resumed the consideration of the special order, which was the bill to restrict the sale of the public lands to actual settlers.

The question being on motion of Mr. Morris, to strike from the bill the 4th section, which refers to the subject of pre-emption rights to be conferred on the settlers who shall fulfil certain conditions.

Mr. Morris declined making, at this time, his speech in support of the motion, and suggested to Mr. Walker the expediency of postponing the further consideration of the bill to to-morrow. A brief desultory debate now ensued, in which Messrs. Walker, Ewing, of Ohio, and Robinson participated. Mr. Tipton moved an adjournment, but waived the motion at the request of Mr. Benton; when the senate went into the consideration of executive business—After which, and some explanatory remarks from Mr. Walker on the land question, the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, Jan. 18. After the reception, reading and reference of reports, Mr. Boyd offered a resolution directing the committee on military affairs to inquire into the expediency of causing an examination, by a board of officers, of certain improvements in fire-arms made by Messrs. Cochran, Hall, Colt and Baron Hackett.

Mr. Hawes submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, propositions or papers, relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery, or the abolition of slavery, shall, without being either printed or referred, be laid upon the table, and that no action whatever shall be had thereon.

Mr. H. said he thought it was time that the house should adopt a resolution of this character, with a view to put an end to discussions which had occupied so much of its time on the subject of abolition of slavery. He wished to have no debate; he thought there had already been enough. To test the sense of the house, he called for the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. E. Whittlesey objected to the reception of the resolution. The speaker said the state of Kentucky had been called in its regular order for resolutions, and the motion of the gentleman from Ohio could not therefore be entertained. Mr. Adams objected to the consideration of the resolution at this time. Some desultory conversation ensued on the point of order, in which Messrs. Adams and Mercer participated, when the speaker decided that the question "Shall the resolution be now considered?" should be first entertained. Mr. Phillips called for the yeas and nays on the question of consideration, which were ordered; and were—yeas 115, nays 57. So the house determined that the resolution should be now considered. Mr. Hawes inquired if his motion for the previous question was now in order. The speaker said he supposed that motion stood first in order, but the gentleman could renew it. Mr. Hawes thereupon renewed his call for the previous question. And the house seconded the call—ayes 104, noes 42.

Mr. Evans called for the yeas and nays on the question of taking the main question; which were ordered. Mr. Robertson moved a call of the house; which motion was lost. And the question on taking the main question was then put, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 127, nays 66. So the house determined that the main question should now be taken.

Mr. Grennell said that, notwithstanding the vote just taken, he was desirous of having the yeas and nays on the main question. He therefore asked for them.

And they were ordered by the house. And the main question, being on the adoption of the resolution, was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 129, nays 69.

So the resolution was adopted.

The following message in writing was received from the president of the U. States, by the hands of his private secretary, Andrew Jackson, jr. esq.

To the speaker of the house of representatives:

SIR: I hereby transmit to the house of representatives certain communications from the secretary of the treasury and the attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia.

They relate to the difficulties which have been interposed, under the existing laws, in bringing to conviction and punishment the supposed incendiaries of the treasury buildings in the year 1833.

The peculiar circumstances of this case, so long concealed, and of the flagrant frauds by persons disconnected with the government, which were still longer concealed, and to screen some of which forever was probably a principal inducement to the burning of the buildings, lead me earnestly to recommend a revision of the laws on this subject. I do this with a wish not only to render the punishment hereafter more severe for the wanton destruction of the public property, but to repeal entirely the statute of limitation in all criminal cases except small misdemeanors, and in no event to allow a party to avail himself of its benefits during the period the commission of the crime was kept concealed, or the persons on trial were not suspected of having perpetrated the offence.

It must be manifest to congress that the exposed state of the public records here, without fire-proof buildings, imperatively requires the most ample remedies for their protection, and the greatest vigilance and fidelity in all officers, whether executive or judicial, in bringing to condign punishment the real offenders.

Without these, the public property is in that deplorable situation which depends quite as much on accident and good fortune as the laws for safety.

ANDREW JACKSON.

January 17, 1837.

Letter to the secretary of the treasury.

Washington, December 27, 1836.

SIR: According to the request in your letter of this day, I enclose a copy of the instructions given by the court to the jury, on the act of 1790, on the trial of Richard H. White.

I understand that the only juror who held out for acquitting the prisoner was satisfied of his guilt, but refused to find him guilty on the ground of this instruction as to the limitations. It is certainly highly necessary that the law should be so amended as to prevent the bar of the statute from operating in cases where the proper officers of government did not know, and could not by due diligence have known, by whom the offences were committed. One or two cases similar to the present have occurred heretofore in the circuit court, in which this defence has been sustained. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

F. S. KEY, U. S. att'y D. C.

The message having been read, was, on motion of Mr. Thomas, referred, with the accompanying documents, to the committee on the judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

The following message, in writing, was also received from the president of the United States, by the hands of Andrew Jackson, jr. esq.

To the house of representatives of the United States:

I transmit to congress herewith, the copy of an act of the state of Missouri, passed on the 16th ult. expressing the assent of that state to the several provisions of the act of congress entitled "an act to extend the western boundary of the state of Missouri to the Missouri river," approved June 7, 1836. A copy of the act, duly authenticated, has been deposited in the department of state.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Washington, January 17, 1837.

The message having been read, was, on motion of Mr. Mercer, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

The speaker also laid before the house a communication from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting a report of the register of the treasury on the salaries of clerks in the different offices; which, on motion of Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, was referred to the committee of ways and means, and ordered to be printed.

The bill to authorise the president of the United States to furnish certain ordinance stores to the several states was then taken up, read a third time, and passed.

The bill to change the collection district of Dighton, in the state of Massachusetts, to Fall River, and for other purposes, was read a third time, and passed.

The joint resolution authorising the secretary of the treasury to correct a clerical error in the award of the commissioners under the treaty with France of 1831, was read a third time, and passed.

The joint resolution granting a portion of the public lands to universities and colleges in the several states was taken up, read twice, and, on motion of Mr. French, referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

The bill directing the fabrication of certain gold coins was taken up, and, after a few words from Messrs. A. Mann, Jarvis, Mercer, Parker, Sutherland and Connor, was postponed until to-morrow.

The "bill to establish a more uniform rule of computing the mileage and per diem compensation of members of congress," coming up in its order—

Mr. Vanderpoel said that he would move its postponement until to-morrow, with a view, if possible, of reaching the bill to provide for the admission of Michigan into the union.

Mr. Cambreleng inquired if it would be in order to call for the previous question? The speaker said it would be in order. Mr. Cambreleng called for the previous question.

Mr. Wardwell moved to lay the bill on the table, for the purpose of affording members an opportunity at a future day of proposing amendments. [This motion was entitled to priority.] Mr. Craig asked for the yeas and nays on the last-named motion, which were ordered, and were, yeas 11, nays 192. So the house refused to lay the bill on the table.

The question recurred on the call for the previous question, which was seconded by the house, yeas 78, noes 63. Mr. Hannegan called for the yeas and nays on the question of taking the main question; but they were not ordered.

And the question on taking the main question was decided in the affirmative, yeas 112, noes not counted.

So the house determined that the main question should now be put.

Mr. Heister called for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

The main question was on the engrossment of the bill in the following form:

A bill to establish a more uniform rule of computing the mileage and per diem compensation of members of congress.

Be it enacted, &c. That there shall be appointed, at the commencement of each session of congress, a joint select committee of three members from each house, whose duty it shall be, within the first thirty days of the session, to ascertain, by information from each member or delegate, the exact distance, by the nearest principal mail route by land, from the seat of the federal government to the residence of the said member or delegate; and the said committee shall immediately make a report thereof to their respective houses, upon which report the mileage of each member or delegate shall be computed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That no member or delegate shall receive any per diem compensation for any days during which he may be absent from the seat of the federal government while the house to which he belongs shall be in session, except such absence be by leave or authority of the house, or on business of the house of which he is a member, or occasioned by sickness; and upon the final settlement of his account, it shall be the duty of each member or delegate to certify the number of days he may be thus absent, which account, so certified, shall be published at the commencement of the next session of congress, under the direction of the secretary of the senate and the clerk of the house of representatives.

The question on the engrossment of the bill was taken and carried, yeas 186, nays 16.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and the question being when the bill should be read, Mr. Hawes moved it have its third reading now. Mr. Hannegan said he hoped not. He thought the house had done injury enough for one day; for they had ordered to a third reading one of the most crude and ill-digested bills ever brought before that house; a bill containing more imperfections, and doing more injustice, than any they had ever acted on. He moved the house adjourn; which motion was rejected. And the bill was ordered to a third reading now [but had not been engrossed].

The house took up the bill from the senate, entitled "an act to admit the state of Michigan into the union upon an equal footing with the original states." The question being on its commitment to the committee of the whole on the state of the union,

Mr. Thomas said that much injustice had been done to the inhabitants of Michigan by keeping them out of the union, and by denying them the right to participate in the legislation of the country. After the great delay which had taken place in the action of congress on the subject, he hoped that the house would adopt that mode of action now which would expedite a decision; that was, to keep the bill within the control of a majority of the house. In the house the previous question could be called; in committee of the whole that privilege was taken away. In the present instance the house ought not to be reasonably indulgent in debate; and Mr. T. had no doubt that, so long as gentlemen confined themselves strictly to the merits of the bill, every latitude would be extended to them. But if a disposition should be manifested to diverge from the true question before the house, and to take up time on mere party considerations, the debate ought to be closed and he hoped, in justice to the people of Michigan, would be closed.

Mr. Hardin said he had been a member of the committee to which this subject had been referred at the present and last session of congress, and he had been constrained to differ from the majority of both these committees on this subject. He had never explained the reasons which induced him to differ from them. He did not care whether the bill were referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union or not, provided a fair opportunity was given to gentlemen wishing to express their views. He would inquire who was to be the judge whether a member was confining himself to the subject, or not? He hoped that, if the bill was not committed, the few remarks he had to make on one subject would be heard with patience; and that was, the spirit of mobocracy and the revolutionary movements which had characterized the proceedings in relation to the admission of Michigan, to which he wished to call the attention of the house, and against which he intended to enter his protest.

Mr. Jenifer raised the question whether the bill must not necessarily be committed? And after a few remarks thereon by Mr. Briggs, the speaker expressed his adherence to his decision made the other day, that the bill, inasmuch as it contained no appropriation, need not be committed. Mr. Reed called for the yeas and nays on the question of commitment which were ordered. Mr. Patton urged the propriety of commitment. There was not an instance of a state having been admitted into the union without the bill which provided for its admission having been referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union. And, if the bill were committed, the majority could at any time discharge the committee of the whole from the consideration of it.

Mr. Sutherland said that if this were a new question, which had not been discussed, and the merits of which were not thoroughly understood, it would be well to go into committee; but every member of the house was master of the subject. He thought that commitment was unnecessary, and that the house ought not to delay the admission of Michigan into the union unnecessarily. He believed that action on the bill had been already delayed too long. He reminded the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Patton) that the received notion in the house was, that a majority could not discharge a committee of the whole from the consideration of a bill so long as an amendment was pending.

Mr. Patton inquired if the committee of the whole could not be instructed to report the bill forthwith to the house, without amendment? Mr. Sutherland said that a bill could not be taken out of committee in the midst of a gentleman's speech; and suppose a gentleman had the floor, and chose to speak two or three days. There was no power to interfere with him. Mr. Storer insisted that, under a fair construction of the rule of the house, the bill required commitment.

And the question on the commitment was taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 86, nays 110. So the house determined that the bill should not be committed. Mr. Thomas said that, if it was the sense of the house, he was prepared now to submit his remarks; but if the house preferred an adjournment, he was perfectly willing. With a view to test that question, he moved that the house adjourn; which motion prevailed, and the house adjourned.

Thursday, Jan. 19. Messrs. Owens and Haynes, severally moved the house to suspend the rules to permit them to offer memorials; but the house refused to do so.

Mr. Huntsman, from the committee on private land claims, submitted a resolution that the translator of the French and Spanish languages for this house, who was appointed under a resolution of this house of February 24, 1835, be continued as such until the 1st of February, 1838, which, after a brief debate, was postponed for further consideration, until Monday.

Mr. Mercer, from the committee on roads and canals, reported the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee of the whole house be discharged from the further consideration of the bill further to amend the act incorporating the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company.

Mr. Mercer also reported, from the same committee, the following resolutions; which were read, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the report and bill of the committee on roads and canals on the completion of the Cumberland road east of the river Ohio, along with the additional documents reported in relation thereto, be printed.

Resolved, That the committee of the whole be discharged from the further consideration of bill No. 482.

A number of bills were reported, which will be noticed hereafter, and several committees discharged from the consideration of subjects that had been submitted to them, after which Mr. Underwood offered the following:

Resolved, That the sergeant-at-arms be directed to lay before this house a statement showing the mileage claimed and sums paid therefor to members of this house, and delegates from the territories respectively, during the last and present session of congress; and also a similar statement in relation to senators in congress.

Mr. Boon moved to amend the resolution, by striking out all that portion which related to the senate. Some debate followed in which Messrs. Boon, Underwood, Harden, W. Thompson and Craig, participated. When Mr. Boon moved to lay the whole subject on the table. Mr. Craig called for the yeas and nays on that motion, which were ordered. And pending this question, the house, on motion of Mr. A. Mann, proceeded to the orders of the day.

Mr. Bell again gave notice of his motion for leave to bring in a bill to secure the freedom of elections; and said he yet hoped that, at some time, he might obtain his object.

The house proceeded to the consideration of the bill to provide for the admission of Michigan into the union on an equal footing with the original states. The pending question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. Thomas addressed the house at great length in favor of the bill, contending that Michigan had complied with the conditions which, by the act of last session, were made indispensable pre-requisites to her admission into the union: and that the proceedings of the second convention were the clearly expressed views of the majority of the people of that state.

Mr. Hardin replied at great length, insisting that the movements in the second convention were revolutionary in their character and tendency; that, under the proceedings of that convention, Michigan, could not, constitutionally, be admitted into the union, and that she should not be admitted until a convention, held by state authority, had acceded to the terms which congress had presented.

Mr. Vanderpoel obtained the floor, and moved that the house adjourn; but withdrew the motion, and, on the suggestion of Mr. Thomas, moved that the bill be made the special order of the day for to-morrow. Mr. E. Whittlesey asked for the yeas and nays on that motion. Mr. Mercer moved that the house adjourn; which motion prevailed, and the house adjourned.

Friday, Jan. 20. Mr. Conner, from the committee on the post office and post roads, which was on the 15th of December instructed to inquire into the causes of the recent conflagration of the post office, made a report, accompanied by a bill, which was twice read and referred to a committee of the whole. [For the report see page 344.]

A number of bills were severally twice read and committed; after which the house took up the unfinished business of the morning hour, being the resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Underwood calling for a statement of the mileage claimed by members of the house. The pending question was on the motion, submitted yesterday by Mr. Boon, to lay the whole subject on the table. The yeas and nays, having been heretofore ordered, were taken, and were—yeas 40, nays 126. So the motion to lay on the table was rejected.

The question recurred on the motion, submitted yesterday, to strike out all that portion of the resolution which related to the mileage of members of the senate; which motion was rejected—yeas 58, noes not counted. The question then recurred on the adoption of the resolution. Mr. Adams suggested to the mover of the resolution (Mr. Underwood) the propriety of striking out the word "sergeant-at-arms," and inserting the word "speaker," or "clerk" of the house. He thought that, for a document of this description, the sergeant-at-arms was not the proper person to act, and most especially on that portion of the resolution which required a statement from the senate.

Mr. Underwood acceded to the suggestion, and modified his resolution so as to read "clerk of the house."

The speaker said he had just been informed that the book containing the statement of mileage, &c. after each session, was deposited in the office of the secretary of the treasury. It would be requisite, therefore, that a call should be made on that officer for the same.

Mr. Claiborne, of Mississippi, moved the following amendment:

And be it further resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed, with power to send for persons and papers, to inquire and report to this house what deduction, if any, has been made by members of the house of representatives, at the preceding or present session, from their per diem compensation, when absent in attendance on the supreme court of the United States, or the courts in adjacent states or elsewhere, on their own private business.

To which amendment Mr. Yell offered the following amendment:

"And that said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for reducing the compensation allowed to members of congress to six dollars per diem; and also into the expediency of providing by law for the removal of the seat of government of the United States to some point on the Ohio or Mississippi river, on or before the first day of January, 1840."

The subject was debated by Messrs. Claiborne, Yell and Underwood. The last named gentleman had not concluded, when the hour having elapsed, the chair announced the private orders of the day—when several engrossed bills were read a third time and passed—among them were the following:

A bill further to amend the act incorporating the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company;

A bill to authorize the New Orleans and Carrollton rail road company to construct a rail road from Carrollton to the town of Bayou Sara, in the state of Louisiana.

After spending sometime on other private bills, the house adjourned.

Saturday, Jan. 21. Mr. Casey from the committee on public lands, reported a resolution that the bill to graduate the price of public lands, to make provisions for settlers and to cede the refuse lands to the states in which they lie, be made the order of the day for Wednesday next, which resolution was rejected—yeas 68, nays 93.

The bill to amend an act entitled "an act establishing branches of the mint of the United States," was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday.

Mr. Lincoln, from the committee on public lands, reported the following resolution; which was read, and agreed to by the house:

Resolved, That the committee of the whole house be discharged from the further consideration of the bill to grant the Atchafalaya rail road and banking company a right of way through the public lands.

The bill was then taken up, and, after a brief discussion, amended and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday.

Mr. Bell renewed his notice of motion to bring in a bill to secure the freedom of elections.

The several bills which have recently passed the senate, for the relief of individuals, &c. were twice read, and referred to various committees.

On motion of Mr. Wise,

Ordered, That the select committee on so much of the president's message as relates to the condition of the executive departments have leave to sit during the sessions of the house. The house then adjourned.

Monday, Jan. 23. Petitions and memorials were called for and presented in the order of the states and territories.

[When the reading of the journal had been concluded, the speaker announced the unfinished business to be the memorial presented on Monday last, by Mr. Cushing, from the merchants of Boston, Massachusetts, praying the interference of government in relation to unnecessary quarantine imposed on American vessels by the Danish government at Elsinour.

Mr. Adams raised the question whether the petition presented by him last Monday week, from certain inhabitants of the town of Dover, Massachusetts, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, was not the first business in order.

The speaker decided that, under the resolution or order lately adopted by the house, that petition must be laid on the table.

Mr. Adams appealed from the decision, and the house sustained the decision by a vote of 145 yeas against 32 nays.

The memorial from the merchants of Boston, was then considered, and, after some remarks from Mr. Cushing explaining the oppressive and expensive character of the quarantine regulations complained of, referred to the committee on foreign affairs.]

An unusually large number of petitions and memorials on the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, were presented by different members, and were immediately laid on the table.

The call for petitions having been concluded, Mr. Bell hoped the house would consent that the committees should make their reports. Mr. B. said he would also take the opportunity to renew his motion for leave to bring in a bill to secure the freedom of elections.

Several committees were discharged from the consideration of subjects referred to them.

A message from the president of the United States, transmitting a copy of the annual report of the director of the mint at Philadelphia, showing the operations of that institution during the past year, and also the progress made towards the completion of the branch mints in North Carolina, Georgia and Louisiana.

From one of the statements accompanying the report of the director of the mint, it appears that the coinage at the mint in the year 1836 has been

558,147 half eagles, amounting to	$2,765,735

A message was received from the president of the United States, transmitting to congress the report of the board of inspectors of the penitentiary of Washington, and drawing the attention of congress to the fact presented in the report, that the inspectors have received no compensation for their services for two years, viz: 1829 and 1830, and requests that an appropriation may be made for the same.

On motion of Mr. Vanderpoel, the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Jan. 24. The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Huntsman relating to the translator of the French and Spanish languages coming up as the unfinished business, was considered and rejected.

Several reports, chiefly on the claims of individuals, were twice read and committed.

Mr. Cambreleng, from the committee of ways and means, reported against the petition of the board of trade of the city of New York for the establishment of a national bank; and the report was ordered to lie on the table.

The speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of war ad interim transmitting a statement of all contracts which were made by the department of war during the year 1836, in compliance with the 5th sections of the acts of 1808 and 1809, relative to the establishment and regulation of the war and navy departments.

The speaker presented a communication from the honorable John Y. Mason, of Virginia, announcing his resignation as a member of the 24th congress; which, on motion of Mr. E. Whittlesey, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The several bills which last passed the senate were twice read, and referred to appropriate committees.

Mr. Beale, from the committee on invalid pensions, reported the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee of the whole house be discharged from the consideration of two bills recently reported by the committee on invalid pensions: the one to revive the act of 1828, continuing to those who were wounded in the war of the revolution the right of pension; the other to secure certain arrearages of pension to those who relinquished the same; and that said bills be referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Bell renewed the motion, made by him from day to day, for leave to bring in a bill to secure the freedom of elections.

On motion of Mr. Vanderpoel, the house proceeded to the orders of the day.

A number of bills on the speaker's table were, by general consent, read by their titles, and committed.

The unfinished business was the bill from the senate entitled "an act to admit the state of Michigan into the union on an equal footing with the original states."

The pending question being on ordering the bill to a third reading—

The house was addressed at length by Messrs. Vanderpoel and Toucey in favor of the bill, and by Mr. Storer in opposition to it; when

Mr. A. Mann said that, believing that Michigan was entitled to come into the union under the conditions contained in the bill of the last session, and believing that, at this advanced stage of the present session, there was no general disposition to protract the debate, he moved the previous question. Mr. Jenifer moved a call of the house. Mr. Briggs moved that the house adjourn. Mr. Briggs desired to inquire from the chair whether, if the motion to adjourn prevailed, the motion of the gentleman from New York would not come up first in order when the bill was again taken up? The speaker said it would. And the question being taken, the motion to adjourn prevailed—yeas 83, noes 37.

So the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Jan. 25. After the transaction of some business of no immediate interest, the house resumed the consideration of the bill from the senate for the admission of the state of Michigan into the union; and the discussion of this bill occupied the house until a late hour. In the end, the previous question was resorted to, and the question taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, and decided in the affirmative. The bill was immediately read a third time, and passed. [So that it requires now only the signature of the president to become a law.]

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In the senate. After the usual morning business, several resolutions were offered which will be noticed hereafter. The senate resumed the consideration of the land bill, to which several amendments were made and others proposed, an account of all which will be given in our next. The previous orders were postponed, 33 ayes, to 12 nays, for the purpose of taking up the bill designating and limiting the funds receivable for dues by the United States.

Mr. Rives thereupon offered an amendment to extend the prohibition respecting the notes of banks issuing notes of small denominations, so as to embrace, after the 30th of December, 1841, notes of $20. [The bill only extended to those of five and of ten dollars.]

He supported the amendment in a short speech, urging the moral effect of the measure, and its necessity as the only means of effecting the enlargement of the specie basis of our circulation.

Mr. Ewing referred to a provision in the bill which requires the deposit banks to receive and pass to the credit of government all such bank notes as they receive in general deposits. This took away their power to oppress, and reconciled him to the bill, which should now have his vote. The effect of Mr. Rives's amendment would be to confine the circulation of the large notes in the west to the banks in the immediate vicinity of the deposit banks, while all the small notes circulating there would be those of banks at a distance, to whom it was of less consequence that their notes should be received at the land offices than that their small notes should have a wide circulation.

After some remarks of Mr. Niles, and a brief speech from Mr. Walker, the question was decided by yeas and nays on ordering the bill to its third reading, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Niles, Norvell, Page, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, King, of Alabama, Knight, Morris, Nicholas, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson—18.

So the bill was ordered to its engrossment. The senate then adjourned.

In the house of representatives. After reports had been received, Mr. Bell resumed his remarks on his motion for leave to bring in a bill to secure the freedom of elections.

The house next resumed the consideration of the bill to regulate the mileage and pay of members, but came to no conclusion thereon.

A message was received from the president of the United States, with accompanying documents, in relation to the condition of the relations between the United States and Mexico, and with certain information in relation to the condition of Texas.

Mr. Howard moved that the message and accompanying documents be referred to the committee on foreign affairs, and be printed.

Mr. Boyd moved to amend the motion by adding instructions to the said committee to report a resolution acknowledging the independence of Texas.

Pending this question the house adjourned.

(C) The proceedings of this day, both in the senate and house, will be given more in detail in our next.

DOMESTIC CHRONICLE.

A beautiful Aurora borealis was witnessed in Baltimore and its vicinity on Wednesday evening last, at about seven o'clock. It extended north east to north, and remained until about 8 o'clock when it slowly disappeared. The rays were of a brilliant rose-color, with occasional stripes of white and blue—the whole producing a beautiful effect, which was not a little increased by the snow with which the houses and ground are covered. So much did the Aurora resemble the reflection of a large fire that the engines turned out, under the impression that there was a conflagration in the northern part of the city.

North Carolina. This state has resolved to devote her portion of the surplus revenue to works of public improvement within her borders, and to the promotion of education. She has also granted banking privileges to the Charleston and Cincinnati rail road company. The legislature adjourned on Monday last.

Indiana. William Herod (W.) has been elected to congress from this state to supply the vacancy in the delegation occasioned by the death of Mr. Kinnard—for Mr. Herod (W.) 3,703; for Mr. Wick (V. B.) 3,493. Herod's majority 210.

An ingenious expedient. In his book called Astoria, Irving gives an account of an agent of that colony, who fearing the aggression of the Indians, completely held them at bay, by pretending that he had the small pox bottled up in a small vial, which, the moment they should strike, he would uncork, and destroy them. The Indians had a dreadful fear of the disease, it having been among them, and by which many had been swept off, and they therefore remained quiet.

The commerce of Lake Erie. The Buffalo Commercial Daily Advertiser contains the names of the ships, brigs, schooners, sloops and steamboats, navigating Lake Erie, which is as follows:

Ships 2, brigs 8, schooners 148, sloops 58, steamboats 47—total 263.

The following is the amount of tonnage, &c.: Port of Buffalo 8,541.09 tons, Detroit 6,703.73, Cleveland 4,518.33, Sandusky 1,792.75, Presque Isle 1,562.29, Miami 927.57—total 24,045.26 tons.

The last of the Nobscussets. Died, at the almshouse in Yarmouth, Mass. Mr. Thomas Greenough, aged 90—the last of the tribe of Indians which in that town have been struggling to keep alive the ashes of their nationality, since the first withering influence of the white man was felt upon these shores.

Great fire at St. Johns. The Bangor Whig gives the following account of a most disastrous fire which lately occurred at St. Johns, New Brunswick:

"We learn from Mr. Packard, just from St. Johns, that on Saturday evening last, at 9 o'clock, a very destructive fire broke out in that city, which before it could be arrested, consumed about one hundred and fifty buildings, situated on South Market wharf, on Water and Prince William streets. Every building on the wharf, and nearly all in Water and Prince William streets are included in the loss. An immense quantity of goods were also destroyed, among which were about 1,500 bbls. flour.

State of Missouri. Two important measures have been taken by the legislature of this state, in its present session. A bank on a capital of $5,000,000 has been chartered, one-half the capital to be taken by the state. A rail road has been chartered, leading from St. Louis to the iron mountains, 70 miles distant. By the charter, a college is to be supported by the company at Bellevue ten miles from the Maxwell grant.

The rail road bridge over the Potomac at Harper's Ferry, for the purpose of uniting the Baltimore and Ohio and Winchester roads, is so far completed that locomotives and their trains have passed over it.

The pilots again. The New York pilots are getting worse instead of better. We are hearing complaints almost every hour in the day, from almost every ship owner in the city. The last comes from the owners of the brig New Grenada, from Carthage. The brig anchored in the lower harbor as long ago as Friday last. Signals for a pilot were hung out until the following Monday. No pilots appeared, and the New Grenada came inside the bar, without a pilot, on Monday. The brig was very near being driven ashore in the late storm; she lost one of her cables and an anchor, and was only enabled to maintain her position by means of new and strong cables and anchors. Many vessels were in the same situation at the same time. Longer endurance under such circumstances ceases to be a virtue, and in the name of two hundred dead sacrifices upon our coast, as well as for the multitude of the living whose lives are hourly endangered, we demand immediate reformation. The public demand it, and will have it. [N. Y. Express.

National hospitalities. The following note, as honorable to its authors as to those to whom it was addressed, was published, under the signature of the commander of the French brig of war Gazelle, in the New Orleans papers of December 31:

"In leaving with regret, the banks of the Mississippi, the captain and officers of the brig Gazelle consider it as a duty to address a word, at parting, to the amiable inhabitants of New Orleans. They will treasure up in their best recollection the cordial reception they have experienced; and, filled with the most lively gratitude, they will attempt to acquit themselves of some part of their debt of obligation, by announcing, when they reach their country, the noble sentiments and open-hearted hospitality which they experienced in the capital of Louisiana."

Baltimore and Ohio rail road. Notwithstanding the heavy fall of snow in and near Baltimore on Saturday last, travelling on the rail road between this city and Washington has not been seriously interrupted, the snow and ice upon the rails having been speedily removed by the operations of the engines. The road to Frederick is now also clear of obstructions, and cars arrived from that place on Tuesday night. The superiority of the edge rail, on the branch of the road leading to Washington, over the plate rail, on the main stem, has been demonstrated by the late difficulty—the snow and ice being more readily removed from the former.

A snow storm, accompanied with a severe gale, passed over Hillsborough in Jasper county, Geo. on the 20th December. Trees were torn up by the roots, houses thrown down, and the fragments scattered around for a great distance. No lives were lost, but many persons were wounded.

A fire broke out in Detroit (Michigan) on the morning of the 4th inst. which destroyed property to the amount of 10 to 20,000 dollars, before it could be got under, it commenced in the bake house of H. A. Nagle, confectioner, and extended thence to half a dozen other buildings of more or less value.

New military engine. The Buffalo Journal gives an account of a gun upon a new principle, invented by a Mr. McCarthy of that city. It says:

"We saw the operation with a ball weighing nearly a pound, and judged it would throw, with perfect ease, from three to five hundred balls per minute, without the aid of powder or steam. It can be directed to any object at pleasure, and can be graduated from an ounce to a twelve or thirty pound ball. The whole is perfectly portable, with a portable battery, which will protect those operating it from musketry or grape shot."

Strange and distressing death. A young woman named Arnold, in attempting to pass over Seine's creek, near Connorsville, Indiana, on the ice fell through, and sunk to her arm pits, her arms resting on the ice around her. In this situation she was found frozen to death.

A vessel in the ice. The Ashtabula Sentinel says that a vessel was discovered, a few days ago, in the ice (in Lake Erie) about three miles from the shore, opposite that harbor. Several men went out to her and found her to be the schooner Fair Trader, which sailed from Cleveland for Detroit on the 18th December, and became entangled in the ice near the islands. She had been drifting about ever since, without being able to gain the shore; although she had frequently been in sight of the Canadian and American shores. She had a full cargo of corn, oats, spirits and butter. A crew of three men were on board, who had subsisted on corn, ground in a coffee mill, after their other provisions were consumed.

Saving of fourteen lives. As the Kent steamer was on her passage on Thursday morning, from Boulogne to London, captain Time discovered at some distance a boat, which appeared to him to be in a perilous condition. He immediately bore to, and in a short time released five poor fellows in a state of great exhaustion, who informed him that they had left in company with another boat, in which were the captain, mate and seven other persons, belonging to the barque Isabella, capt. Kurtz, bound from Philadelphia to Rotterdam, and laden with tobacco, and which they had abandoned in a sinking state off the Goodwin Sands, about four hours previously. The captain lost no time in endeavoring to discover them, and happily succeeded, and was the means of saving fourteen poor fellows from a watery grave, which would, in all probability, have been their fate.

Usury. The committee of the senate of New York, to whom that part of the governor's message relating to the usury laws was referred, have adopted Jeremy Bentham's celebrated work on usury as their report.

The Philadelphia chamber of commerce has recommended a repeal of the laws on usury, except so far as they may affect banking institutions and real securities.

The Boston chamber of commerce has also adopted a memorial to the state legislature on the subject of the present operation of the usury laws, and a committee has been appointed by the same body to prepare a memorial to congress in support of the memorial of the New York chamber of commerce now before that body, in relation to a national bank.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 23.—VOL. I.]

BALTIMORE, FEBRUARY 4, 1837.

[VOL. LI.—WHOLE No. 1,323.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

GEN. SCOTT'S DEFENCE. More than one-half of the capacious pages of the present sheet are filled with the first part of general Scott's defence before the military court in session at Frederick, which embraces the causes of his failure in the Florida campaign. It is looked for, we know, with much anxiety by all classes of our readers, and its importance will excuse the space it occupies. The second part, embracing an inquiry into the causes of the delay in opening and prosecuting the Creek campaign, shall have a place in the next "REGISTER."

The defence of general Gaines, when received, shall also be promptly inserted; and thus will be presented the best history of the late disastrous vents that can be laid before our readers.

Gen. Scott arrived in Baltimore on Tuesday last from Frederick.

SANTA ANA arrived at Norfolk on Sunday last, after a very tedious passage from Baltimore, and on the following day sailed in the bark Pioneer, Lieut. comdt. Talnal (one of the exploring squadron), for Vera Cruz. He is accompanied by Col. Almonte.

POWHATTAN ELLIS, esq. late minister to Mexico, arrived at Norfolk on Saturday the 28th ult. from Charleston—and it is said he had an interview with Santa Ana previous to his sailing for Vera Cruz.

The Pensacola Gazette of the 21st ultimo states that Judge Ellis did finally receive his passports from the Mexican government; but not until he had urged himself and friends to secure his safe egress.

THE TARIFF. It will be seen by reference to our congressional abstract, that on Friday the 27th ult. Mr. Wright, from the committee of finance in the senate, followed up the movement of Mr. Cambreleng in the house, and aimed another blow at the protecting system. His "bill of particulars" is less odious than the wholesale proposition reported by the chairman of the committee of ways and means; but if it shall become a law it will prove the entering wedge to the complete overthrow of the protecting system; and thus accomplish, by degrees, that which Mr. Cambreleng would effect in a more summary manner. Admonished by the absurdities of Mr. Cambreleng's report, or unwilling to hazard his reputation by estimates based upon the peculiar condition of the treasury, Mr. Wright did not accompany his bill with a written report. In this Mr. W. acted with his usual discretion; for that man who can estimate the revenue which will accrue in the present fiscal year, with any thing like an approximation to truth, must be possessed of the spirit of divination. As an evidence of this, only look at the last report of the secretary of the treasury and the recent calculations of the chairman of the committee of ways and means in the house of representatives. The first, with all the data furnished by his official station before him, apprehends the necessity of calling upon the states for a portion of the revenue deposited with them, in order to defray the current expenses of the government—the last, by his skill in figures, has discovered that, in a few years, there will be a large balance in the treasury for deposit and distribution!! Thus, opposite conclusions are arrived at; and with such results before the people it is gravely attempted to unhinge all the relations of the country and again involve it in the heart-burnings of sectional strife!

If these propositions for a modification of the compromise act came from the anti-tariff states, and were the result of the "grinding oppressions" of that act upon its citizens, they should be considered with respect—notwithstanding the breach of faith which would characterise the re-agitation of the subject.—And could it be shown that that act operates with peculiar severity upon the south, we are certain that there is not a friend of the protecting system who would resist a judicious modification, when the evil was fairly and distinctly pointed out.—But coming as they do from the tariff states, (for notwithstanding Mr. Cambreleng was claimed as "our man" by the Brumagem pattern and sarsaparilla men, he represents, or rather should represent, the tariff interest), there is a degree of iniquity in the proceeding that excites a mingled feeling of indignation and contempt; as it is impossible to resist the conviction that there is some political object concealed by this affected desire to relieve the people of burdens, which exist only in the imagination of politicians! See Mr. Clay's remarks in the senate on Mr. Wright's bill.

The following resolution has been passed by the house of representatives of Pennsylvania, by a vote of 56 to 22.

Resolved, That our senators in congress be instructed, and our representatives requested to oppose the passage of any bill which may have for its object any change whatever in the present tariff as established by the act of congress passed 2d March, 1833.

THE "REGISTER." We hope we may be excused for giving place to the following highly flattering notices of this work, from two of the most respectable journals in the country. They are, indeed, encouraging and demand our grateful acknowledgments. It will gratify our friends to be informed that the public favor is continued with unwavering constancy, and that we daily add names to our already extensive list of subscribers.

From the National Intelligencer. We have pleasure in expressing our entire concurrence in the tribute of praise contained in the following notice, which we copy from the New York American:

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER. It may seem somewhat like supererogation to say aught at this time of day in praise of a periodical so well known as the Weekly Register; but having at the moment experienced its value, we may as well acknowledge it. The last number happening to be before us, when we were desirous of looking back at two or three public documents, to find which in the file of a daily paper would have required both time and research—we turned to it, and there lighted on them ready to our hand: they were the report of the committee of ways and means of the house of representatives, and Mr. Webster's protest in the senate.

The same number also contains the letter of Santa Ana to the president, Mr. Gallatin's letter to Mr. Maison on the repeal of the restraining law, the preamble, &c. of the expunging resolution, a greater part of the debate in the senate on the admission of Michigan, besides current news, incidents, &c.—The Register is now conducted by a son of the original editor and proprietor, with undiminished care and intelligence; its form is changed from 8vo. to 4to. and of course its capacity for matter is enlarged in proportion.

R. M. WHITNEY AND THE INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE. We have strange rumors about the doings before the committee appointed to investigate Mr. Whitney's connection with the deposit banks, &c. The letter of the correspondent of the Baltimore Patriot and the statement of Mr. Whitney, published in a subsequent page, indicate that the rumors are not without foundation. (see page 354).

The Intelligencer of Wednesday says—The investigating committees, under the two resolutions of the house of representatives, (Mr. Garland's and Mr. Wise's), are pursuing their inquiries and examinations of witnesses. A number of witnesses have been examined, and others have been summoned and are daily arriving here. Amongst those, we hear, who have arrived in this city, in obedience to the summons of the committee, is William J. Duane, esq. late secretary of the treasury.

FROM CHILI AND PERU. Letters from Buenos Ayres to November 4, received in Boston, via Havana, state that information reached there from Chili that hostilities had actually commenced between PERU and CHILI, and had been officially communicated by the British ministers to the merchants at Buenos Ayres.

A letter from Payta stated that the Chilean brig of war Achilles had been in the harbor of Callao, and captured three or four Peruvian vessels.

TEXAS. We have no news of interest from Texas—the condition of the country was improving, but the Indians still commit depredations.—Gen. Stephen F. Austin, one of the first settlers of the country, and most active in its struggle for independence, died at Colombia on the 27th of December, and was buried with the highest honors.

The acting secretary of war, S. FISHER, has published an official order, declaring all persons impostors who appear in this country with the uniform and military badge of the Texian army and navy. The order, he says, has been rendered necessary by the fact that many persons in this country, without authority, have been parading themselves in the garb of officers of the Texian army and navy.

Mr. CLAY, in a letter to the general assembly of Kentucky, has accepted the office of U. States senator for another term, from the 4th of March next. His letter shall have a place in our next.

LOUIS McLANE, esq. has accepted the appointment of president of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad company, and will speedily enter upon the duties of his office.

FLORIDA. The latest news from general Jesup is contained in the following slip from the office of the St. Augustine Herald, dated St. Augustine, Jan. 20, 1837.

A letter from an officer of the army, dated Camp Dade, 10th Jan. 1837, states: "To-day general Jesup arrived from Tampa Bay. A scouting party captured 15 negroes near Wahoo Swamp, who state that POWELL was then in the swamp, with a few of the Micassuky Indians, the rest having left him.—That, in the several actions of gov. CALL, a great number of Indians were killed. That in the affair when the whites destroyed a boat in the Wythlacoochee, 17th Jan. 10 hostiles were killed, and 20 wounded. That JUMPER, MICANOPY, and ABRAM were at A-ha-pop-ka, and were willing to make terms, if they will be treated well. That the Indians have but a small quantity of ammunition left." The letter goes on to state: "to-morrow we shall march against Powell or against Philip, at Top-kali-ka, or both, and that circumstances indicate an early termination of the war."

"An express arrived last night to col. CRANE, from which we learn that gen. JESUP had ordered home the Georgia and Alabama militia. There was a regular force sufficient in the field.

"It is reported that the mail rider between this and Tallahassee has been killed by the Indians.

"Col. CRANE has been ordered to Gary's Ferry, where he will have his head quarters."

THE EXPUNGING PEN. A little anecdote is related at Washington, which is worth recording.—The night the expunging resolution was carried into effect in the senate, Mr. BENTON, the persevering mover of that measure, sent to the president the pen used by the clerk of the senate, in drawing around and across the black lines, and writing the words "Expunged by order of the senate." It was a new pen that had never been used for any other purpose. The president received it with much pleasure, and informed Mr. B. that he should preserve it while he lived, and at his death bequeath it to Mr. Benton as a mark of his regard. [Bost. Adv.

FLOOR OF THE SENATE. By the 47th rule of the United States' senate, certain privileged persons are only admitted on the floor of that body whilst in session. By a late resolution, proposed by the hon. Mr. Rives and adopted, the privilege referred to has been extended to the following army and navy officers, who have received medals for their gallant conduct and services during the late war with Great Britain. Here follows a list of the officers thus highly complimented, with the grade they held when the medals were granted by congress: [U. S. Telegraph.]

Army—Gen. Andrew Jackson, gen. Edmund P. Gaines, gen. William Henry Harrison, gen. Alexander Macomb, gen. Winfield Scott, gen. Miller, gen. Ripley, col. George Croghan, col. Richard M. Johnson, ensign E. Shipp.

Navy—Captains—Isaac Hull, David Porter, Jacob Jones, Sames Biddle, Charles Stewart, Daniel T. Patterson, Lewis Warrington, Chas. G. Ridgely.

Lieutenants—Charles Morris, Alex. S. Wadsworth, George C. Read, Jesse D. Elliott, Charles W. Morgan, John B. Nicholson, Daniel Turner, Edward R. McCall, David Conner, Jno. T. Newton, Isaac Mayo, Stephen Cassin, Joseph Smith, Philip F. Voorhes, Henry E. Ballard, William B. Shubrick, William M. Hunter, E. A. F. Vallette, John Gallagher, Thomas H. Stevens, Alexander Claxton.

Purser—Samuel Hambleton, William P. Zant-zinger, Thomas I. Chew.

Surgeons—Thomas Harris, Bailey Washington, Robert R. Barton, Charles B. Hamilton, John A. Kearney.

Chaplain—Thomas Breeze.

Marine Corps—Capt. Archibald Henderson.—Lieutenants: William H. Freeman and John Contee.

R. M. WHITNEY AND THE INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

In order that our readers may fully understand Mr. Whitney's letter, inserted below, it is necessary to publish the following letter from the Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Patriot.

Correspondence of the Baltimore Patriot.

Washington, Jan. 26, 1837.

In my letter of last night I informed you that Reuben M. Whitney appeared before the committee of investigation yesterday, and produced a protest against the whole proceedings of the house in instituting this inquiry, and of the committee in their action under Mr. Garland's resolution. This precious document is of a most formidable length, and assumes the highest ground as to the rights of this treasury familiar and the banks which employ him, while it denounces in unmeasured terms the inquisitorial conduct of the house of representatives and of the committee. The contemptuous language in which Whitney spoke of the intelligence of congress, in his circular letter recently published, has not passed out of the recollection of the public.—This protest, I understand, is in a still loftier strain of arrogance. He is quite indignant at the passage of the resolution through the house—although, be it remembered, his own political friends voted for it—and kicks at the course of the committee, upon whom also, as you are aware, there is a majority of his yoke fellows in subjection to the dominant power, though not, let us hope, in iniquity. He regards the officers of the deposit banks and himself as private individuals with whom congress had nothing to do; and after a long rigmarole about his constitutional and inalienable privileges, he winds up with professing a willingness to answer all questions touching matters of a public character, of which he has knowledge.

The committee thought proper to take him on his own ground, and making themselves judges of what questions did refer to public matters, they proceeded with the examination, which was conducted by Mr. Peyton. Whitney however refused to answer any of the questions which Mr. P. propounded to him in succession. In making his replies, his manner was far from respectful to the committee or the gentleman who framed the questions. He would look at them (for, you will bear in mind, the whole examination is conducted in writing) then throw them aside, with a remark that they were inquisitorial, or concerned him as an individual—and he declined to answer. One of Mr. Peyton's questions was so framed as to require a direct statement, whether judge Taney did not refuse to countenance Whitney or recommend him for the situation he now holds? This the witness declined to answer, more particularly, he said, as the mover of the inquiry had declared the charge was true, and he (Whitney) thought he ought to prove it.

This you will remember was the subject of the card Whitney lately published in the Globe, in which he pronounced the assertion of Mr. Peyton a falsehood and calumny. As Mr. Peyton, whose fearlessness and magnanimity are known to the whole country, and therefore require no vindication, did not condescend to notice this card, Whitney doubtless felt himself safe in exhibiting before the committee his poor-spirited spite, to a man so much elevated above his miserable sphere. But Mr. Peyton did not allow this climax to the insolent character of his general bearing to pass unnoticed. He rose, and began an appeal to Mr. Garland, the chairman, on the insulting reply of the witness—but very soon broke off—and stepping up to Whitney, he addressed him thus, "You thief and robber! if you dare to insult me here, before the committee, I'll put you to death!" Whitney was frightened out of his senses—but made no reply—"You said in your card that I shield myself behind my constitutional privileges, now sir, I wish to waive all privileges—"

Mr. Garland, the chairman, here interposed to preserve order; and Mr. P. resumed his seat. Whitney then rose, and was proceeding to speak, when Mr. Peyton interrupted him, commanded him to be silent, and declared he should not answer but in writing. Mr. Wise here remarked to his friend, that Whitney was unworthy of his notice. He attempted to draw Mr. Peyton off from him, but Mr. Peyton said, "No—I pay no regard to his cards, but when he insults me here in the committee, I will notice him robber and thief as he is." Mr. Peyton then turned to the chairman and reminded him that he had treated Whitney respectfully. Hitherto "I have treated him, said he, as if he were a gentleman, and I will not permit him to insult me."

Mr. Whitney was then ordered to withdraw, and Mr. Hamer offered a resolution that the last answer of the witness should be returned to him, as it was no reply to the question, and was disrespectful to a member of the committee. This resolution was adopted unanimously, so decided and strong was the conviction of every member that the demeanor and language of this "great man" were improper and insulting.

On Mr. Whitney's return, this resolution was read to him, and his answer given back to him. He then apologized and expressed his regret for any disrespect he had manifested to the committee.

To-day he has been much more pacific; and some important facts have been disclosed in his testimony. He admitted that he was the author of the letter (recently published) and signed by the six cashiers of the deposit banks recommending the establishment of a bank bureau in the treasury department, and recommending himself! R. M. Whitney! as a proper person to be placed at the head of it! This letter was written while Kendall was acting as the agent of the treasury department, and I believe while he was in Philadelphia on a journey of discovery to see on what terms the banks would receive the deposits should they be removed from the bank of the United States. Mr. Peyton and Mr. Wise put question after question to the witness, to ascertain whether Kendall had any thing to do with getting up this letter—but he would not answer a word to any query that touched Mr. Amos Kendall. Mark that!

Whitney admitted that he applied to Mr. Duane for the appointment he now holds.

He admitted that he wrote the circular to receivers recently published; and declares he was authorised by the secretary of the treasury to use the threatening language he did employ.

There were some other developments, of which I will inform you to-morrow.—The committee is in session night and day. D.

TO THE PUBLIC.

Finding that misrepresentations have been spread abroad respecting a scene which occurred on Wednesday night last at the capitol, in the room of the select committee of which the honorable Mr. Garland is chairman, I deem it a duty alike due to myself and the public, to lay before it a correct statement of the occurrence.

On that day, after my protest had been read by the committee, received and ordered to be placed on the journal, Mr. Peyton commenced propounding interrogatories to me; some of which I answered, and some I declined answering.

The following was the fifteenth interrogatory propounded by him: "Did you receive any letter of recommendation from R. B. Taney, or did he in any manner, countenance or encourage you in applying for the agency contemplated: or did he positively refuse to receive or countenance you in that capacity while he was at the head of the treasury department?"

To the interrogatory I gave the following answer: "I decline answering this interrogatory, more particularly as the individual propounding it has asserted positively and publicly that the substance of the latter part of it is true, beginning with, 'or did, &c.' therefore, being the party accused, I am not a proper witness. I think in justice, that the individual who has made the allegations should be called to produce his proof."

This was handed to the chairman, who read it to the committee; upon which Mr. Peyton, in a most violent and passionate manner, sprang from his seat, and exclaimed "the damned infernal scoundrel should not insult him there: that constitution or no constitution, he (as I understood him to say), would have the life of the damned villain," at the same time advancing and thrusting his hand into his bosom, under his waistcoat, as I supposed, for the purpose of drawing forth some concealed weapon. Expecting an assault, I put myself in a posture of defence. Before he had got forward to me, and before he had drawn his hand from his bosom, Mr. Wise sprang before him, and pushed him back, saying, "Don't, Peyton: the damned scoundrel is not worth minding." I immediately took my seat, when both Mr. Wise and Mr. Peyton commenced the most violent abuse of me, the latter calling me "a damned plunderer," and "a damned dog;" when I rose and said, "Mr. Chairman, I claim the protection of the committee while I am before it."—When Mr. Peyton addressed himself to me, said: "You shan't speak, God damn you; hold your tongue;" and when I had seated myself, still keeping my eye upon him, he said, "God damn you, take your eyes off of me; you shan't look at me;" and after this he rose, and with Mr. Wise advanced towards me, the latter with his hand in his pocket, and stood before me for a minute or more, as if supposing they could intimidate me by their united frowns. Soon after this, and when quiet had prevailed, I was requested by the chairman to retire, which I did. Some time after, when I was requested to return to the room, I was informed by the chairman that the committee had resolved, that the answer which I had given to the interrogatory should be returned, as containing something disrespectful to a member of the committee; and that the interrogatory which he held in his hand should be propounded; when I said in substance, (I may not use the precise words), "That, if I had done any thing which a majority of the committee considered improper, I certainly regretted it." The interrogatory which the chairman alluded to was then propounded, which was as follows: "Did you or not apply to the secretary of the treasury to be appointed, either before or after the removal of the deposits, agent of the department, or of the deposit banks, selected or to be selected?"

The foregoing is nearly, if not an exact account, of what transpired.

When it is recollected that on the 5th instant, in a card, published in the Globe, I challenged Mr. Peyton to adduce a single particle of proof to sustain the assertion I found it reported he made, as well as declare it false, that "in consequence of the character of the agent alluded to, Mr. Taney, the former secretary of the treasury, would not recommend him as an agent of the deposit banks," I will leave it to the public to decide, who was the aggressor on the evening alluded to, Mr. Peyton, for propounding the interrogatory he did, or myself, for giving the answer which I did to it.

It is for the house of representatives to decide, whether it shall be tolerated, that an individual called before them as a witness, or before a committee appointed by that honorable body, and acting under its authority, shall be subject to treatment similar to that I have experienced, and of which I complain, without having it redressed.

To a discerning and enlightened public I trust the decision, whether the course which I pursued during the unpleasant affair which I have detailed, was the respectful and proper one, or whether a more proper one would have been such as might have led to a scene of greater confusion, and to still more unpleasant, and, possibly, to calamitous consequences. Respectfully, the public's humble servant,
R. M. WHITNEY.

INDIANS OF THE NORTH WEST.

We have been furnished for publication with copies of the following letters, relative to the recent outrage committed by the Sioux upon a portion of the Fox Indians. Gov. Dodge is well acquainted with the Indian character and habits, and his opinions and views are entitled to the greatest consideration. Were any additional arguments necessary to show the propriety of the removal of all the Indians to the same section of country, where the duty of the government to keep peace among them could be performed, they may be found in the facts stated, and observations made, in these communications. Nor are these less weighty to show the necessity of such an increase of our regular force as will put the government in possession of the means for executing this duty effectually. [Globe.]

SUPERINTENDENCY OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
For the territory of Wisconsin, Belmont, Dec. 28, 1836.

SIR: From a letter received from general Street, United States Indian agent, a copy of which has been communicated to your department, under date of yesterday, as well as a letter from Mr. Rolette, a member of the American Fur company, resident at Prairie du Chien, it appears (from the tenor of general Street's letter, alluded to), that a party of hostile Sioux Indians had made an attack on the Fox Indians, and killed a number of them in the Sac and Fox country, and (from Mr. Rolette's letter), that the latter Indians had made an attack on a camp of Winnebagoes, killing some children, and sparing a woman, scalping her, and leaving her to all appearance dead; that the war party of the Foxes were in pursuit of the Menominee Indians, with whom they are at war; and some danger was apprehended that the Fox Indians would cross the Mississippi on the ice, and attack a band of Sioux Indians some distance above Prairie du Chien. I have written to the several agencies to whom these Indians belong, and am desirous to receive instructions from your department as to the course to be pursued by me, as superintendent of Indian affairs, in cases such as I have mentioned.

From the great extent of this frontier, and the numerous Indians located on our borders, it is important for the safety of the frontier people, who are settled over a great extent of country, that protection should be afforded them by the government; which can only be done by having a mounted force stationed at a suitable point on the Mississippi, above Prairie du Chien, where supplies and forage could be furnished by steamboats for the use of the mounted troops. It is well known that the Indians are never in dread of the pursuit of infantry. The difficulty with the Sac and Fox Indians, in 1832, originated from an attack made by them on a party of defenceless Menominee Indians who were camped almost under the cover of the guns of Fort Crawford, and the refusal on the part of the Sac and Fox Indians to deliver up the murderers of the Menominees. Three companies of dragoons, under the command of a field officer, would be sufficient to range the country from the Mississippi to the Red Cedar, and the Iowa and Des Moines rivers, which would be a direct check on the war parties of Sioux and Sac and Fox Indians. This mounted force would be enabled to carry into effect the views of the government, by making a demand and surrender of the aggressors or murderers. The mounted troops ranging the country on our borders, west of the Mississippi and north of the Wisconsin river, would cover the weak and unprotected settlements bordering on those rivers. The policy of the government appears to be to purchase of the Winnebago Indians their country east of the Mississippi, and remove them south of the Missouri river, or immediately west of the Mississippi to the country purchased of the United States in 1832. The repeated attacks made by the Sac and Fox Indians on the Winnebagoes, when hunting in the country west of the Mississippi, presents an obstacle in treating with them for the country north of the Wisconsin, and east of the Mississippi. Indeed it was one of the reasons urged by the Winnebagoes, at the treaty held at Fort Winnebago in October last, that their people had been killed by the Sacs and Fox Indians when hunting west of the Mississippi and they were afraid to remove west. This difficulty might be removed by the location of mounted troops on the Upper Mississippi; and as the established policy of the government is to preserve peace between the different nations of Indians under their protection, much good would result from mounted troops being stationed at a convenient point on our frontiers, to keep peace between the Sioux and Chippewa Indians, and prevent the intrusions of the whites on the Indian country. Our difficulties with the Seminole Indians have assumed a serious aspect; and if five or six hundred Indians in the swamps of Florida are able to produce so great a loss of blood and treasure, it would seem that every precaution should be used to prevent a rupture or difficulty with the numerous tribes on the borders of the Wisconsin territory. The Indians must see and feel, if necessary, the power of the government to enforce a strict observance of treaties between themselves, as well as the dread of coming in contact with the government of the United States.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,
H. DODGE,
Superintendent of Indian affairs.
To C. A. Harris, esq. commissioner Indian affairs.

Rock Island, Dec. 2, 1836.

SIR: A young Fox Indian came in from Powsheek's village on the Red Cedar two days past, and informs me that a large war party of Sioux, on the 19th ult. surprised five lodges of Foxes on the lower Iowa, fifteen or twenty miles from where the line of the Black Hawk purchase crosses it, at the mouth of a creek on the left bank of the Iowa, and it is believed killed about twenty Foxes. A young Fox, who was wounded in the neck with a ball, made his escape, and brought the news to Powsheek's village, from whence the runner brought intelligence to me. The wounded man says he counted twelve Foxes lying dead before he came off, and the fighting was going on. The Fox women and children had retreated to an old fort a little way off, where the surviving Foxes may possibly save themselves.

The messenger informed the interpreter, after leaving me, on his way home, that numbers had gone through their country to collect the chiefs, head men and braves of the confederated tribes of Sacs and Foxes to council on the subject. Being asked by the interpreter what the principal men at Powsheek's village spoke about it, he replied, they said they would take revenge. That eight were killed last winter, and nothing done; they would not sit still and be killed any longer; they would die in the field of battle, or be revenged on the Sioux.

I sent word to the chiefs to come and see me; but I do not expect to be able longer to restrain them, under all the circumstances, and that they will go to war with the Sioux. I apprehend the remnant of Wabashaw's band on the east of the Mississippi will be in extreme danger, as the Foxes know where they have located, and will cross on the ice. It would be well to have them apprised of their danger, as they have been improperly assigned to me, and my location here precludes the possibility of my giving them any assistance.

Your letter of the 26th ult. is received.
With high consideration and respect, I am your most obedient servant,
JOS. M. STREET,
U. S. Indian agent.
His excellency Henry Dodge, gov. Wisconsin territory, and superintendent Indian affairs.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

January 27. Mr. Clay presented the petition of the Washington Colonization society praying an act of incorporation, which he moved to refer to the committee on the District of Columbia—whereupon a very interesting debate arose between Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Walker, &c. which we are compelled to omit until our next. Finally, the motion to refer was laid upon the table—ayes 24, noes 12.

Mr. Wright, from the committee on finance, to which was referred so much of the president's message as related to a reduction of the revenue of the country, reported the following bill for that purpose, which he accompanied with various explanatory remarks, and with a paper containing a summary statement of the various articles on which a reduction was proposed to be made, together with the amounts of existing duties on said articles and the amounts of reductions.

A bill to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties upon imports.

Be it enacted &c. That, from and after the 30th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1837, in addition to the articles exempted from the payment of duty by the various revenue laws of the United States now existing and in force, the articles hereinafter named in this section of this act imported into any collection district of the United States, shall be admitted free of duty, viz:

Floor matting, usually made of flags, or other materials; square wire, used for the manufacture of stretchers for umbrellas, and cut in pieces not exceeding the length used for stretchers; aquafortis, Brazil pebble, prepared for spectacles; crystals for watches, diamonds for glaziers, dressed furs, embroidery, all articles composed wholly or chiefly of gold, jewelry, gold and silver laces, muriatic acids, bicromate of potash, cromate of potash, prussiate of potash, chronometers, tartaric acids, barley, straw or grass baskets, composition, wax or amber beads, all other beads not otherwise enumerated in the existing laws, Prussian blue, bolting cloths, shell or paper boxes, bricks, hair or palm-leaf brooms, button moulds, calomel, carbonate of soda, cashmere of Thibet, corrosive sublimate, down of all kinds, feathers for beds, gold leaf, hair bracelets, hair not made up for head dresses, lampblack, linen padding, (if not suitable for cotton bagging), sulphate of magnesia, mustard, salad oil, almond paste, perfumes, pickles, perfumed hair-powder, tooth powder, sulphate of quinine, Rochelle salts, fossil and crude mineral salt, fancy or perfumed shaving and other soaps, including Windsor, and washballs, emetic tartar, building tiles, paving tiles, washes, otto of roses, oil of lemon, oil of bergamot, essential oil of rose, oil of carraway, oil of lavender, oil of rosemary, cosmetics, anti-corrosive lithic paints, linen tape, sextants, quadrants, telescopes, and glasses for sextants, quadrants and telescopes, gold, silver and precious stones, hair cloth and hair seating, indigo, cotton and thread laces, manufactured and prepared quills, common tinned and japanned saddlery, China and porcelain wares, earthen and stone wares, watches of all kinds, and parts of watches, silver and plated ware, worsted yarn, blankets, the value not exceeding seventy-five cents each, vinegar, olive oil, teas of all kinds, chocolate, Cayenne pepper, cigars, bristles, corks, copper rods and bolts, copper nails and spikes, books, printed prior to 1775, books in other languages than Greek, Latin and English, glass bottles, demijohns, common salt, anchovies and sardines, ground and polished looking-glass plates, silvered and unsilvered.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the thirtieth day of June, in the year 1837, the duties now by law chargeable upon all wines and all spirits made of vinous materials imported into the United States, shall be reduced one-half, and from and after that day no more than one-half the rates of duty now chargeable upon any wines and spirits made of vinous materials of any country shall be assessed or collected.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That when it shall be satisfactorily proved to the secretary of the treasury that any iron, imported for the construction of the hulls of iron steamboats, has been actually applied to the construction of the hull of any such iron steamboat, and that the boat to which any such iron has been applied is completed and fitted for use in navigation, he may allow a drawback of the duty on such iron so actually and permanently applied, or, if the duty shall have been paid, he may refund the same, any thing in any act to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That no iron shall be considered as imported for the construction of the hulls of iron steamboats but such as is fitted and prepared for that use without further manufacture, and that nothing in this act shall be so construed as to exempt from duty the engines, boilers, and other steam apparatus to be used in any such iron steamboat.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That whenever the bonds given for the duties upon the importation of any such iron shall become due and payable before the said iron can be actually and permanently applied to the construction of any such iron steamboat, in the manner required by the last preceding section, the secretary of the treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorised to extend the time for the payment of so much of any such bonds as shall be equal to the drawback to which the obligor or obligors may be entitled: Provided, That no extension of time for the payment of any portion of any such bond shall exceed the period of two years from the date of the importation of the iron upon which the right of drawback is claimed in pursuance of this act.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all articles made free from duty by the provisions of the first section of this act, and all wines and spirits made from vinous materials the duties upon which are reduced by the provisions of the second section of this act, from and after the thirtieth day of June next, which shall be imported into the U. States before the said last mentioned day, and shall be put into the custom house stores, under the bond of the importer or owner, and shall remain under the control of the proper officer of the customs until the said thirtieth day of June next, shall be free, or subject to no higher rate of duty than is imposed by this act: Provided, That no such articles or property shall be deposited in the custom house stores except in the original packages, bales, boxes, bags, casks, cases or bottles, as imported.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby repealed.

Mr. Wright having concluded his introductory remarks explanatory of the objects of the bill,

Mr. Clay said that he wanted, at this early stage of the bill, to say only a word or two. I will begin, said he, with expressing the regret I feel that no written report accompanies this bill, and that the substitute with which we have been presented in the verbal remarks of the senator from New York are not as satisfactory as I think they might have been. In considering the amount of revenue which the wants of any government may require, two questions should be taken into view.—1st. The probable amount of the revenue to be received from the taxes; and, in the second place, the probable amount of the public expenditure. If congress have no knowledge of these, how can they know what revenue is to be raised, or what reduction may be provided for? In both of these points, the senator from New York has utterly failed to furnish the senate with any information.

By way of getting rid of presenting to us the probable amount of revenue, the senator states that the finance committee are not able to offer any thing but uncertain conjectures. But every man who has hitherto been charged with the finances of the country, whether a secretary of the treasury or the chairman of a finance committee, has supposed it important to go into conjectures or estimates on these subjects, and to approximate as far as possible to the truth, that the government may be enabled to form some practical estimate of the amount to which they may with propriety tax the people. But if the senator thinks he can justify himself for this omission, how will he justify it to the country, and to those great interests which are assailed by this bill, that we have been furnished with no information touching the amount of public expenditure; and without information on either point how has he come to the conclusion that there does exist a redundant revenue, and that it is an evil so great as to call for the legislation of congress!

But I have not risen simply to express my regret at the want of information under which we are invited to act. I have risen, at once, promptly to declare that I shall oppose, so far as my voice and my vote can go, this disturbance of the compromise arrangement made in March, 1853, under which the country has flourished in an unparalleled degree, and on which all parties have reposed as being durable and permanent.

In regard to the articles of salt and of spirituous liquors, both of which, but salt especially, are articles which cannot be touched without a violation of that compromise, the former is one in which my state has little interest, as connected with a tax for protection. It is the great states of New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia and Ohio, which are principally concerned in this question. In my own state, some of the article is manufactured, but we are so situated that the manufacture, as existing among us derives no advantage from any protective duty. So far, therefore, as my constituents are concerned, I care not a particle if the duty shall be repealed in toto. But I oppose the measure because I view it as what has often and expressively been denominated an entering wedge; and because it is well known that all encroachments on the system may be expected to commence under plausible pretenses. The article of coal is an instance of this. In the depth of winter, when, during a season of intense cold, all are shivering for the want of a more abundant supply of fuel, the cry is raised to repeal the duty on foreign coal. So salt is known by every body to be an essential article of human subsistence, and it is seized upon as furnishing a plausible article on which the duty may be reduced, or dispensed with altogether.

But if these are all articles covered by the compromise, what security, what guaranty can the country possess that the work of reduction is to stop at that point? Will not the process, ere long, reach to cotton? and to woollens? Nay, are we not already notified, while, as I admit, the senator has brought us a bill less exceptionable than a corresponding one which has been introduced elsewhere, that is not "antagonistical"? (I believe the term is) to that measure, that there is no hostility between the two; and, if the purpose shall not be effected by this bill, for reducing the revenue to a sum not specified, that bill itself, or some kindred measure must be resorted to. I want the country to know what is its actual condition. I want it to know whether that odious, that shocking list of articles, which has just been read by the secretary, is to be brought up, session after session, for discussion and gradual action, till the whole protective system is destroyed. The country has a right to know whether the peace effected by the compromise of 1853, is to be respected; or whether it is to be assailed, first, in respect to articles calculated to excite public sympathy in their favor, and then those more important ones are at length to be reached, which are essential to the prosperity of the national industry.

I have now discharged what I believed to be a duty. You have the power, both in this house and the other; you can do in this matter as you think proper. Go on, then. Disturb, distract the country; reanimate the community; reopen its wounds just closed; do this, if it seems to you good; take upon yourselves the awful responsibility; but you shall never do it with my consent, nor without my solemn protest.

Mr. Wright, in reply, observed that he should not argue the bill at this time. He had at present but one duty to perform, which was to report the bill.—He would say again that the finance committee considered the amount both of revenue and expenditure for the coming year so entirely dependent on the action of congress that, beyond the documents already on the tables of members, the committee could state no valuable fact for their consideration. He would move that the bill be made the special order of the day or Thursday next, and that, in the mean time, the statement which had been presented in company with the bill might be printed.

The printing having been ordered,

Mr. Davis observed that this measure was one of great importance, and worthy of great consideration. He considered it desirable to keep the country out of agitation; its prosperity depended more on that than this body seemed to be fully aware of; prosperity was impossible, under any policy, unless the nation had the assurance of something steady in that policy. The nation wanted rest; the people needed repose that they may know what to do. He had almost said that even a bad policy, if steady, was better than a comparatively good one, if unsteady and perpetually fluctuating. This was peculiarly true in relation to the manufactures of the country, because those who conducted these establishments, if they were able to look a few years ahead, they would shape their mode of conducting business so as to meet the policy of the government. The bill proposed seriously to affect, among other articles, that of salt, in which Mr. D's state was largely interested, inasmuch as very large capitals were vested in establishments for its manufacture upon the sea shore. Inasmuch, therefore, that the country might understand what was doing here, and of what was sought to be accomplished by this bill, he would ask that one thousand extra copies of the statement which had accompanied the bill be printed.

This was agreed to.

The bill was then read a second time, and made the order of the day for Thursday next.

The following bill, which was yesterday ordered* to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read a third time:

A bill designating and limiting the funds receivable for the revenues of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c. That the secretary of the treasury be, and hereby is required to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to effect a collection of the public revenue of the United States, whether arising from duties, taxes, debts or sales of lands, in the manner and on the principles herein provided: that is, that no such duties, taxes, debts or sums of money payable for lands, shall be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States, under the following restrictions and conditions in regard to such notes, to wit: from and after the passage of this act, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars, shall be received on account of the public dues; and from and after the 30th day of Dec. eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than ten dollars shall be so receivable; and from and after the thirtieth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, the like prohibition shall be extended to the notes of all banks issuing bills or notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That no note shall be received by the collectors or receivers of the public money which the banks in which they are to be deposited shall not, under the supervision and control of the secretary of the treasury, agree to pass to the credit of the United States as cash: Provided, That, if any deposit bank shall refuse to receive and pass to the credit of the United States, as cash, any notes receivable under the provisions of this act, which said bank, in the ordinary course of business, receives on general deposit, the secretary of the treasury is hereby authorized to withdraw the public deposits from said bank.

The question being on the passage of the bill, Mr. Benton addressed the senate at great length in opposition to it. When he had concluded,

On motion of Mr. Grundy the bill was laid on the table, and the following resolution offered by him yesterday, taken up.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the house of representatives, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for president and vice president of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election.

On motion of Mr. Clay, seconded by Mr. Grundy, the resolution was amended by adding the following:

And also to inquire into the expediency of ascertaining whether any votes were given at the recent election, contrary to the prohibition contained in the second section of the second article of the constitution; and if any such votes were given, what ought to be done with them, and whether any, and what provision ought to be made for securing the faithful observance in future of that section of the constitution.

The resolution as amended was adopted. On motion of Mr. Grundy, the bill defining and limiting the

*The yeas and nays given in Thursday's proceedings, (see page 352) in connexion with the above bill, were on the adoption of Mr. Rives' amendment, and not on the engrossment of the bill, (as incorrectly stated), on which latter question there was no division kinds of money to be received by the United States was taken up, and then on motion of Mr. Walker, the senate adjourned.

January 28. The vice president, after reading of the journal, addressed the senate as follows:

Senators: The period is at hand which is to terminate the official relation that has existed between us, and I leave, probably never to return to it, a body with which I have been long connected; where some remain whom I found here fifteen years ago, and where, in the progress of public duties, personal associations have arisen never to be forgotten. From such scenes I cannot retire without emotion. Nor can I give to the senate the usual opportunity of choosing another to preside for a time over their deliberations, without referring to the manner in which I have endeavored to discharge a most gratifying and honorable trust connected with the office to which my country called me. Entering upon it with unaffected diffidence, well knowing how little my studies had been directed to its peculiar duties, I was yet strengthened by the determination then expressed, so to discharge the authority with which I was invested, as "best to protect the rights, to respect the feelings, and to guard the reputations of all who would be affected by its exercise." I was sure that, if successful in this, I should be pardoned for errors which I could hardly expect to avoid.

In the interval that has since elapsed it has been our lot in this assembly to pass through scenes of unusual excitement: the intense interest on absorbing topics, which has pervaded our whole community, could not be unfelt within these walls. The warmth of political parties, natural in such times, the unguarded ardor of sudden debate, and the collisions seldom to be separated from the invaluable privilege of free discussion, have not been unfrequently mingled with the more tranquil tenor of ordinary legislation. I cannot hope that, in emergencies like these, I have always been so fortunate as to satisfy every one around me; yet, I permit myself to think that the extent to which my decisions have been approved by the senate is some evidence that my efforts justly to administer their rules have not been vain; and I conscientiously cherish the conviction, that on no occasion have I departed from my early resolution, or been regardless of what was due to the rights or the feelings of the members of this body.

Though I may henceforth be separated from the senate, I can never cease to revert with peculiar interest to my long connexion with it. In every situation in my future life I shall remember with a just pride the evidences of approbation and confidence which I have here received; and as an American citizen, devotedly attached to the institutions of my country, I must always regard with becoming and sincere respect a branch of our government, invested with such extensive powers, and designed by our forefathers to accomplish such important results.

Indulging an ardent wish that every success may await you in performing the exalted and honorable duties of your public trust, and offering my warmest prayers that prosperity and happiness may be constant attendants on each of you, along the future paths of life, I respectfully bid you farewell.

After the vice president had retired, on motion of Mr. Grundy, the senate proceeded to ballot for a president pro tem.

The number of votes cast was 37; necessary to a choice 19. Mr. King, of Alabama, had 26; Mr. Southard 7; Mr. Clay 1; Mr. Prentiss 1; Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, 1; Mr. Buchanan 1.

Mr. King being duly elected president pro tem of the senate, was conducted to the chair by Mr. Benton and expressed his gratitude for the honor conferred.

On motion of Mr. Grundy, it was Ordered, That the secretary of the senate, inform the president of the United States and the house of representatives that the senate have elected the hon. William R. King their president pro tem.

A number of petitions were presented and referred, and several committees delivered reports, all of which will be duly noticed in their progress.

The following resolution was offered by Mr. Calhoun, which lies over one day:

Resolved, That the president be requested to communicate to the senate a copy of the correspondence with the government of Great Britain, in relation to the outrage committed on our flag, and the rights of our citizens, by the authorities of Bermuda and New Providence, in seizing the slaves on board of the brig Encomium and Enterprize, engaged in the coasting trade, but which were forced by shipwreck and stress of weather into the ports of those islands.

After an ineffectual effort, in which Messrs. S. & Linn concurred, to postpone the bill defining what currency shall be received in payment for dues of the United States, with a view to taking up the land bill—

The senate resumed the consideration of the former, which was the order of the day; and the bill being at its third reading, and the question being on its passage—

Mr. Walker, chairman of the land committee, who had reported it, took the floor in reply to the remarks made by Mr. Benton yesterday, going at large into the arguments of that senator, and retorting with no little warmth, what he considered as unmerited reflections on the committee, declaring at the same time, that for all he said he held himself personally responsible both in and out of the house. When Mr. Walker had concluded,

Mr. Webster made some inquiries of him in reference to his understanding of the practical effect of the bill on banks issuing notes under the amount of five dollars. Mr. Walker replied that the bill had followed the language of the joint resolution of 1816, and, as there were different opinions as to the construction of that resolution, there might be as to this bill; but whether it were strictly mandatory on the receivers or not, he felt assured that it spoke a voice that would not be disregarded. Mr. Rives said that the provisions in this bill in reference to banks issuing small notes were the same with those in the deposit bill of last session; which he quoted. Mr. Webster said his only difficulty was respecting the receivability of the Virginia land scrip; if the bill was not peremptory on that subject, it ought to be made so. And for this purpose he introduced an amendment declaring the Virginia land scrip receivable in payment of all dues to the government; which lies on the table.

Mr. Benton, to show how the deposit bill was understood by those who executed it, quoted some bank returns from the bank of Columbus, showing the issue by that bank of notes of one, two and three dollars.

Mr. Rives returned his thanks to Mr. Walker for his able and satisfactory defence of the bill. He should not be able to add much to what had been said by the honorable senator, but was desirous of adding his mite in reply to so much of what had so zealously been urged by the senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton), as had not been touched upon by the chairman of the land committee; and, as he understood there were gentlemen on both sides of the question who were desirous of being heard, he suggested the propriety of deferring further debate on the bill to Monday. This was, after some conversation, agreed to.

Mr. Benton introduced the following resolution: Resolved, That the senate cordially reciprocate the sentiments of personal kindness expressed by Martin Van Buren, vice president of the United States, towards the members of this body, upon taking leave of them; and that the thanks of the senate be presented to him, in testimony of the impartiality, dignity and ability with which he has presided over their deliberations, and of their entire approbation of his conduct in the discharge of the arduous and important duties assigned him as president of the senate.

Mr. B. suggested the propriety of taking up the resolution and acting upon it at this time.

The chair stated that this could only be done by unanimous consent. Mr. Calhoun objected.

Mr. Buchanan expressed his hope that the resolution would be acted on at once. Mr. Calhoun inquired whether it was usual to pass a vote of this kind. Mr. Benton quoted several precedents to show that it was; whereupon Mr. Calhoun, observing that it was a mere formality, withdrew his objection; and the question being put, the resolution was agreed to, nem. con. When, on motion of Mr. Davis, the senate adjourned.

January 30. After memorials and petitions had been presented and referred, Mr. Tomlinson, from the committee of accounts, who were instructed to inquire into the necessity of an increase of the usual number of documents printed for the use of the senate, reported a resolution that the number of copies of any document ordered by the senate to be printed shall be eight hundred and fifty; of the journal one thousand and fifty; and of bills, joint resolutions and amendments, five hundred, to be distributed under the direction of the secretary; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Wright the committee on finance was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of sundry merchants of Boston, praying that the credit of duties payable on imported goods might be extended to one year, and to three years on those subject to debenture.

It was also discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Richard J. Todd, for a repeal of duties on watches and parts of watches, and from the consideration of sundry memorials from citizens of Virginia and Pennsylvania against a reduction of the duty on coal.

The following resolutions, which lie over one day, were offered by Mr. Norvell:

Resolved, That the committee on roads and canals inquire into the expediency of granting to the state of Michigan five per cent. of the net proceeds of all public lands lying within said state, which were sold under the authority of the United States, from the 1st January, 1836, to the 1st July, 1836, such proceeds to be applied, under the direction of the legislature of the state, to the completion of the military roads commenced therein by the United States while Michigan was a territory.

Resolved, That the committee on public lands inquire into the expediency of establishing a surveyor general's office in the state of Michigan.

Resolved That the committee on commerce inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the survey of the falls of St. Mary, with a view to the construction of a ship channel around said falls, between Lake Superior and Lake Huron.

Some other resolutions of a local or private character were offered and appropriately referred, after which

Mr. Clay moved to take up the memorial from the Colonization society, presented by him on Friday last, expressing the hope that there would be no further debate upon it, and calling for the yeas and nays on the question of taking up; which were ordered.

The question was then tried, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, Clayton, Davis, Kent, Knight, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Wall—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Dana, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Nicholas, Norvell, Page, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Strange, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—26.

So the memorial remains on the table.

The senate then again resumed the consideration (at its third reading) of the bill defining the currency receivable for the United States. Mr. Rives having concluded his remarks, Mr. Benton followed in a brief reply. Mr. Walker further defended the bill; and Mr. Morris went into a discussion of the unconstitutionality of its provisions, contending that it violated the rights of the states, superseded the constitutional currency, and was every way mischievous. Mr. Webster objected to it as leaving, in effect, the whole matter which ought to be the subject of law to the discretion of the secretary of the treasury. Mr. Calhoun concurred with Mr. Morris as to its unconstitutionality.

The bill was then, for the present, laid on the table.

The senate then resumed the consideration of the land bill. The question being on Mr. Buchanan's amendment to this bill, allowing parents to enter small tracts for their children, to be patented when they should come of age—After some desultory conversation, an attempt was made to postpone the bill to to-morrow; but it failed: yeas 18, nays 27. The question being then taken, the amendment of Mr. Buchanan was agreed to, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Ewing, of Illinois, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, Knight, Lyons, Nicholas, Norvell, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Southard, Strange, Swift, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Webster, White—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Fulton, Grundy, Kings, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Linn, Moore, Morris, Niles, Page, Preston, Ruggles, Tipton, Wright—15.

On motion of Mr. Walker, the bill was then further amended, so as to allow no one to enter a tract in his own name until he was 21 years old.

Mr. Clay then renewed the motion formerly made, and withdrawn by Mr. Morris, to strike out the 4th section of the bill, including the whole pre-emption clause, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered. Mr. Morris supported the motion. Mr. Niles opposed it. Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Clay spoke with warmth against the unlimited pre-emptive rights conferred by the bill, and Mr. Sevier and Mr. Walker replied in defence of this section, with which, as Mr. W. declared, the bill must stand or fall.

Mr. Morris now moved an adjournment, (it was five o'clock;) and on that motion Mr. Walker demanded the yeas and nays; which being taken stood—yeas 23, nays 22.

So the senate adjourned.

January 31. The chair presented a communication from the secretary of the treasury; which was indistinctly understood to relate to the claim of the United States on the United States bank.

Also, a communication from the state department, with a statement of the number of American seamen.

A number of petitions were presented, and several bills reported, when resolutions of a local character were offered, which will be duly noticed when before the senate for its decision: among them was the following, submitted by Mr. Clayton, which lies over one day:

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making New Castle a port of entry, either distinctly from, or conjointly with, the port of Wilmington.

Some time was then spent in reconsidering the unfavorable report of the committee of claims, on the claim of Joseph Nourse, which was, on motion of Mr. Linn, ordered to lie upon the table.

The senate resumed the consideration of the land bill. The question being on the striking out of the pre-emption clause. The motion to strike out was strenuously advocated by Messrs. King, of Georgia, and Bayard, and opposed by Mr. Tipton, and finally lost by yeas and nays—yeas 22, nays 24. Mr. Clay moved an amendment confining the pre-emption feature of the bill to the lands which have been surveyed: which, after debate, was also lost—yeas 23, nays 23. Mr. Black moved to restrict the operation of the bill to citizens of the United States. Carried—yeas 24, nays 21. Mr. Walker moved to confine the bill to the states and organized territories of the U. States. Agreed to. Mr. Tallmadge offered an amendment confining the operation of the bill to the year 1840. Agreed to. Mr. Morris gave notice of his purpose to move a substitute for the whole bill; which was ordered to be printed.

The question was then at length taken, as in committee of the whole, (at past 6 o'clock), on agreeing to the bill in its amended form, and carried by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King, of Ala. Linn, Lyon, Moore, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Kent, Knight, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—18.

The bill was then reported to the senate, and ordered to be printed, as amended.

And the senate adjourned.

February 1. Mr. McKean, who has not been before able to attend in the senate since his first illness, resumed his seat to-day.

The chair presented a communication from the navy department, in conformity to the 2d section of the law of May, 1820, giving a statement, with various distinctions, of the appropriations for the navy establishment in 1836; Referred.

Among the petitions presented were the following:

By Mr. King, of Alabama: From William Brent, setting forth that four of the votes given in Virginia for president and vice president of the United States, were cast by individuals not constitutionally qualified.

Also, (from a quarter unknown to the reporter) a statement that the votes of South Carolina, for president and vice president of the United States, were cast by individuals chosen by the legislature of the state, who were therefore not constitutionally qualified electors. Both laid on the table, on motion of Mr. Grundy, to be referred hereafter, at the proper time, to the joint committee of the two houses.

Several committees delivered reports, and others were discharged from the consideration of business that had been referred to them.

Mr. Davis, from the committee on commerce, reported a bill authorizing the president of the U. States to appoint a commission of three persons, to examine inventions for the purpose of securing steam boilers from bursting; and to report the results to congress. Read, ordered to a second reading, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

The resolution, formerly offered by Mr. Nicholas, calling on the secretary of the treasury for information obtained by special agents in relation to alleged frauds on the public lands in the state of Louisiana, being under consideration,

Mr. Clay proposed to amend the resolution by striking out Louisiana and extending the inquiry to all the states and territories. After considerable discussion between Messrs. Nicholas, Ewing, Linn, and Sevier, Mr. Clay offered his amendment which was adopted. On motion of Mr. Ewing, the resolution of Mr. Nicholas was further amended so as to call on the secretary of the treasury for information otherwise obtained, as well as by special agents. The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

[The National Intelligencer of Thursday did not contain the remainder of this day's proceedings; which shall have a place in our next.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, Jan. 25. Mr. Herod, elected a member of this house, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the lamented death of Mr. Kinnard, appeared, was qualified and took his seat.

The house took up the unfinished business of the morning hour, being the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Underwood calling upon the clerk for a statement of the mileage claimed by members, &c. with the amendments of Messrs. Claiborne and Yell (see page 351) the pending question being on the amendment to the amendment. A very desultory and uninteresting debate now ensued, after which the resolution and amendments were ordered to lie on the table—ayes 95, noes not counted.

After resolutions had been called for,

Mr. Bell said he rose for the purpose of submitting a motion, of which he had given so many notices, for leave to introduce a bill to secure the freedom of elections; but he had himself felt so much of the inconvenience and disadvantage under which gentlemen labored who had held resolutions for some time which they could not have an opportunity to present, that he was disposed now, after having submitted his motion, to move that, under the indulgence of the house, every gentleman who had resolutions to offer should now offer them, provided they would not create debate. If no gentlemen were desirous to present such resolutions, he was ready now to proceed with his observations.

No resolution having been offered, Mr. Vanderpoel rose to a point of order. He wished to inquire whether a motion for leave to bring in a bill was debatable? The chair said he thought it was. The gentleman had a right to state the character of the bill. Mr. Bell then said that the remarks which he had intended to submit might perhaps be better comprehended if he were to send to the chair, to be read, the bill and preamble which he proposed to read. If the chair thought the proceeding regular, Mr. B. would be glad that the preamble and bill should be read. The chair said that the regular way would be to take the sense of the house whether the same should be read for the information of the house.—And the question being taken, the sense of the house was declared in favor of the reading.

The preamble and bill were accordingly read—(we will publish them in the next "REGISTER") when Mr. Bell arose and addressed the house in explanation of the motives which induced him to submit the bill—having concluded his opening address, on motion of Mr. Vanderpoel the house passed to the orders of the day, and resumed the consideration of the bill from the senate, entitled "an act to provide for the admission of the state of Michigan into the union, on an equal footing with the original states."

The pending question was on the motion of Mr. A. Mann, for the previous question; which motion prevailed, ayes 84, noes 67. So there was a second. And the main question was ordered to be now taken.

Mr. Briggs called for the yeas and nays on the main question, which were ordered. And the main question, on ordering the bill to a third reading, was taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 140, nays 68. And the bill was ordered to a third reading today.

The question then recurred on the final passage of the bill.

A debate followed, in which Messrs. Jenifer, Thomas, Howard, Pickens and Pearce of Maryland, participated.

Mr. Cushman then obtained the floor, and moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered without a division.

Mr. Chapin asked for the yeas and nays on the main question, being the passage of the bill, which were ordered—and were yeas 182, nays 48. So the bill was passed and the house adjourned. [The yeas and nays shall have a place in the next "REGISTER."]

Thursday, Jan. 26. After the reception of reports, the house resumed the unfinished business of the morning hour, the motion submitted yesterday by Mr. Bell for leave to bring in a bill to secure the freedom of elections. That gentleman then arose and continued his speech, and was proceeding to remark on the change which the opinions of the president had undergone in relation to disturbing the principles of the compromise bill, when, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house passed to the orders of the day, and took up the bill to regulate the pay and mileage of members, the question being on its final passage. A long debate now ensued, during which Mr. Mann moved to recommit the bill to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union, and Mr. Yell moved to amend the motion to commit by adding instructions to the committee to report a section reducing the pay of the members of the house to $6 per day, and $6 for every twenty miles of travel to and from the seat of government.

Mr. Anthony called for the previous question, but the call was not sustained—ayes 71, noes 73. Mr. Howard moved to lay the bill on the table—yeas 58, nays 128. Mr. Parks moved an adjournment, but withdrew the motion at the request of the speaker.

A message from the president of the U. States was received, in obedience to the resolution of the house of representatives of the 17th instant, requesting the president to lay before the house, if not incompatible with the public interests, any information in his possession showing the condition of the political relations between the United States and Mexico; and also, any further information that he may have received as to the condition of Texas.

Mr. Howard moved the reference of the message and documents to the committee on foreign affairs, and that the same be printed.

Mr. Boyd, after inquiring of the speaker if it would be in order, moved to amend the motion of Mr. Howard, by adding instructions to the committee to report a resolution acknowledging the independence of Texas. Mr. Craig hoped the gentleman would not create a debate at this late hour, by endeavoring to attach the resolution to these documents.

Mr. Reed asked for the reading of the message and documents. Mr. Vinton moved an adjournment. Mr. Claiborne, of Mississippi, called for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn; which the house would not order. And the house adjourned.

Friday, Jan. 27. Mr. Thomas moved that I. E. Crary, member elect from the state of Michigan, now in attendance, be qualified to take his seat as a member of the house.

Mr. Robertson opposed the motion, on the ground that Michigan was not a state at the time Mr. Crary was elected; that she became a state only yesterday, and that Michigan was not competent to make the election at a time when her constitution had not received the sanction of congress. He moved that the subject be referred to the committee on elections, to examine into and report upon all questions touching the election, qualification and return of Mr. Crary.

Mr. Thomas contended that to send this subject to a committee would be a work of supererogation, after the thorough examination which had been given to it. He contended that the constitution of the state of Michigan was now as perfect as it would have been if its organization had been preceded by a law of congress authorising a convention for that purpose, and cited precedents in the history of the union to corroborate this position.

A communication was read from Mr. Crary, enclosing a certificate of election from the governor of the state of Michigan.

Mr. Huntman demanded the previous question: and the house seconded the call: ayes 97, noes not counted; and the house ordered that the main question should now be taken.

Mr. Young called for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered. And the main question, "Shall Isaac E. Crary be qualified as a member of the house from the state of Michigan?" was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 150, nays 32.

So the house determined that Mr. Crary be now qualified.

At the request of Mr. Dawson, of Georgia, in order to enable that gentleman briefly to explain the reasons for his vote on this occasion, Mr. Thomson, of South Carolina, moved a reconsideration of the vote just passed: when brief remarks were made by Mr. Dawson and other gentlemen. After which, to save the house from the trouble of the previous question, indicated by Mr. Cushman's rising, Mr. Thomson withdrew his motion. Mr. Crary, the representative from Michigan, then appeared, was qualified and took his seat.

After Mr. Cave Johnson, from the committee of ways and means, had reported a bill increasing the compensation of certain clerks, which was committed, and Mr. Whittlesey, from the committee of claims had made unfavorable reports upon the petitions of James Kilgour and C. M. Smith, which were ordered to lie on the table,

Mr. Jarvis moved to discharge the committee of the whole from the further consideration of the bill to provide for the enlistment of boys in the naval service (in order to put it to its third reading).

Mr. Bell objected to departing from the usual course in relation to this bill, by giving it preference over other business earlier on the list.

The whole of the residue of this day's sitting, protracted to a late hour, was occupied in a discussion of a most painful and disagreeable nature, arising out of a collision between two gentlemen, (Mr. Bell, of Tennessee, and Mr. Jarvis, of Maine), growing out of the above motion, which transgressed the usual bounds of parliamentary practice. To attempt, in a few words, or in a short space of time, to give an intelligible account of it, would be in vain. In the end, however, the difficulty was adjusted, by the intervention of other members, more satisfactorily than during a long discussion it appeared likely to be. And

The house immediately adjourned.

Saturday, Jan. 28. The motion made yesterday by Mr. Jarvis, to discharge the committee of the whole on the state of the union from the further consideration of the bill to provide for the enlistment of boys in the naval service of the U. States, coming up as the unfinished business, was considered and rejected.

Mr. Thomas, from the committee on the judiciary, reported, without amendment, the bill from the senate to alter the times of holding the circuit court of the United States in the state of Tennessee; which bill was committed to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

[Mr. Dunlap expressed his desire to offer an amendment to the above bill providing for the holding of a court in the western part of the state of Tennessee.]

Also, without amendment, the bill from the senate altering the times of holding the circuit court of the United States for the 5th circuit and district of North Carolina, holden at the city of Raleigh; which bill was ordered to a third reading on Monday.

The committee on revolutionary claims was discharged from the consideration of a number of petitions that had been referred to them.

After some other business of a private nature had been disposed of, Mr. Dromgoole, from the select committee to whom was referred so much of the president's message as relates to amending the constitution of the United States, together with all propositions and resolutions submitted at the last and present session of congress, proposing amendments to the constitution, reported in part that, according to order, they have had under consideration sundry propositions and resolutions for the amendment of the constitution in relation to the election of president and vice president of the United States. Upon examination they find that a report on this subject was made at the last session of congress on the 30th March, 1836, by a select committee. The joint resolution reported by said committee was twice read, and committed to a committee of the whole house on the state of the union. No further action was had thereon, and the said reported joint resolution remains on the calendar, and may, at the pleasure of the house, be considered in said committee of the whole. If, therefore, the house be disposed to act on this subject during the present session of congress, your committee think it more advisable to consider the report now on the calendar, than to begin de novo. Your committee, therefore, submit the two following resolutions:

Resolved, That the select committee to whom the subject was referred, be discharged from the further consideration of all propositions and resolutions relating to amendments of the constitution on the subject of the election of president and vice president.

Resolved, That this house will, on the 31st inst. resolve itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, to take into consideration the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the constitution of the United States in relation to the election of president and vice president.

After some remarks from Mr. Dromgoole, a division of the question was called for and ordered on the passage of the resolutions, when the first was concurred in and the second disagreed to—yeas 66, nays 83—so the house refused to go into committee on the said joint resolution.

On motion of Mr. Vanderpoel the rules were suspended, to enable him to offer a resolution that the house meet hereafter at 11 o'clock, which resolution was agreed to.

Some business of minor importance was then transacted, after which the house proceeded to the orders of the day, and resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. Jarvis, pending at the adjournment of the house on Saturday last, to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the relief of — Dade had been rejected.

After a further debate thereon, the motion to reconsider was laid on the table—yeas 89, nays 63.

The engrossed bill, to grant the Atchafalaya railroad and banking company a right of way through the public lands, was read the third time, and passed.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Ebenezer Breed was read the third time, and after debate, and undry motions to adjourn, which were rejected, he bill was passed—yeas 85, nays 59.

And, thereupon, the house adjourned.

Monday, Jan. 30. The house met at eleven o'clock, pursuant to the order of Saturday last; and here being no quorum present, Mr. Howell moved a call of the house. On that motion Mr. Granger called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 57, nays 55. So the call was ordered. The speaker having, on motion of Mr. Briggs, ascertained that a quorum was present, the house, on motion of Mr. C. Allan, suspended all further proceedings on the call; and the journal of Saturday was then read.

Petitions and memorials were then called for and presented in the order of states and territories.

Mr. Adams said that he had in his possession a number of petitions in relation to slavery; some praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; some for the abolition of slavery in the territories; some for the abolition of slavery and the internal coasting slave trade; and some for the prohibition of the exportation of slaves to Texas, or to the dominions of any foreign power. He was under the necessity of presenting these petitions separately and distinctly, as they came partly from his constituents and partly from people in other parts of the United States. He asked leave to address the house on the right of the petitioners to have their petitions read. He wished that the request might be entered on the journals, and that he might have the yeas and nays upon it.

Objections were made, and Mr. Anthony raised the question whether it was in order to ask for the yeas and nays on a matter of this kind, and whether, if they were granted, they would not be granted as matter of courtesy and not of right.

The speaker said, the gentleman from Massachusetts could obtain his object by submitting a motion to suspend the rule. Mr. Adams said it was immaterial to him as to the mode in which he effected his object. He, therefore, submitted his request or motion. Upon which motion the yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 44, nays 124. So the house would not suspend the rule. Mr. Adams presented the memorial of the Young Men's Abolition society of the city and county of Philadelphia, remonstrating against the recognition of Texas. Mr. A. moved that it be read, and called for the yeas and nays on that motion. Mr. Jarvis moved to lay the whole subject on the table. The speaker said he would have no hesitation to do so, under the rule of the house, if it should appear that the memorial contained any reference to the subject of slavery. The speaker then (having looked into the memorial) pronounced it to contain allusions to the subject of slavery and that it must therefore be laid on the table without being read. Mr. Adams appealed from the decision, and called for the yeas and nays thereon.—Mr. Adams then appealed against the decision of the chair, and contended that when petitions were before the house, the member presenting had the right to read them: the chair had decided against this right; against this decision he now appealed.—The speaker said that, by the rule of the house, every petition making reference to the subject of slavery was ordered to lie on the table. He had looked into this petition, and was clearly of the opinion that it did relate to the subject of slavery.—Mr. Adams. I deny it. (Cries of "order," "order").

The speaker stated the question before the house, namely, it had been decided by the chair, that this petition falls under the rules of the house, by which it should be ordered to lie on the table; such was the decision of the chair. Against this decision an appeal had been made, and further, the yeas and nays had been called for. Mr. Phillips here rose and demanded, before he could vote on the question, that the petition should be read. Mr. Robertson moved to lay the petition, the appeal and the whole subject on the table; which motion, after some remarks by Mr. Lawler was withdrawn, and the petition was read by the clerk.

Mr. Haves moved to lay the whole subject on the table. On which question the yeas and nays were ordered; and were: yeas 131, nays 62.

So the whole subject, both the memorial and appeal, were laid on the table.

Mr. Adams then presented in succession, thirteen or fourteen additional memorials and petitions, on the same subject, praying against the coasting slave trade, the exportation of slaves to Texas, &c. &c.; each petition was immediately, under the rule, ordered to lie on the table.

For each petition Mr. A. moved a reading; which, under the rule, was refused by the chair; and against each decision of the chair Mr. A. appealed to the house.

In each case Mr. Cushman, of N. H. moved to lay the whole subject on the table, and in this manner the whole batch of petitions was summarily and speedily disposed of.

The presentation of petitions and memorials from the remaining states was then completed.

[A memorial of certain citizens of Kentucky, in favor of aid and support being extended to the Colonization society, being presented by Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Adams moved that the memorial be read; which, having been done, Mr. A. made some remarks in the view that, as this memorial related to slavery, it should meet with the same treatment which his own petitions had. Mr. A. moved, therefore, that the memorial be laid on the table. After some remarks from Mr. Mercer in favor of the petition, the motion was put, and lost by a great majority against it.—The petition, therefore, was received and lies over.]

[The speaker presented to the house a memorial from W. L. Brent and Richard S. Coxe, members of the bar of Washington, preferring charges against the hon. Buckner Thruston, one of the associate judges of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, for alleged official misconduct, praying congress to institute an inquiry into the matter, and give a suitable remedy. The memorial was, on motion, referred to the committee on the judiciary, and ordered to be printed.]

The remainder of the session was occupied in receiving resolutions; among those of a public nature were the following:

On motion of Mr. French,
Resolved, That the committee on the post office and post roads, be requested to enquire into the expediency of requiring the postage on all letters sent by the express mail, to be paid in advance; and that the committee inquire into the expediency of abolishing the express mail.

And be it resolved, That the committee on the post office and post roads be and they are hereby instructed to inquire into the extent of existing abuses on the part of the postmasters in renting letter boxes in their offices, and into the expediency of prohibiting, under adequate penalties, all such practices.

On motion of Mr. Mann, of New York,
Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the laws of the United States in relation to imprisonment for debt, so as to place alien plaintiffs upon the same footing as citizens of the several states, in respect to their legal remedies.

On motion of Mr. Thomson, of Ohio,
Resolved, That the committee on the public lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a township or other quantity of land to each of the states of the union, to enable them to erect suitable buildings, and to print or purchase all necessary books for the instruction of the blind within their respective limits.

On motion of Mr. Ingersoll,
Resolved, That the committee on the public buildings be instructed to inquire into the expediency of completing the east front of the capitol, by providing suitable statuary, and to provide a statue of Jefferson, to be placed in the library of congress.

On motion of Mr. Crary,
Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the survey of the falls of St. Mary, with a view to the construction of a ship channel between Lake Superior and Lake Huron.

On motion of Mr. Crary,
Resolved, That the committee on the public lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a surveyor general's office for the state of Michigan. Adjourned.

Tuesday, Jan. 31. The hon. J. C. Alford, a member from the state of Georgia, appeared, was qualified and took his seat.

Mr. Russell, from the committee on commerce, reported the following resolution; which was agreed to by the house:

Resolved, That the committee of the whole house be discharged from the consideration of the bills for the survey of certain roads and rivers therein mentioned, and that the said bills, and all amendments to them, be again committed to the committee on roads and canals.

Mr. Wardwell, from the committee on revolutionary pensions, reported a bill explanatory of the 8d section of the "act granting half pay to widows or orphans where their husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States in certain cases, and for other purposes," passed July 4, 1836, and for extending the provisions of the same; which was read and committed.

Mr. Thomas, from the committee on the judiciary, reported the following resolution, which was read, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be authorised to send for persons and papers, and to inquire into the truth of the charges made in the memorial of William L. Brent and Richard S. Coxe, complaining of the official conduct of Buckner Thruston, one of the judges of the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

Mr. Connor, from the committee on the post office and post roads, reported a bill for the erection of a building for the post office department; which bill was twice read and committed.

A number of bills were reported from other committees, read twice and committed, when the house resumed the unfinished business of the morning hour, being the motion heretofore made by Mr. Bell, of Tennessee, for leave to bring in a bill to secure the freedom of elections.

Mr. B. said that, before he resumed his remarks, he would ask the indulgence of the house to make a statement in answer to an article which had appeared in the "Globe" of this morning, in reference to the subject under discussion. The whole of that article, in the motives which it ascribed to him, and in all material points of fact, was an infamous calumny; and, if the time of the house had permitted, he could demonstrate, to the satisfaction of the house, that it was so.

Mr. B. also said that, in justice to a gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. Dynum), to whom, in his remarks the other day, he, (Mr. Bell), had alluded as getting up to propose a measure for the reduction of the revenue so soon as it was discovered that the deposit bill of the last session would become a law, Mr. Bell had always understood that that was a favorite measure with the gentleman, and had supposed that, in offering the measure at that time, he (Mr. Dynum) had nearly seized on that which he had considered a fit opportunity.

Mr. B. then resumed and concluded his remarks in illustration of the objects of the bill, and urging the necessity of action upon it.

Mr. Bell having concluded his remarks, Mr. Graves obtained the floor; when,

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house passed to the orders of the day. Mr. W. Thompson inquired whether the business first in order was not the motion and resolution pending on the message of the president of the United States on the subject of our relations with Mexico and the condition of Texas?

The speaker said that, after engrossed bills, &c. on the table were disposed of, that subject would be first in order.

Mr. Cambreleng moved to suspend the rules, to go into committee on certain appropriation bills; which motion prevailed.

The house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Craig, of Va. in the chair), on the bill making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year 1837. Mr. Cambreleng explained, that the bill was essentially different in form from the bill of last year. It was then considered, amended, and laid aside.

On motion of Mr. Garland, of Lou. the committee took up the bill to establish an additional land office in the state of Louisiana; and no amendment having been offered thereto,

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the committee rose and reported both the bills to the house. The question being on concurring with the committee in their amendments to the Indian appropriation bill, Mr. Cushing moved that the house adjourn; but withdrew the motion, to enable

The speaker to present a communication from the secretary of war, transmitting a statement of appropriations and expenditures for the year 1836, and the balance remaining in the treasury on the 31st December last; which, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, was laid on the table and ordered to printed. And, on motion of Mr. Cushing, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Feb. 1. A number of petitions were presented and several bills reported, twice read and committed; when the house resumed the unfinished business of the morning hour, the motion heretofore submitted by Mr. Bell for leave to bring in a bill to secure the freedom of elections.

Mr. Graves, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the house in reference to the general principles of the bill, and on the necessity of legislative action for the application of proper remedies to the evils complained of in the preamble, and the existence of which, he contended, had been most fully demonstrated.

Mr. G. had not concluded when, the hour having elapsed, the house, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, passed to the orders of the day.

The bill making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year 1837, coming up; and the question being on concurring with the committee of the whole in the amendments made thereto,

Mr. Cushing addressed the house at length in reference to the general policy of the government of the United States towards the Indian tribes.

After some remarks from Mr. Everett in relation to the manner in which the emigrating tribes had been removed; the failure on the part of the United States to comply with its treaty; and the frauds which had been committed upon them,

Mr. E. asked for the reading of a letter which had come under his knowledge, subsequent to the adjournment of the house last evening; and which was published in a paper that he had ascertained to be very respectable.

The letter is an extract from a gentleman in the west, and appears in an Arkansas paper. It refers to the removal of the Creeks by the contractors, to their destitute condition, their want of proper food and clothing; in consequence of which, many of them fall behind the main body, and perish; and represents the scene as one to which no portion of American history can furnish a parallel.

Mr. Parker complained of the entire want of specific appropriations apparent in this bill, as compared with the bills of previous years; and thought that one way to secure the effectual fulfilment of the treaties with the emigrating Indians would be to specify the particular amounts of money, and the objects to which they should be applied. He moved to commit the bill to the committee of ways and means, with instructions to modify and amend the same by striking out the general appropriations made therein for the several tribes or nations of Indians, and inserting in lieu thereof specific appropriations, and the specific purposes for which the money was required and said to be due by the estimates, and to which it was to be applied.

And, on this motion, Mr. P. called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. Lawler was opposed to the recommitment of the bill, and was of opinion that the estimate was so perfectly plain in all its details, that any amendment which might be necessary could be made in the house. He replied to the remarks of Mr. Everett, and contended that the Creek Indians, by their repeated acts of hostility, virtually annulled the treaty which had been made, and operated a forfeiture of that protection from the United States, which they would otherwise have received. In relation to the statement which had been read from an Arkansas paper, the details therein set forth must come in a more authenticated form than in the columns of a newspaper, before he, (Mr. L.) or the house, or the country, would give credit to them.

Mr. Holsey resisted the motion to recommit, and a long debate followed. The house refused to sustain the motion of Mr. Parker, and concurred with the committee of the whole in the amendments; and the question recurring on ordering the bill to be engrossed.

Mr. Williams, of N. Carolina, moved to amend the bill, by adding the following as an additional section: "And be it further enacted, that no Indians shall in future be removed by contract from the east to the west side of the Mississippi river."

After a few remarks from Mr. W. in favor of the amendment, and Mr. Haynes, in opposition to it,

Mr. McKim moved the previous question; which the house seconded.

And the main question was ordered to be now taken.

Mr. Parker called for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were refused.

And the main question being on ordering the bill to a third reading, was taken, and carried.

And the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Casey in the chair), on the bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1837.

Mr. Cambreleng, under the direction of the committee of ways and means, reported a series of amendments making appropriations for certain items in the ordnance department, &c. which were agreed to.

And, no other amendment having been offered, the bill was laid aside.

The committee refused to take up the bill making appropriations for certain fortifications. It then rose and reported the army bill to the house, when the amendments of the committee of the whole were concurred in, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Several motions were made and rejected, to suspend the rules with the view of taking up bills not in order. Mr. Cambreleng moved that the house adjourn, but withdrew the motion at the request of the speaker, who presented several executive communications—After some other business of minor importance had been transacted, the house adjourned.

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In the senate. Mr. Nicholas presented the credentials of the honorable Alexander Moulton, senator elect from the state of Louisiana, vice Mr. Porter, resigned.

Mr. Moulton then appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. Buchanan presented the petition of the inhabitants of Pottsville, in Pennsylvania, protesting against the repeal of the duty on coal.

Mr. B. said he might take an opportunity to express his opinions on the subject, but he disapproved of the practice, and he might hereafter have an opportunity of giving them if the bill from the committee on manufactures should be taken up. It might not be so imperative on him to do this as the committee on finance had not reported in favor of any reduction of this duty.

After several petitions and resolutions had been disposed of, the senate resumed the subject which had occupied them to a late hour yesterday, which was the bill to restrict the sale of the public lands to actual settlers. Yesterday was occupied in a series of amendments, some of which were adopted, and others not; an account of all which will appear in due time. This day Mr. White (of Tennessee) brought forward a substitute for the whole bill, (after the enacting clause), containing the three leading principles of pre-emption, graduation and taxation; which he argued at length. It was opposed by Mr. Walker, and warmly advocated by Mr. Sevier; when, about four o'clock, without coming to any action thereon, the senate adjourned.

In the house of representatives. Some time was spent in the reception of reports and in the consideration of bills for the relief of individuals, after which Mr. Cambreleng asked the consent of the house at this time to take up, on their final passage, the two engrossed bills making appropriations for the current expenses, &c. of the Indian department, and for the support of the army, for the year 1837; but after a brief discussion of a point of order, the house refused to suspend the rules—yeas 113, nays 74, not two-thirds.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house, by general consent, took up, on their final passage, the engrossed bills before-mentioned.

The bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1837 was read a third time and passed.

The bill making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, &c. having been read a third time, and the question being on its final passage—

Mr. Grennell arose and addressed the house against the passage of the bill. He commented at length on the system of removal, the abuses to which it was liable, and the abuses which actually existed, and contended that every consideration of policy, justice, and humanity demanded a change. Mr. Alford replied to Mr. G. and defended the measures that had been adopted for the removal of the Indians, and stated that the Creeks, about whose destitute condition so much had been said, were better or fully as well clad as any ladies in Washington. Mr. Grennell replied to Mr. A. after which the question was taken and the bill passed.

The rule having been suspended, the house took up the navy appropriation bill, but before a final decision was had the house adjourned.

DEFENCE OF MAJOR GEN. SCOTT.

Reported for the National Intelligencer.

MILITARY COURT OF INQUIRY.

Frederick, (Md.) Jan. 20.

Present, Major gen. A. MACOMB, president.

Brig. gen. ATKINSON, } associates.

Brig. gen. BRADY, }

Capt. S. COOPER, judge advocate.

The PRESIDENT having announced the court in readiness for business, general SCOTT rose, and requested the reading of three letters directed by him to the secretary of war, upon the subject of a court of inquiry. After which—

Gen. SCOTT addressed the court as follows:

Mr. President, and gentlemen of the court:

When a doge of Genoa, for some imaginary offence, imputed by Louis XIV, was torn from his government and compelled to visit France to debase himself before that inflated monarch, he was asked, in the palace, what struck him with the greatest wonder amid the blaze of magnificence in his view? "To find myself here!" was the reply of the indignant Lescaro. And so, Mr. President, unable as I am, to remember one blunder in my recent operations, or a single duty neglected, I may say, that to find myself in the presence of this honorable court, whilst the army, I but recently commanded, is still in pursuit of the enemy, fills me with equal grief and astonishment!

And whence this great and humiliating transition? It is, sir, by the fiat of one who, from his exalted station, and, yet more, from his unequalled popularity, has never, with his high displeasure, struck a functionary of this government—no matter what the office of the individual—humble or elevated, who was not from the moment, withered in the general confidence of the American people. Yes, sir, it is my misfortune to lie under the displeasure of that most distinguished personage. The president of the United States has said: Let general Scott be recalled from the command of the army in the field, and submit his conduct in the Seminole and Creek campaigns to a court for investigation—and lo! I stand here to vindicate that conduct, which must again be judged, in the last resort, by him who first condemned it without trial or inquiry. Be it so. I shall not supplicate this court, nor the authority that has to review the "opinion" here to be given. On the contrary, I shall proceed at once to challenge your justice to render me that honorable discharge from all blame or censure which the recorded evidence imperiously demands. With such discharge before him, and enlightened by the same mass of testimony; every word of which speaks loudly in my favor—the justice of the "commander-in-chief of the army and navy" cannot hesitate. It must acquiesce; and then, although nothing may ever compensate me for the deep mortification I have been recently made to experience, I may hope to regain that portion of the public esteem which it was my happiness to enjoy on past occasions of deep moment to the power and glory of these United States of America.

I. The failure of (my) Florida campaign.

Permit me here, Mr. President, to offer a preliminary remark: If by failure the common idea of disaster, defeat or repulse be understood, then that term does great injustice to me and the brave regulars and volunteers whom I had the honor to command.

Sir, we suffered no defeat, check or repulse.—The enemy encountered by the several columns and detachments, were, in every instance beaten, driven and scattered beyond the reach of possible pursuit; and if we had chosen to imitate, in our reports, the example of many others engaged in similar operations, we might, no doubt, have figured much more largely in the public journals. But, in every instance, as far as I know or believe, though our affairs were numerous, and not deficient in danger and brilliancy, we always declined substituting imagination and conjecture for ascertained facts.—Perhaps, by the discoveries of history, the high reputations gained, before and since, by the arts alluded to, may, in time, be brought down to the humble level of myself and companions.

It is true, sir, that we did not succeed in sending off the great body of the Seminoles to the west of the Mississippi. In this object, ardently desired by all, there was certainly a failure, and the same thing may be said of the summer and autumn campaign which followed, although the commander or commanders—for it seems there were two, governor Call and general Jesup—had the benefit of the knowledge of the country and the enemy, acquired by previous operations; the benefit of the roads recently opened; the plans which had been essayed and suggested; longer time for preparation and operation; an auxiliary Indian force, which was denied me, and, above all, the power of inviting the enemy to surrender, and of holding negotiations.

With this great power, Mr. President, I was not armed. My instructions were to reduce the enemy to UNCONDITIONAL submission; to hold no parley, no negotiation—not even to say, as the price of surrender, that kind treatment might be expected, much less that the beneficial stipulations in the last treaty in favor of those Indians should be carried into execution by the United States; because, sir, any such assurance, on my part, would have been a condition.

Have my successors in Florida the "diplomatic" faculty that was withheld from me? If the letter-writers in the newspapers are to be believed, that faculty has been either expressly conferred, or usurped with impunity. It would seem that wheedling messages have been sent to the enemy by every body, from the two commanders down to a captain. Still, no great result has been obtained, and now another or winter campaign has been for some time on foot; the sole director of which, besides all the advantages over me which have just been enumerated, has had, from the beginning, the further prospect of ending the war by the failure of the enemy's ammunition, and the known want of long perseverance on the part of all Indians.

But notwithstanding all those advantages it would seem that, up to the last dates, not a Seminole had been sent out of Florida since I caused four hundred to be shipped from Tampa Bay. These, it is true, were called friendly Indians; yet, if it had not been for the awe inspired by the presence of the army, and some little decision on my part, this detachment would long ere this have been merged in the great body of the nation.

But to take up my personal movements, my arrangements, and operations in the chronological order.

Being in Washington in January, 1836, on other duties, I was on the 20th sent for by the secretary of war. I found him in his office at 4 o'clock, P. M. I was asked when I could set out for Florida, and answered, that night. I was told that my instructions could not be got ready for me so early.—All the letters (four in number) from gov. Eaton and general Call, dated the 8th and 9th of the same month, and now in evidence, had, I think, been just received. I foresaw at once all the difficulties and hazards of the service which was thus assigned to me, and an immense pecuniary loss that I should inevitably sustain if not in New York in a week from that time. I had, moreover, the highest confidence in the judgment and abilities of general Clinch, independent of his better knowledge of Florida and of the enemy to be combated. I mention these circumstances, Mr. President, to show that I did not solicit to be sent to supersede that excellent officer. I was not, however, as a soldier, at liberty to decline any appropriate duty that might be required of me, and, of course, did not decline this. Accordingly, I left Washington in the night of the 21st, and, notwithstanding an accident on a rail road, by which I lost twenty-four hours, this court will find me addressing a requisition to the governor of South Carolina on the 29th from Columbia, and at Augusta the 30th.

At this place my occupations were numerous and important, as my letter book, the contents of which are mostly in evidence, will show: requisitions for troops addressed to the governors of South Carolina, Georgia and Alabama; letters to the governor of Florida, to generals Eustis and Bull, col. Lindsay, &c. &c. besides horses and wagons purchased for the United States cavalry and the general baggage train.

On the 2d of February, it has been seen that I set out for Milledgeville, in order to confer with the governor of Georgia, according to my instructions, on the subject of the Creek Indians. Having adopted precautionary measures in relation to the latter, I returned to Augusta, and reached Savannah the 9th.

Here, again, I was incessantly occupied in regulating, by correspondence, the movements of the troops, and making other arrangements for the campaign, till the 20th, and might have been usefully there so engaged for a week longer; but wishing to be nearer to generals Clinch and Eustis, with a view to more rapid communications, I reached Picolata on the 22d of February.

At this time gen. Clinch was at Fort Drane, with about 500 regulars and volunteers, unmolested by the enemy, but not in strength to take the field with any prospect of advantage. I had written to him from Savannah, and he knew of the heavy reinforcements which were approaching. Two companies of Augusta volunteers, under captains Robinson and Bones, had already reached Fort Drane, and are included in the above force. These two companies did not, strictly, make part of the Georgia quota.

Gen. Eustis, col. Brisbane's regiment of South Carolina foot, and a company of Columbia volunteers, under captain Elmore, all arrived, by water, at St. Augustine about the 15th. This independent company (Elmore's) was over and above the quota called for from South Carolina; but, like Robinson's and Bones', it went through the campaign with zeal and distinction.

With the volunteers under his command, and a few companies of regulars, gen. Eustis soon gave tranquillity and confidence to all the inhabitants between the Atlantic and St. John's, whose dwellings and other fixtures had not been previously destroyed. No devastation was committed after his arrival.

The first battalion of Georgia foot, under major Cooper, had also preceded me a few days. I found it at Picolata, with a company of regulars, and col. Bankhead in the command of both.

It was my intention, Mr. President, to have remained but a few days at Picolata, merely long enough to organize the service, to give a fixed plan of campaign, and, on the arrival of some additional troops, wagons, horses and arms, to have commenced operations. The court has seen, in part, what embarrassments kept me there no less than fifteen days.

The 22d of February I received, through general Clinch, the letter to him from gen. Gaines, dated at New Orleans the 2d of the same month, proposing a plan of co-operation between the two generals; which letter confirmed the previous rumor, that a large force was to be expected at Tampa Bay from New Orleans, and to this letter there is a postscript, by gov. Eaton, saying that a battalion of 250 Floridians would sail in two days from St. Mark's, for the same destination. To prevent too great a concentration of troops at Tampa, I instantly, by express, desired gov. Schley to keep at home the second battalion of Georgia foot that was about to proceed by the Chattahoochee, Appalachicola, and the gulf to that point. Fortunately my letter reached his excellency just in time to prevent the movement. That battalion was discharged; and but that it was too late, I should have taken a similar step in respect to the Alabama regiment, which col. Lindsay had received my instructions to raise and conduct to Tampa.

To show the apprehensions which gen. Gaines' letter excited in me at the time, and the temper in which I spoke of his movement, I beg leave, Mr. President, to embody an extract of my letter to gen. Clinch, dated the 25th of February:

"The movement from New Orleans, although highly worthy of praise, under the circumstances, [the massacre of Dade's detachment, and general Gaines' necessary ignorance of the measures of government], may, if it should lead to a premature advance from Tampa, be productive of a result the most unfavorable. If the advance, for example, should fail to crush the enemy, and terminate the war—and, without mounted men, I suppose such result can scarcely be hoped for—the enemy may be scattered and put upon his retreat to the south east. To follow him, in such retreat, might be almost impracticable, and to prevent the escape in that direction, col. Lindsay has my instructions in detail."

The court has seen, Mr. President, how soon those prophetic apprehensions were accomplished! Of course, I had not the time to communicate with gen. Gaines and col. Lindsay, to whom my instructions had been addressed, arrived at Tampa after the advance of that general.

The very next day, after the above was written, and whilst I was in the act of reporting to the adjutant general, for the information of government, among other difficulties, the means I was devising for sending further supplies to Fort Drane, I received from gen. Clinch a letter enclosing one from general Gaines, showing that the latter was actually at Fort King on the 22d, where he arrived without subsistence, and instantly, as Clinch reported in his letter, called for "nearly all the provisions at Fort Drane, intending, with that supply, to return to Tampa, across the Wythlacoochee, near the battle ground of the 31st December! I shall, in the sequel, notice the evidence which shows that general Gaines knew at Pensacola that I had been ordered to Florida, and that he learned of gen. Clinch, before leaving Fort King, that I was soon expected, and with large reinforcements.

Before the receipt of those despatches, I knew that there were, at Fort Drane, about 20,000 rations for men, and expecting to send thither and to Fort King, in a few days, by wagons and boats, (through the Ochlawaha), two or three times as many rations, I had, on the 24th, put major Cooper's battalion of Georgia foot in march to join gen. Clinch, intending to follow with the first company of mounted men that might arrive, and one was then daily expected. Those means of land and water transportation, however, not being as yet at hand, all hope of early operations was now frustrated, and I was obliged to recal major Cooper's battalion, then distant two days' march over a wretched road, as it was easy to subsist the battalion on the St. Johns, and infinitely difficult to do so at Fort Drane.

The same embarrassment (the arrival of the troops at Fort King from Tampa) caused me to issue the order No. 4, and to write the letters of February 26, and March 1st to gen. Clinch. He, however, had no means of sending either of those papers to gen. Gaines, who, I think, had marched from Fort King, (twenty miles from Fort Drane) on the 25th of February. March 2d, I learned with great distress that the Ochlawaha could not be used for transporting supplies.

From a few months' disuse, this narrow, crooked, and shoaly river had become obstructed by fallen timber, and the Indians had, at Payne's landing, near Fort King, destroyed the peculiar boats expressly constructed for that navigation. We were now reduced to the necessity of using only land transportation for about seventy tons of supplies, and over bad roads, and I had not ordered all the wagons and horses which I should have required, but for a reliance, to some extent, on that river.

A summary of my embarrassments in respect to the means of transportation, the court will find in the fifth paragraph of my letter to the adjutant general, dated March 9th. Of the ten or fifteen wagons therein mentioned, and which I learned, officially, at Savannah, were ordered to be shipped from Baltimore, by the quartermaster general, in January, it seems by the deposition of capt. Dim-mock that two of them had reached Florida in February, six about the 11th of March, and two got to Savannah about the 4th of May.

As early as the 26th of February, I had, however, requested gen. Clinch to send down all the means of land transportation he could command. The train sent arrived at the point opposite to Picolata the second of March, was loaded with about 16,000 rations, and other essential supplies, and despatched for Fort Drane the 6th. The delay in this operation was caused by the width of the river, and the violence of a long storm, which rendered it hazardous, and, a part of the time, impracticable, to pass over the supplies to the wagons. The train was slightly augmented by wagons and horses which had arrived principally from Charleston, via St. Augustine.

As a proof of the extreme tempestuousness of the weather, major Gates, with a battalion of three companies of regulars, was, at this time, more than eight days in coming from Savannah to Picolata, in a good steamer, which ordinarily made the trip in less than three days.

A company (Kenan's) of Georgia mounted men arrived opposite to Picolata the 26th of February. With this company I had intended to march immediately to Fort Drane; but, with the exception of its gallant captain, 2d lieutenant Huson, and (I think) nineteen men, it refused to be mustered into the service of the United States, and returned home. Four other companies of the first battalion of Georgia horse arrived about a week later. One of them, (Allen's) with the exception of two or three privates, followed the example of Kenan's company. Douglass', Malone's and Sweeney's, from the first, showed better dispositions. These only I was enabled to see, having at the hazard of life, crossed the river in the storm for that purpose; when, after a short harangue, every man came under the rules and articles of war with loud cheers. The well disposed men, both of Kenan's and Allen's, generally joined those companies which entered the service, and it is due to the disaffected of Kenan's to say that, having seen their error, every man, I believe, nobly served in the subsequent campaign (against the Creeks) under captain Gaither. It is probable that many of Allen's men did the same.

The 2d of March, I received, through general Clinch, general Gaines' letter to him, dated the 29th of February, and not another word did I hear of the troops with the latter general till the 9th of March. During this interval—nay, from his arrival at Fort King, the state of my mind, or generally my embarrassments may be inferred from the efforts to hasten the train loaded with subsistence, and from my orders and correspondence, which are in evidence, on the subject of gen. Gaines' movement.

The 26th of February, I wrote to gen. Clinch—"I have heard with equal astonishment and regret that major general Gaines, without reference to my movements, perhaps in ignorance, possibly in defiance of them, should have made a premature movement from Tampa Bay, and, having arrived within twenty miles of Fort Drane, should have called for nearly three-fourths of the subsistence in deposit at that place, and on which I had relied for the movement of the right wing, in concert with the other parts of the army."

"To remedy this unexpected embarrassment, I send you two copies of orders No 4, one of which you will despatch to the commander of the detachment from Fort Brooke, (Tampa Bay) whoever he may be with all speed, and limit the subsistence called for from Fort Drane according to the intention of those orders."

"Major general Gaines, I presume, will have heard of the order which ought to take him to the Mexican frontier; if he should prefer to remain, he must obey my orders."

Order No. 4 (of the same date) directs that general Gaines' detachment should remain at Fort King until further orders; that current subsistence only should be issued to the detachment; directs that the peculiar boats, believed to be at Payne's Landing, should be sent to Picolata, (or to meet a steamer at the mouth of the Ochlawaha,) to receive subsistence; if the boats could not be sent, the troops were to march without delay, to Volusia, on the St. John's whither 20,000 rations were about to go up in a steamer; and the detachment was enjoined not to attempt any offensive movement, except so far as might be necessary to carry into execution those my orders.

March 1st, I again wrote to general Clinch: "I regret in every point of view, the premature and unauthorized movement from Tampa Bay, by that general, [Gaines], and the very awkward and responsible position he has placed himself in by his subsequent march from Fort King." "in any event, the responsibility of his movement, or actual position, is his own; for he must have known as early as the 10th ultimo, if not before, that I had been charged with the general direction of the war in Florida, and that, by interfering, he constituted himself an interloper. Even if you had sufficient stores and means of transportation, I should command you to send no subsistence to him, unless to prevent starvation; but you have neither. Let him, therefore, in time extricate himself from the embarrassment he has placed himself in by marching upon Volusia, where I have no reason to doubt that 20,000 rations, sent hence, on the 27th ultimo, have safely arrived. As he appears to have his retreat open to him, or, in no peril, to prevent his taking that step, you, of course, will make no detachment to join him."

This letter is an answer to one received by express and which enclosed general Gaines' communication to general Clinch, dated the 28th of February.

In a third letter, that I caused to be addressed to general Clinch, March 2d, he was told: "If major general Gaines should fall back upon Fort King, or Drane, it is presumed that he will proceed to execute the orders of the government, which will carry him to another quarter. In that event, you will be the senior officer, and I am instructed by major general Scott to say that you are at liberty to detain the troops from Fort Brooke (Tampa) at either of the forts mentioned—Drane and King. Subsistence will reach you in five or six days."

A fourth letter on this subject, in part, was addressed by me to gen. Clinch, dated March 4th, in which it is said:

"I still presume that major general Gaines will be obliged to fall back upon Fort Drane, which increases my anxiety to send the wagons, with some additions, loaded. I would prefer, much, that the force brought with him were back at Tampa Bay, or, rather, that it had not marched from that place; provided that the movement fails to crush the enemy or to terminate the war. The worst result, next to the loss of that fine body of men, or a third of it, would be the mere success of driving the enemy into the lower country, where, I suppose, it would be almost impossible for us to follow; I mean, below the waters of Charlotte harbor. Hence my indignation that an isolated attack should have been made, from your vicinity, well calculated to produce that result, and at a time when you knew, and major general Gaines must have known, through you, (and before), that my plan, with ample means, was to move simultaneously upon the Wythlacoochee, in three columns—from Tampa Bay, the upper crossing on the Ochlawaha, and Fort Drane; so as to make it impossible for the enemy to escape into the lower country."

"I have not yet supposed that maj. general Gaines has not his retreat, upon Fort Drane or King, perfectly in his power. On account of subsistence, if he can cut his way through the enemy of Tampa Bay, I much prefer that his force were there; and when I wished him to march, or send that force to Volusia, it was because it could be infinitely more easily subsisted there than at Fort Drane. Should he, however, be in any difficulty in operating a retreat from the Wythlacoochee, I certainly wish you to afford him any succor that the slender means within your reach may allow; and this, doubtless, you would render without any special permission to that effect. If the force return to Fort Drane or King, it must be subsisted for at least five or six days upon means derived from this place, [Picolata], whence I now prefer that it should become a part of the right wing, [your command], rather than take that quantity of subsistence, [from you], and march back to Tampa Bay."

And, finally, I caused a fifth letter to be written to gen. Clinch, March 6, in which will be found this paragraph:

"Major general Scott is exceedingly anxious to hear the result of the operations on the Wythlacoochee. The last intelligence from that quarter (through you) was only to the 29th ult."

My reports on the same subject, addressed to the adjutant general for the information of government, dated at Picolata, the 26th and 28th of February, March the 2d and 6th, are to the same effect, all showing the embarrassments and delay which the isolated movement from Tampa upon Fort King and the Wythlacoochee caused in my plan of combined operations.

In the notes of the 28th of February, after recapitulating many of the facts already brought into view, among them the arrival of gen. Gaines at Fort King with 1,140 men, without bringing more rations than sufficed for his march, although he came from Tampa, where the amount of subsistence was great, after noticing his having drawn from Fort Drane nearly all the food for men collected there, together with the baggage train necessary to transport that subsistence to him at Fort King, and which train, in the whole, had been required at Picolata to take further supplies to Fort Drane, the point the most difficult to supply in or about the whole theatre of operations, I add:

"It will be seen from the foregoing, that, to re-establish my plan of campaign, viz: to move simultaneously from Fort Drane, (or Fort King), from Volusia and Tampa, say about the 8th of March, the great difficulty will be to send supplies for the right wing, [Clinch's command], and the bad road from Picolata to Fort Drane, 65 miles, has, by a heavy rain, which has now been falling 46 hours, been rendered infinitely worse."

In the report of the 2d of March to the adjutant general, I said:

"By reference to the map, it will be seen that, even if major general Gaines could succeed in driving the enemy from the Wythlacoochee, there is no force to prevent the retreat below Charlotte harbor, or to any point in the lower [part of the] Peninsula. A small guard only was left [by him] at Tampa; col. Lindsay will not be in position in time, and gen. Eustis cannot cross the Ochlawaha earlier than the 13th or 15th instant. The retreat, it will be seen, is therefore open to the Indians. In this point of view then, it would be better for the public interests that the Indians should drive general Gaines, than that he should drive them. The war, in fact, would be forwarded by his being forced back upon forts Drane and King. In truth, according to his own showing, he ought to have fallen back on the evening of the 28th, or the morning of the 29th [of February]. The lives which he has lost have promoted no end. He must, I think, still fall back, and I wish to heaven that it may be without further loss. Brig. gen. Clinch, from his present want of wagons, can send him no efficient aid, and the wagons cannot be back [from Picolata] in four or five days. If the force with major general Gaines were now back at Tampa Bay, it would be in its true position; but he cannot retreat thither, for it will be seen by his letters [enclosed] that he has not the means of passing the river [Wythlacoochee]. He found the enemy where all my arrangements presumed the enemy would be found, and in the position the most favorable to us."

And on the 6th of March, I again write to the adjutant general, on the same subject, thus:

"No intelligence has been received of the movements of maj. gen. Gaines, of a later date than his letter of the 29th ultimo, a copy of which has been forwarded. He cannot, therefore, have marched upon either Fort Drane or King, or have fallen back upon Volusia. In either case, I should, doubtless, have received a further report of him from brig. gen. Clinch. It may then be hoped that he has beaten the enemy, or at least have succeeded in effecting his return to Tampa Bay. In this state of doubt and anxiety, I know not how long I may have to remain. Yet it is important that I should speedily learn what has become of his column; and particularly whether the position and number of the enemy have been materially changed by its operations."

"I send no more troops for the present to Fort Drane, on account of the difficulty of subsisting them there. If maj. gen. Gaines shall not fall back on that point, it will be indispensable to wait for captain Wharton, [with his company of United States dragoons]. In the mean time it is easy to subsist the forces here and at Gary's Ferry."

The 9th of March I reported to Washington as follows: "I have just set out for Fort Drane via Gary's Ferry, on Black creek, [just established as an army depot] with two companies of regulars, [foot], and intending to take with me from the latter place the small battalion of mounted Georgians (heretofore mentioned) under the command of maj. Douglass. Lieutenant colonel Bankhead is at the head of the first detachment, and the two together may make a total of about 240. But even this small force may be important to rescue maj. gen. Gaines. I had not received the slightest information of the operations on the Wythlacoochee (official or otherwise) of a later date than the 29th ultimo, up to this morning, and had concluded that he had effected his march with more or less success against the enemy upon Tampa Bay, when at daylight, the steamer that I am now in arrived, and brought the rumor, which is confirmed by the two accompanying notes from paymaster Lytle, received about six hours afterwards. On the reception of the rumor I immediately commenced preparations for this movement; but being delayed by the necessity of unloading and relading the boat, I am now at anchor at the mouth of Black creek. I hope to put the troops in march from Gary's Ferry early in the day of tomorrow, and to reach Fort Drane with a small escort the day following. It is possible that even these little detachments of horse and foot may reach the Wythlacoochee in time to render a valuable service."

The parts of major Lytle's notes relative to this subject are: on the 5th of March he writes to me, "I have been directed by general Clinch to inform you that your communication of yesterday's date reached him at this place [Fort Drane] after he had mounted his horse and was on the move with the forces under his command, to escort supplies to general Gaines." * * * "Colonel Gadsden arrived here from Tallahassee on the 4th, (yesterday), and accompanied general Clinch this morning to the Wythlacoochee." And major Lytle says, "on the 8th, by direction of general Clinch I opened your communications of the 6th instant, which arrived late last night in advance of the wagons, [from Picolata, loaded with subsistence, &c.] You will perceive by the letter of the 5th, that general Clinch, with all the forces at his post, and one hundred mounted men from the vicinity, had left for the Wythlacoochee to escort a small supply of cattle, ammunition, &c. to general Gaines, having received the night before a third express from that officer. No word has been received from either of those generals since the 5th." * * *

"N. B. The amount of general Gaines' last express to general Clinch, dated the 3d instant, was merely copies of his previous letters, with a note stating that the Indians were still around him, but little or no fighting had taken place since his last communication;" that, it is presumed, of the 29th of February.

I beg the court to observe that those two notes of major Lytle, as has been shown in evidence reached me "at the same moment" at Picolata, about meridian, on the 9th of March.

I shall proceed to give further extracts from my report to the adjutant general of the same date, (March 9th).

"I am aware that the movements I am making may be condemned, if regarded in any other light than a rescue, as premature. In war, one false step drags after it many others. General G. made an isolated and unprovided movement. He arrived at the Wythlacoochee without boats, and without tools to construct them; without the means of transporting wounded men, and with limited subsistence. General C. was soon obliged to march to succor him, and I followed, under the impression that I might have to rescue both. Colonel Goodwin's mounted regiment [of South Carolinians] only arrived at St. Augustine last night, (or this morning), and consequently the left wing [general Eustis' command] cannot be in force on the Ochlawaha, in the direction of Pelakkehaha, earlier than the 17th, or up with the enemy before the 20th instant. Colonel Lindsay, who may already have arrived at Tampa Bay, cannot operate more than two days march from that place, from the want of the means of transportation—major general Gaines having taken away the horses which were there; and the basis of the right wing [Clinch's command] is merged in the force brought by that general [Gaines] into the field, and must participate in his success or failure. If it falls back with him on Fort Drane, it must suffer great loss, and if it follow him to Tampa Bay, it [the basis of the right wing] will be wholly out of position."

"In this, and even in a greater state of uncertainty, I have been held since the 26th ultimo.—The day after, I ordered back major Cooper's battalion of Georgia foot, to prevent starvation at Fort Drane; and though daily, from that time, in the expectation of receiving from Savannah horses and serviceable wagons, not one has arrived. The quantity of subsistence that will be at Fort Drane, say to-morrow, will only be that sent from Picolata on the 6th instant, viz: 17,497 rations of bread and flour; 11,000 rations of pork, (with beef-cattle in the neighborhood), 8,000 rations of beans, some coffee, vinegar, &c. &c. and the troops now about to proceed [with me] perhaps as far as the Wythlacoochee will not have the means of taking with them rations for more than six days [extra]."

"I beg leave to recapitulate the causes of my great deficiency in means of transportation: 1. The wagons and horses which I knew brigadier general Clinch to possess early in February have been more broken down by hard service and bad roads than I had expected to find them. 2. I had, upon what was considered in Georgia, and even at Picolata, the best information, confidently relied upon the use of the Ochlawaha, as late as the 2d instant. 3. No bacon has arrived, and the difference between it and pork, including wood and brine, is fifty per centum against the latter. 4. The [two] horse wagons purchased at Charleston and Augusta, by assistant quartermasters L'Engle and Peyton, are generally poor, and many of them unserviceable. 5. The six or ten wagons actually reported to have been shipped at Baltimore, in, I think, the Arctic, with major Gates, were all left behind. 6. Of the 19,000 rations, known to be at Fort Drane about the 25th ultimo, nearly the whole have been drawn by a force not expected by government or myself to appear in that quarter; and 7. Not a horse for the baggage train, left by me at Savannah, or which I have since ordered to be purchased by assistant quartermaster Dimmock, has arrived in Florida."

"Instructions have been left behind me to send forward rations, should the means of transportation arrive in time and the troops already in the neighborhood of Picolata—major Cooper's and the remaining company of major Gates' battalion. I have also desired brigadier general Eustis to order to Fort Drane two companies of colonel Goodwin's regiment, and a further order will go back in this boat to lieutenant Dimmock, on the subject of horses and wagons."

"Some rifles and the tents arrived this morning at Picolata; but colonel Goodwin's regiment had marched, through six or eight storms, without cover, and now all companies in march are to be reduced to three tents each."

The following is the postscript to the foregoing report:

"Please remark that, in his letter to brigadier general Clinch, dated at New Orleans, the 2d ultimo, major general Gaines speaks of 'an efficient co-operation,' promises to be 'in readiness,' at Tampa Bay, by the 8th of the present month, (February) to form a junction at or near that place, with your (Clinch's) command, whenever, and as soon as, in your judgment, your force shall be sufficient to justify the movement, and concluded by saying—'A sufficient quantity of ammunition and provisions has been transported to Fort Brooke [Tampa] to divide with you, until further supplies are received. Yet he did not wait till the brigadier gave notice that he was 'in force;' came to Fort King, and swept nearly the whole of the subsistence collected at Fort Drane. A copy of that letter is in your [the adjutant general's] office, and I now enclose one from governor Eaton, from which it will appear that major general Gaines knew, at Tampa Bay, about the 14th ultimo, that I had been charged with the direction of this war. He first heard this at Pensacola, and received governor Eaton's despatch at Tampa, as I can establish. Hence his haste and neglect of the assurances given to brigadier general Clinch, his isolated attack," &c.

Mr. President—I am not, nor desire to be, the prosecutor or accuser of major general Gaines, either before this or any other court; nor before the public. In respect to the latter tribunal, I have not published, nor caused to be published, a word against any human being whatever, or even a word in self-defence, since, at the latest, I was ordered to Florida, unless, indeed, two simple notes of explanation may be regarded as exceptions; the first in May last, on the subject of a term hastily, and, I may say, accidentally, applied by me in an official report to the volunteers I then had the honor to command; and the second, written for publication a few days past, repudiating certain language which I saw myself reported as having applied, before this court, to a high political functionary. If many of my official reports, written in the field, and transmitted for the information of government, have, at Washington, been printed in whole, or in part, the act was done, in every instance, without my knowledge, or the expression of the slightest wish to that effect. The officers of my staff, sir, so far as I know or have seen, have been equally silent.

And what outrages have I not suffered from the publications of others during this period of silence? I shall speak in this place only of major general Gaines. I complain not that he and his staff should occasionally fill up a column or two of the newspapers in praise of the hero of Camp Izard. But what right or justice was there in the outbreaks against me on the part of that chief, on the Wythlacoochee, at Tallahassee, Mobile, and I know not at how many other places? All these effusions of spleen, whether in the form of orders, speeches or letters, have been carefully obtruded on the public. I have heard of many of those melancholy exhibitions, but have only read one—the order of the 9th of March, turning over the immediate command of the troops on the Wythlacoochee to brigadier general Clinch. It is, without any immediate agency of mine, in evidence before this court. In that paper I am very facetiously denominated "the officer charged with the diplomatic arrangements of the war department," approaching, as it is obliquely intimated, only to receive the formal surrender of that enemy whom he had, without a sortie, most strangely, but happily, conquered or subdued!

It has been seen, Mr. President, in every form, that this was a slight misapprehension, to which the enemy were by no means a party; and that no military or diplomatic blunder of mine was necessary to resuscitate a war that had not then, nor has yet been terminated. It would be superfluous to quote the evidence. It abounds on the records of this court, and, what is worse, it yet abounds in unhappy Florida.

The judge advocate has read in evidence, furnished for this purpose by the war department, the official reports written by me at the time, for the information of government, in several of which major general Gaines' movements are mentioned. Those particular reports, in common with the others, it was my right and duty to make, being charged, at the time, by seniority of commission and special assignment, with the chief direction of the war against the Seminole Indians. Several passages of that part of the testimony have already been embodied in this summary, to show how far I was, in my plans and operations, hindered, crippled or defeated by the movements of that general. Without departing from the strict line of defence that I have prescribed to myself, and which, no doubt, this court would otherwise have imposed, it remains for me to show that major general Gaines, in his operations in Florida, so far as they embarrassed mine, constituted himself an intruder; that is, that he came into the field in his own wrong.

It has been seen Mr. President, in what terms of praise (in my letter to general Clinch of the 25th of February), I bore my humble testimony to general Gaines' movement from New Orleans, provided, that in violation of his express assurance previously given to Clinch, that he would wait for a junction with him at or near Tampa, it did not lead to a premature advance into the interior. But I then did not know the fact so cleverly disclosed in captain McCall's letter, republished in the Army and Navy Chronicle, ("whole No. 84") which has been verified, and is now in evidence.

Captain McCall was at the time with general Gaines, and his acting assistant adjutant general. He says in his letter, that "on the route, and within two days' march (by steam) of the Indian borders, he (general Gaines) received a notification that general Scott had been ordered to repair from the city of Washington to Florida, and to take command of the troops operating against the Indians in that quarter." At the same time, he [general Gaines] was informed that "the state of affairs west of the Mississippi might soon require his attention, if not his presence, in that quarter," and he was directed to "await further orders in the city of New Orleans."

The point "at two days' march by steam," from Tampa Bay, was evidently Pensacola, where, we know by governor Eaton's letter, above noticed [incidentally] that general Gaines touched, on his way from New Orleans to Tampa Bay. But the captain argues in the same letter, and, no doubt after general Gaines, that, had the latter, "obeyed the order [received at Pensacola] and by so doing left general Clinch in expectation of a promised co-operation, to extricate himself as he could from any difficulty into which the failure on the part of gen. Gaines in preconcerted movements might peradventure have thrown him, [Clinch] it is difficult to say whether the historian would have approved or condemned general Gaines." But we have seen, and I have probably already assigned the true motive, that the "promised co-operation" and "preconcerted movements" commencing with "a junction at or near" Tampa, was not observed by gen. Gaines.

The captain's letter continues—"and, without general Gaines, the volunteers [the Louisiana regiment] his principal force, were unwilling to proceed; for, before they left New Orleans he had pledged himself to accompany them whithersoever they went, and to stand by them," &c. &c. These again are evidently general Gaines' own pretexts for his intrusion.

First. The unwillingness of the Louisiana regiment to proceed without gen. Gaines to command it.

Finding at this place captain Thistle, who commanded a company in that corps in Florida, from some day in February, to the end of its term of service, I caused him to be interrogated on this point. To my third question he answered—"For my part, when I was raising the men for my company, I did not know there was such a man as gen. Gaines in the country. Col. Smith and [lieutenant] colonel Lawson I understood were to command. I speak only in reference to my own company, my own officers and men. When at Pensacola, I never heard any thing of the kind mentioned, nor did I ever hear there that general Gaines was about to leave us. When we got acquainted with general Gaines the officers and men were well pleased with him."

"Question 4. Did your regiment, as far as you know, obey with equal cheerfulness every officer of superior rank, whether of the regulars or volunteers?"

"Answer. They did so. I never heard the least murmur, neither among the officers or men, nor the first word of dispute. They were always ready to obey orders, both with the regulars and volunteers, from all officers placed over them."

The same disposition on the part of the regiment may be inferred from the letter of its commander, colonel Smith, to captain Shannon, dated at Fort King, Feb. 25th. In this the writer says:

"I find it is general Gaines' intention to go down to Tampa Bay by the scene of general Clinch's fight, and then to quit Florida. I would wish you to say to gen. Scott that, if he thinks my regiment can be of use to his operations, I would rather remain with it in Florida than go back without having seen a fight; though to tell the truth, I would rather have the fight before the grand army comes up. I should like, therefore, before we can be shipped back from Tampa Bay, to be ordered on some active duty by general Scott."

(Colonel Smith has been summoned as a witness, at my instance, but has not arrived.)

Who, Mr. President, would infer, from the spirit of this excellent letter, that the patriotic Louisiana regiment was a body of vassals, who only owed allegiance or service to a particular chief? or, rather, who would not affirm that it continued in the field to the last moment, and, in the language of captain Thistle, "always ready to obey orders, with regulars and volunteers, from all officers placed over them?"

(The deposition of Mr. Dyer, the commissary and quartermaster of the Louisiana regiment strongly supports what is said under this and the next head.)

The other pretext, as we learn from captain McCall's letter is—general Gaines had pledged himself to accompany the Louisiana regiment, &c.

It seems, from captain Thistle's testimony, that the corps was raised, in part, and that arrangements were in progress to complete it (no doubt by his excellency governor White) as soon as the news of the massacre of major Dade had reached New Orleans, and before it was known that general Gaines was in that part of the country. Colonel Smith's letter equally excludes the idea of a pledge. He speaks of general Gaines' intention of returning to Tampa, and thence embarking for New Orleans, and the wish of himself and regiment to remain.—The pledge, therefore, seems to have been a mere gratuitous flourish, made without any moving consideration, without acceptance, and without being known or remembered in the regiment. The troops, both regulars and volunteers, might very well have proceeded from Pensacola to Tampa Bay under colonel Smith, who was fully qualified to direct and command them. In this way, sir, I show that general Gaines came upon the theatre of operations as an intruder, and in his own wrong.

In my report of March 14th, I said, for the information of government, that "I have every reason to hope that the enemy remain nearly in the same position as before the isolated and, therefore, false movement of major general Gaines." An adroit and faithful negro spy, the same who had "been sent over the river" by general Gaines for a like purpose, was again despatched to ascertain the correctness of the impression so reported; but this spy never returned. We afterwards learned that he fell under suspicion, and was confined. The impression, however, was universal in the right wing, (with which I marched) up to its passage of the Wythlacoochee, as is stated by captain Thruston, the very intelligent chief of general Clinch's staff. This witness says: "I did not entertain a doubt myself that the enemy was still concentrated about the Wythlacoochee, where I believed, and think it was the impression of others who had the best opportunities of information, that the women and children were there placed by the enemy for security; that they would defend the passage of the river with all their force, as they had done when threatened by general Gaines," (and it might have been added, when previously approached by general Clinch—Dec. 31st) "I heard no other supposition than that there we should be resisted, and that there the principal battle would be fought. That impression continued with me and others, and I believe generally throughout the wing, until our advance had landed on the opposite bank. I will mention, in support of this opinion, the fact, that one of our men (a black wagoner) was cut off by a small party of Indians, said to be five, within eight miles of Fort Drane, on our first day's march."

According to my report, dated the 12th of April, and the testimony of captain Thruston, general Clinch's column, with which I marched to Tampa, passed the Wythlacoochee (that stopped general Gaines) with but little molestation; that we entered and scoured the Cove, the enemy's strongest hold, to its head, as we believed at the moment, and without encountering a force of more than 130.—Indeed, in the whole period of my operations, as may be seen by the written reports made to me by Clinch, Eustis and Lindsay, and of mine to Washington, neither of those principal commanders, under me, at any time, met with a larger body of the enemy at any one place—that which attacked colonel Lindsay's column, on its last return to Tampa Bay, excepted, and which was estimated at about three hundred. By the term principal commanders, just used, I, of course, do not mean to include the officers who respectively commanded the two small posts established in the interior, denominated Forts Alabama and Cooper. These, from the enemy's perfect knowledge of his own most difficult country, and his consequent facilities of concentration, were reported to have been repeatedly attacked, and by several hundreds each time.

It has been further shown, in evidence, that the many columns and detachments under my orders traversed an immense space in a short period, and visited many of the enemy's favorite haunts and strongest holds, and I now read this passage from my report to Washington of the 30th of April:

"I am more than ever persuaded that the whole force of the enemy, including negroes, does not exceed, 1,200 fighting men. It is, probably, something less. Of that force, I am equally confident that not 500 have, at any time since the commencement of hostilities, been brought within the same ten miles square. In all our operations, within the last thirty days, [known to me], we have not found a party of probably more than 130; but parties of from 10 to 30 have been encountered almost everywhere. No Indian woman, child or negro, nor the trace of one, has been seen in that time. Those non-combatants, it has been evident to us all, have been removed beyond the theatre of our operations. They were, no doubt, even while the parley was going on with gen. Gaines, on the 7th of March, moving off to the south east, beyond Peas creek and lake Topkelika, and in that almost inaccessible region they are now probably concealed. That officer, it is said, caused Powell and his chiefs to be informed, by way of inducing them to accept the Wythlacoochee as a temporary boundary, that large armies were approaching, which would fill up the Indian country, and crush every thing in the way. The wily chiefs profited by the information, sent off their families, and dispersed their warriors into small parties. In this way, Powell expects to make good his threat, viz: that he would protract the war for three years."

Except on the supposition of this extract, how was I, Mr. President, to account for our not finding, three weeks after general Gaines, any considerable body of the enemy? He supposed himself to have been surrounded, in his breastwork, with his 1,000 or 1,100 men, by 1,200 or 1,500 warriors.—What had become of them? He certainly killed but few, and captured not one. Whence, then, the subsequent dispersion? My supposition is rendered more than probable by captain Hitchcock's letter to the hon. Mr. Lyon, M. C. dated Fort Drane, March 11, 1836, since published, and now in evidence. In this letter, the captain says, "a staff officer (himself) was, at Fort Izard, sent out by general Gaines to hold a parley or negotiation with the hostile chiefs," and "in the plainest language to tell them the exact truth as to the force ordered into the country to subdue them; that additional force was expected every day; that the time was near when every Indian found with a rifle in his hand would be shot down. This was communicated with such explanations as were deemed necessary to give it force," &c.

And what, sir, were the objects of that parley, or, "diplomatic" transaction? It seems, according to the published letters of captains Hitchcock and McCall, "that the Indians did not wish to fight any more, but they wanted him [general Gaines] to retire from the Wythlacoochee;" and, in the general narrative of captain Thistle, under a question put by the court, this witness said: "Captain Hitchcock and another officer (adjutant Barrow) went out and held a conversation with them [the Indians]; they inquired particularly as to our situation; whether we had provisions, and whether we had brandy and tobacco; they said they could supply us with provisions in abundance; that we could fish on the river bank, if we chose, and that they would fight no more if they were permitted to keep the opposite side of the Wythlacoochee, making that river the boundary."

Was this the language of a subdued people, humbly suing for peace? They had commenced the war without owning an acre of ground in Florida: they had ceded every foot. The time had arrived for their emigration to the west. Sooner than quit their natal soil, they had appealed to arms; they had massacred a detachment of a hundred men; they had held their country, notwithstanding the gallantry of Clinch and his handful of troops on the 31st of December; they had even held general Gaines himself, with his strong and excellent column, penned up under their fire from the 27th of February; they had, in short, glutted their revenge, conquered the country up to the left bank of the Wythlacoochee, gained all they wanted, and felt themselves in strength to dictate the terms of peace. Hence the overture to make the Wythlacoochee the future boundary—to treat on the basis of the ultimopossidetis—each party to hold what it possessed; and, accordingly, we find capt. Hitchcock instructed to reply, on the part of gen. Gaines, "that if they would engage to cease from all acts of hostility, retire south of the Wythlacoochee, and promise to attend a council when called upon by the United States commissioners, they should not for the present be molested." Just at this critical moment, gen. Clinch arrived with the needed succor, and we hear of no farther negotiations!

Well, sir, general Gaines now left the theatre of operations. Near Micanopy he met colonel Bankhead's column coming up, and, as the latter has testified, said, "You may go on, colonel, there is nothing to be done now, it is all finished." His order of the 9th of March, boasting, among "the important objects" he had "accomplished," that "the principal force of the enemy had been beaten and forced to sue for peace," preceded or accompanied him. His progress towards Tallahassee and Mobile was one continued triumph. But, it may be asked, what had all this self-felicitation and those public gratulations to do with my operations? This, Mr. President, is precisely what I am about to show.

It will be remembered that two of the columns, those of generals Clinch and Eustis, of the army under my command, respectively, from Fort Drane and Volusia, arrived at or near Tampa Bay on the 5th and 6th of April, and the third, or colonel Lindsay's column, returned from the interior about the same time. All, much harassed and worn by long and fatiguing operations, looked to this great southern depot for the supplies and refreshments so greatly needed to enable men and horses to return to the field. To give some idea of what we were here doomed to experience, I will recall parts of my official report, written at Tampa the 12th of April, for the information of government, and which report has been given in evidence by the judge advocate.

"My disappointments on the Gulf have been as great as those experienced on the St. John's. The latter were pretty fully reported at the time, &c.

"Please now to refer to my joint letter to the quartermaster and the commissary at New Orleans, dated at Savannah, February 14, and acknowledged on the 20th of the same month. A copy was transmitted to you for the information of the proper departments at Washington. The letter, it will be seen, is both specific and urgent. Yet, instead of my finding here about 50,000 rations of hard bread and about 90,000 rations of bacon, I found but 12,740 of the former, and 21,600 of the latter! Not an additional ration of either has arrived since I came." (Both the quartermaster and the commissary here, alluded to, I have caused to be summoned as witnesses, and neither has appeared.)

"Colonel Lindsay (the report continues) had required for the use of his column, of the quartermaster at New Orleans, a number of wagons and horses, and not one has been sent. Again, the sutler (the person next in importance to the quartermaster and commissary, with every army) left this place more than a month ago for New Orleans, to bring back with him a large supply of goods for the troops which were expected (here). These supplies are exceedingly wanted by every officer and man. But the quartermaster writes that he hesitates about sending the wagons and horses, and the sutler that he declines sending his stores, because each has heard of general Gaines' triumphal entry into Tallahassee—in consequence of his having finished the war! It is presumed that the commissary at New Orleans stopped the shipment of hard bread and bacon for the same reason." (This presumption is now fact, as shown by the testimony of captain Thistle. Lieutenant Morris, who, at Tampa, had the letter from his brother, the sutler, confirms what was stated by me, in the report of April 12th, in respect to the sutler's stores. See on this point the testimony of cols. Lindsay and Bankhead, and for the sufferings of both officers and men, from the want of shoes, shirts, light garments and groceries, see the testimony of colonel Lindsay, Mr. Depeyster, and captain Thistle. In respect to the want and non-arrival of wagons and horses at Tampa, see testimony of colonel Lindsay, the letter of captain Shannon, (chief quartermaster) the deposition of Mr. Newcombe, late of the army and quartermaster at Tampa, with the letter of the quartermaster at New Orleans to him annexed). My report of the 12th of April continues:

"Capt. Green, of the cutter Dallas, was at Tallahassee when maj. gen. Gaines arrived at that place. He had been ten days soliciting permission to go and make a survey of the mouth of the Wythlacoochee. On renewing his application to some one of the territorial government, he was told the war was over. We have now to make the survey for the expedition that has been mentioned [which sailed under maj. Read the 17th or 18th of April]. These are new disappointments and vexations I have been doomed to experience."

This statement, given in the report from memory, has been fully sustained by the testimony of captain Green before this court, with this important addition; the captain would probably have ascended the river, having provided the necessary means.

But, Mr. President, to a question put by the court, gen. Clinch replied, "I am of opinion that the movement of gen. Gaines' command through Florida did not materially affect the operations of maj. general Scott."

Sir, no one entertains a more sincere respect and regard for this most excellent commander and citizen than I do, and I am sure the whole army regrets his retirement to civil life. His opinion is always entitled to great weight, and hence, mainly, the overwhelming facts which I have just embodied, and which otherwise I might have left scattered over your voluminous documents and minutes, to be remembered or hunted up by the court.

It is, moreover, evident to me, Mr. President, from the reply to another question, also propounded by the court, that, on the point of interference with my operations, the sound mind of gen. Clinch was too much influenced, at the moment, by the narrative he had so recently given of the neglects shown him by the war department prior to the time when I had the misfortune to be ordered to Florida. It is true, if his repeated calls for troops and supplies, and his wise admonitions on the temper early manifested by the Seminoles, had received but half the attention due to his position, this still raging war might never have burst upon the country. Under this ruling idea, the witness could see nothing but the imputed errors of the war department. Whilst that was on the throne of his mind, all the subsequent and minor causes of failure in sending the Indians out of Florida sunk into comparative insignificance. Be this as it may, I put in concurrence with the isolated opinion of gen. Clinch, on the subject of general Gaines' interference with my operations, the great body of facts already detailed, and the opinions of witnesses of no less intelligence and respectability. See the deposition of colonel Gadsden; the chief of my staff, who had marched with gen. Clinch to the succor of gen. Gaines, and who knew more of Florida and the Seminoles than perhaps any three individuals with the army; and see the testimony of col. Bankhead, who marched with me from Picolata to Fort Drane, where he came under the command and continued with general Clinch. The strong opinions expressed on this point by the two colonels, like the opposing one given by gen. Clinch, were all elicited without a question put by me.

The point which has thus been rather more fully discussed than I had, until lately intended, was, however, but the second cause of the failure of my operations to send out of Florida the great body of the Seminole Indians, and there were many other causes, besides the first in importance, some of which have already been partially, though but incidentally developed. It is now my purpose to bring rapidly the whole, in the same connexion, under the review of the court.

Of these causes, many, as will be seen, are closely united, and in the descending scale, consequent upon each other. For these reasons, the analysis and the enumeration will, in some instances, be rather difficult.

1. The lateness of my orders, 12 o'clock in the night of January 21, with notice the day before to hold myself in readiness, and the short term of service of the great body of the troops.

I do not mean to say, Mr. President, that any time was lost by the war department in putting me in motion after the news of Clinch's affair of December 31, which preceded at Washington the account of Dade's melancholy fate on the 28th. Nor shall I stop to discuss the question, why had not stronger measures been taken on the receipt of Clinch's warnings and calls for reinforcements, beginning in January, 1835, and reiterated October 8, October 17, December 9, and December 16, of the same year.

Well, sir, the court has seen that I was promptly at Augusta, where I completed my calls for volunteers or draughted men; two regiments from South Carolina, one of horse and one of foot; the same from Georgia, and one of foot from Alabama, at 740 men per regiment, making a total of 3,700. A fine spirit was abroad in those states, and great exertions made in each to supply its quota. Yet, from many unavoidable causes—the immense spaces to be traversed, and others which I will not stop to enumerate, but not one of which can be charged to me—instead of finding myself in force, at Picolata and at Tampa Bay, as early as the 29th of February, as I had originally flattered myself that I might, I arrived in Florida on the 22d, much in advance of three-fifths of those troops. Only the foot of South Carolina and seven companies of Georgia had preceded me. The Georgia horse began to arrive about the end of the month, the three companies before mentioned, and another on the 10th of March, under captain Nelson, who had made an unparalleled march from the north west corner of Georgia. I ought, in my previous narrative, to have stated that this fine company joined at Gary's Ferry, and added about 70 men to col. Bankhead's little column, which set out with me for Fort Drane. The same day col. Goodwin's fine regiment of South Carolina mounted men reached St. Augustine over a long road, through rain and mud, and, like Nelson's company, without tents, and without a murmur. The Alabama regiment under col. Chisholm, and major Read's battalion of Floridians, arrived at Tampa Bay, with col. Lindsay, between the 1st and 10th of March. (It has been seen that this battalion had not been called for by me, and that it went to Tampa Bay without my knowledge at the time, and against my wishes; and that the second battalion of Georgia foot was, in accordance with my request, never furnished. Finally, six companies, instead of four, to make up for the defection of the first two, of Georgia horse, arrived at Gary's Ferry, via Middle Florida and Fort Drane, about the 10th of April, whilst I was at Tampa. These six companies were, nevertheless, mustered into service in accordance with instructions I had left behind, and immediately afterwards discharged, by the advice of major general Macomb, who then happened to be at Picolata.)

All the volunteers called for by me were mustered into service for only three months, according to the instructions I had received from the war department; and I suppose that the president of the U. States has no authority to require the services of militia by draughting for a longer period.

It has been seen that I was not in force to commence combined and efficient operations earlier than the 10th of March, and by this date the mass of volunteers, owing to the different periods of arrival at the several places of rendezvous, and consequent acceptances by muster, had only about 60 days to serve. This was the same thing nearly in a system of combined operations, requiring the services of the whole, as if none had had a longer time to serve; and all had been from home, with slight differences, equally long.

But let not these movements of the volunteers excite a smile to their prejudice. The delay in their arrival on the St. John's, as I have said, was unavoidable, and there was even a greater delay in the approach of three companies of regulars which were ordered to embark at Baltimore in the dead of winter, and with the mercury in the thermometer several degrees below zero. This battalion was delayed by ice in the Chesapeake, I know not how many weeks, and finally reached Picolata on the 6th of March. With all the lights of the quartermaster general, ten wagons were ordered to be purchased and shipped from Baltimore about the same time. Six came to Florida as late as the 11th of March, two earlier, and two in May! Now, if I were expected to make long marches through a savage country, without roads or bridges, why could not those three companies have been marched to Norfolk, or even to Wilmington, and thence embarked? Time would have been saved in either case. And why were not the wagons shipped from some port not obstructed by ice? Again, a detachment of United States dragoons, under capt. Wharton, that received orders for Florida at New York about the 24th of January, was delayed several weeks in that harbor, waiting for its arms and horse furniture, and joined me at Fort Drane, (after a short passage to Savannah), 60 days from the reception of these orders! There was no delay from the want of horses. They had been purchased by my orders, and placed at Savannah as early as the 12th of February.

Let it be remembered, Mr. President, that those shipments and movements were not made under my directions; yet I was advised of them, and suffered embarrassment from not earlier receiving the troops and wagons.

I have said that I was by the 10th of March, in sufficient force to commence operations, and that the mass of the volunteers had then about sixty days to serve—a part more and a part less. This period was rather more than was necessary for the marches and operations actually made under my orders, but wholly insufficient to enable us to scour the country south and east of Peas creek, (the everglades), even if the lateness of the season, the sickness of the climate in those regions, as early as the end of April, and other causes, which will be noticed, had not interposed insurmountable obstacles. I ought, therefore, to have given me any prospect of success, to have been ordered to Florida several months earlier, and with a force of a much longer term of service. He who now directs the war in that quarter, besides other advantages, has had more time for preparation, a better season for operations, more regular troops, and volunteers of a longer period of service.

In respect to volunteers for ninety days, the testimony of gen. Eustis and col. Lindsay is strongly in support of what I urge on this point.

2. The unexpected intrusion of gen. Gaines.

This was the second cause of my failure, both in point of time and importance.

Now, although I considered myself in strength on the St. John's and at St. Augustine, to commence forward movements as early as the 10th of March, the court will please remember that my general plan of operations was to move at the same time, as nearly as practicable, from Fort Drane, Volusia and Tampa, upon the great body of the enemy supposed to be about the Cove of the Wythlacoochee; to march, in person, with Clinch, and to give instructions to Eustis and Lindsay so far as to deviate from that approximation of the three columns as to pursue any considerable body of the enemy, or any considerable fresh trail that might be discovered. Hearing of general Gaines' intrusion, and seeing that a consequent delay was inevitable, I called back a detachment already in march to join Clinch, and through the latter caused Lindsay to be advised of that delay, least he should make an isolated movement. And general Clinch has testified that a forward movement could not have been made, from Fort Drane, earlier than the 26th of March, (the day on which he actually moved), for two reasons: 1st. To give time for the troops which had been shut up in Camp Izard, with general Gaines, to recruit themselves, and 2d. To enable the last train of wagons sent to return from Gary's Ferry with the subsistence. The answer to the second question put to captain Thruston shows, more in detail, the reduced condition of those troops. Here, then, was the cause of a considerable delay—from the 10th to the 26th of March—less the time necessary to march from the St. John's to Fort Drane; and Eustis, in the mean time, instead of being forced to Volusia, which was to become his base of operations, was employed in scouring the country between the St. John's and the Atlantic, as far as Tomoka and Volusia. Lindsay was advised of this further delay. The court, too, has seen that it was my intention, on the 9th of March, to strengthen the right wing by troops drawn from the left, if gen. Gaines' detachment had not fallen back on Fort Drane.

3. Insufficient means of transportation.

This cause of failure in my operations has, like the one just noticed, been pretty fully developed in the former parts of this summary. I shall therefore, only remark, in this place, that the means of land transportation would have been nearly sufficient, notwithstanding the intrusion of gen. Gaines, if we could have used the Ochlawaha for about seventy tons of supplies (as I had expected to do) up to the 2d of March; and that those means, even without the use of the Ochlawaha, would have been sufficient by the 12th, but for that intrusion. The necessity of replacing the subsistence drawn from Fort Drane by general Gaines; of providing for a larger force than was expected there; of transporting articles of subsistence fifty per centum heavier than those I had early and specifically called for, both from the St. John's and Tampa, caused our wagons to be overloaded, the horses to be overworked, and many of both to be broken down. The court will further remember who took from Tampa the means of transportation which were there early in February, and what prevented the arrival of new means from New Orleans.

4. Insufficient supply of hard bread and bacon for marches.

On the 21st of January, in his office, the commissary general of subsistence and myself fully concurred as to the advantages of hard bread and bacon over flour and pork, on marches. Ten days after, in a letter to the adjutant general, I recurred to this subject, and required on the St. John's (at Picolata) large quantities of both hard bread and bacon, which passage of my letter, according to request, the adjutant general duly communicated to the commissary general before the 10th of February, as the former reported to me on that day.

Now, it is shown by the testimony of Mr. Locke, who was the assistant commissary at Picolata, that the quantity of hard bread which had arrived prior to the march of Clinch's column from Fort Drane, and of Eustis' from Volusia, was much less than was wanted for those columns, although I had prohibited the issue of hard bread to the troops when at rest on the St. John's. The deficiency was made up, of course, in flour, of which, and of pork, our supply was abundant; and the testimony is express, that not a pound of bacon reached the St. John's from the commissariat, earlier than the 15th of April, when all the columns were near the Gulf of Mexico.

Though much embarrassed on the St. John's, and the march to the south, by the want of those particular items of food, as the court has seen, I have always been unwilling to suppose that the chief of the commissariat was in fault; and am now, since hearing read, before this court, his instructions to the agents of his department on the subject, yet more unwilling to impute blame to him. His merits are acknowledged by the whole army, and I am free to declare that I have never known a better man, or a more faithful public servant. The failure in the particulars stated, was, however, not the less embarrassing.

Well, sir, the army, early in April, was compelled to give up for the moment, the search for the enemy and to march upon Tampa Bay to seek for supplies. The court has seen what orders I had given to the assistant commissary at New Orleans, in respect to this depot; the large quantity expected, and the small quantity of hard bread and bacon found there, and that that little would not have been equal to three or four marches of the army, if col. Lindsay had not brought with him a small quantity from Mobile.

On this point, the testimony of lieutenant Morris, the then commissary at Tampa, is more explicit than even that of general Eustis and col. Lindsay. And the reason why more of those items of subsistence had not been sent from New Orleans, is also pretty fully shown in evidence. The then commissary, at the latter place, was duly summoned to appear here, and has not arrived. Mr. Locke stated, in his testimony, that the difference in weight, owing to the brine and wood necessary to the preservation in warm weather of pork, is fifty-one per cent. against the latter in favor of bacon. This difference is known to most marching officers, and that, between the ration of eighteen ounces of flour and twelve of hard bread, is evident to all the world.—To have been obliged then, as we were, to take with all the columns, in their several marches, nearly two-thirds of our whole subsistence in the heavier articles, was the same thing as if a large portion of our otherwise deficient means of transportation had been captured or destroyed; and even this was not the only evil consequent upon that necessity, as will be presently seen.

5. Heat of the climate—badness of water—sickness.

From the lateness of the season into which we were thrown, from the causes already stated, we found the heat, even before the 20th of April, so oppressive that the troops could not execute even ordinary marches, from this cause alone. (Testimony of Clinch, Eustis, Lindsay and Thruston; also, col. Smith's report of his expedition up Peas creek). The troops had still to wear their winter clothing from the non-arrival of sutler's goods at Tampa from New Orleans; the sink holes or ponds, on which both men and horses had generally to rely for water, were now, many of them, dried up, and in the others the water was tepid, besides being filled with vegetable matter and animalculæ.—(Testimony of Clinch, Eustis, Thruston, &c.) Add to these causes of distress and disease, the swamps and hammocks which were traversed; the deficiency in bacon, to which the volunteers had very generally been accustomed at home; and the necessity all were under the greater part of the time when in march, to eat unleavened dough, partially fried with pork, or half baked before camp fires, and it will astonish no one to learn from the testimony that we had very many individuals, officers and men, who could neither ride nor march. The only resource was to crowd them into wagons; for, in a savage country, we could leave no one behind.

6. Forage and grazing.

At St. Augustine, and on the St. John's as high up as the depot at Volusia, there was, on the requisitions of general Eustis and my own, upon lieutenant L'Eagle at Charleston, and lieutenant Dimmock at Savannah, an abundant supply of both corn and hay, and there was no positive deficiency in forage round Fort Drane. At Tampa we again found an abundance of corn and hay, with a small quantity of oats, all supplied in compliance with my requisition (as I suppose) upon the quartermaster at New Orleans. The corn, however, was generally bad, having, probably, been sweated on board of vessels. The good was mostly consumed at Tampa, during a rest to recruit the horses, of eight or ten days at that place. The portion issued for renewed operations, was generally the refuse, which killed some horses and injured more. (Deposition of Mr. Newcombe, and testimony of capt. Thurston).

The grazing in the interior, as all the witnesses questioned on that subject have testified, furnish but an occasional and a slight resource. Hence the court will not be surprised that general Eustis caused every cavalry horse with him to be led by his owner on foot the last sixteen miles of the march from Volusia upon Tampa Bay. The grazing was but little less bad on the return marches.

But, it may be asked, why not have taken more corn with the columns from the depot which furnished that which was good? If our trains had been doubled, a sufficient supply could not have been transported even if there had been good roads. Let any gentleman make the calculation for himself to see how many wagons would be required, for example, to take corn enough for a thousand horses for twenty days, including the consumption of the draught horses so employed, and he will be astonished at the result. Again: why not make every rider put three bushels of corn in his saddle, and lead his horse for seven or eight days? Regular cavalry may be compelled to do this; but I know of no power of persuasion that can induce any body of volunteers whatever, unless it be under the highest calls of patriotic interest, thus, in their own estimation, to degrade themselves. I made the proposal, and although I commanded at the time corps of horse composed mostly of gentlemen of the highest spirit and devotion to country, I was advised not to issue an order to that effect, as it could not be enforced, although I pledged myself that I would do what I wished to require of others. I then reduced the quantity of corn to be so taken, in my order No. 28, and it is in evidence that considerably less, about an average of three pecks only, was actually put on each horse. And this court will readily conceive that the transportation of hay into the interior for the consumption of even two days, was wholly out of the question with marching troops, as well on account of its bulk as its weight.

From the foregoing circumstances it resulted that all surviving horses arrived at Tampa in a bad condition, and returned to the north of Florida in a worse, as is shown by the evidence.

7. Roads and bridges.

The only road within the theatre of our operations was that made by government, connecting Fort King with Tampa Bay. This road was very partially followed by all the columns under my command. Its three bridges were destroyed by the enemy at the commencement of hostilities. All the other routes were opened by the columns as they marched, and the streams roughly bridged at the same time. These labors were difficult and incessant, as may be supposed, and has been shown in the testimony of Eustis, Lindsay and Thurston.

8. Want of an auxiliary Indian force.

The court has seen by my order No. 13, (March 14), that I called for 500 friendly Creek Indians, to be commanded by gen. Woodward, major Watson, and major Flournoy. The first two have been summoned here, on this and another important point, but have not arrived. The third early fell in the Creek war. Col. Gadsden's deposition shows the importance of such force; and my successors in Florida have had the benefit of the suggestion. It was denied me by the agent of government, and that denial not even rebuked by the secretary of war. See major Hogan's letter to that functionary, and his reply, dated, respectively, March 28 and April 12. For the standing and qualifications of the two majors, named by me to bring on the Indians, see governor Eaton's letter to me, dated March 7, and general Clinch's notes of introduction. General Woodward is too highly distinguished, both as a commander of, and against, Indians, to require a word of support in this place; and it will be seen, in the agent's (major Hogan's) letter to me, dated the 1st of February, that he thought he could, "in ten days, raise [me] 1,000 warriors, and be on the march to join" [me].

9. Want of guides.

Eustis and Lindsay, as shown by their testimony, had no competent guides, and could obtain none.—Clinch's column was rather less badly provided in this respect, yet he had not a guide who knew any thing of the intricacies of the Cove—a Cretan labyrinth, held from the knowledge of the white man, as the sacred groves of the Druids were interdicted to all but the initiated. In short, all the difficult parts of Florida were, to the whole army, one terra incognita. Government gave me no topographical information, nor had any to give; and the booksellers' maps only afforded outlines, filled up with unlucky guesses.

10. The limited time for active operations.

From preceding causes, and deducting the time unavoidably lost at Tampa, the columns of Clinch and Eustis were actually in the field, beyond Fort Drane and Volusia, only about twenty-two days.

The testimony of both Clinch and Thurston shows that I could not have put the right wing in operation, from Fort Drane, earlier than I did (the 26th of March), and Eustis, with the left wing, crossed the St. John's, at Volusia, about the same time, to approach the Cove, by the way of Pelakle-kaha. Clinch, with his wing, was compelled to return to Fort Drane on the 25th of April, the term of service of a part of his volunteers having already expired, and, as he reports to me, the 27th—"Men and horses much exhausted by sickness and the heat of the weather. Another day's march would have occasioned the abandoning of a part of the train. Fifteen horses and mules died on the road, and eight more turned out that could not be got along by leading."

Eustis, with the left wing, (which I accompanied from Tampa) was in like manner, and very much in the same condition, compelled to return to Volusia on the same day—April 26th.

Colonel Smith who had, with his regiment, the Louisiana volunteers, been detached by the way of Charlotte harbor up Peas creek, about the 12th of April, returned to Tampa the 26th, and embarked for New Orleans, according to orders, where the regiment arrived, I think, a little after its term of service had expired.

The battalion of Floridians sailed from Tampa, about the 17th of April, for the Wythlacoochee, on its way to St. Mark's, where it was discharged. I do not know when this battalion was mustered into service.

The centre column, under colonel Lindsay, which at first included major Read's battalion, arrived by steam from Mobile, at Tampa, was the first of the three columns, under my orders, in the field. On the 15th of March he put himself in movement, established the post on the Hillsborough, 23 miles from Tampa, called Fort Alabama, as a place of deposit, and advanced towards the Cove as far as Chichuchatty, which he reached about the 24th—the letter, advising him of the delay in the movements of the two other columns, having reached him subsequently.

This column, consisting principally of the Alabama regiment of volunteers under col. Chisholm, and several times changed in its other parts, was also the latest in the field, by a few days. By my orders, No. 88, of the 16th of April, colonel Lindsay was instructed, on his return to Tampa, after my departure, to make any further movement, within the compass of his forces, in the prosecution of the campaign, that might be deemed useful, and then to cause the volunteers with him (the Alabama regiment and an independent company of Louisianians, under captain Marks) to be embarked for their respective homes. That embarkation was commenced by him, according to his report, May the 2d—"the rainy season having set in," and it being deemed "impossible to keep the field with bodies of troops, without great, and for any object that could be accomplished, a wanton waste of life."

Thus terminated, Mr. President, active operations under my command; and if from the causes assigned, without decisive results, at least without defeat or check, as without dishonor.

In my report of the 12th of April, from Tampa, I spoke in terms of high commendation of the three principal commanders under me—Clinch, Eustis and Lindsay. Each continued to the last to deserve greater praise than it is in the power of one, under my present circumstances, to bestow. I also had the benefit of colonel Gadsden's assistance, the chief of my staff, a volunteer in the war, a soldier and a patriot, who, independent of his particular knowledge of the enemy and the peninsula, of his services with me and on prior occasions, is endowed with talents and virtues which give him high claims upon the government and country. The handsfull of regulars who were with me in the field never faltered in difficulty or dangers; and if, now and then they yielded the post of honor, it was purely in compliment to their countrymen fresh from civil life, who were cherished and assisted on every occasion. Those patriotic volunteers of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana and Florida, were no doubt (many of them) sometimes inefficient from the mere awkwardness of inexperience; but they very generally brought with them to the war high chivalry, which always inspires the wish of personal distinction, and this was frequently and nobly obtained by individuals and detachments.

On the principal commanders and the troops which were under me, I have then only to invoke the approbation of their country. Let its censure, through this court, fall on me, and me alone, of that army, if all were done which it was possible to accomplish under the circumstances.

Some questions, Mr. President, were put to as many witnesses of the higher ranks who have appeared before this court, to ascertain whether I had failed in any particular as a commander in Florida, in point of judgment, zeal or personal conduct.—The answers were direct in every instance, but too complimentary to be here reproduced. Let them sleep on your records. They may, hereafter, perhaps be read by those who will not be made to blush for their parent.

A word, sir, as to my plan of campaign. I believe that this has been sufficiently developed in the evidence, and embodied in this summary. It has been censured by a writer, himself an old officer, and who delights to see himself in print, as being somewhat European, as if it were criminal to import professional knowledge, and who seemed to think that generals ought to make war without plans of any sort. This vulgar error has been incidentally but too signally rebuked by an eminent military critic and political functionary, to be further noticed in this place. I shall, therefore, here simply quote the opinions of two younger, but better soldiers, on the particular plan of operations by me laid down and pursued.

After exploring the country to a great extent, and learning much that was new of it, and the enemy, general Clinch says to me in his report (April 17th) of his operations returning from Tampa Bay, "that the true plan of operations against them [the Indians] will be that first designed by you, that is, by a force from Pelakle-kaha, a force ascending by my [late] route, and a corresponding one on the north side,"—his first route. This, the court will perceive, was the precise plan laid down by me for our first operations.

Captain Thurston, who, I knew, in March, at Fort Draue, did not altogether approve of the plan of campaign I was about to follow, and with whom I did not again converse on the subject, was, when before this court, at a venture, asked by me this question:

"17. The witness became acquainted with the general plan of operations projected by general Scott. With the benefit of the witness's subsequent knowledge of the enemy, and the country occupied by him, what is the witness's opinion of that general plan of operations?"

Answer. When I first heard general S. detail his plan of operations, I thought that he had taken more than necessary precautions, by advancing into the country with three columns, from different points of the peninsula, not doubting that our wing [Clinch's] of the army would be met by the enemy in force on the Wythlacoochee. Nor did I believe that a nation of 5,000 people could conceal itself so effectually in the peninsula, south and east of the Wythlacoochee, that they could not be found by one army [column or wing]. My subsequent experience taught me my error, and to consider gen. Scott's plan of operations as the true one."

But, Mr. President, it has been objected to me that, in my first operations, (towards Tampa Bay), I held the troops in masses unnecessarily large—of 1,800, 1,700 and 1,200 men, respectively. Of this I myself early became persuaded. But in connection with this point the court will please look at that part of colonel Lindsay's testimony, detailing the remarks and advice he gave me at Augusta, at the end of January, 1836. I regret that I am obliged to abridge it in this place. Col. Lindsay had served with major general Jackson against a part of the same Indians in the campaign of 1818, the "principal object of which was (according to the witness) to drive the Seminoles from the Georgia frontier," across the Suwanee; that "gen. Jackson carried into the field a force amounting to, perhaps, 6,000 men." This was said in answer to my 8th question. To the 6th the colonel had previously said, "the country east of the Suwanee is infinitely more impracticable than the country west." He adds many striking differences, all against our troops, and it is known that general Jackson's operations terminated on the west bank of that river. In respect to the advice given on the subject of detaching, the witness said, "I believe I mentioned to gen. Scott, that I derived that advice from gen. Jackson, who, on some occasion, when I wanted to go on detached service made use of this emphatic expression: 'sir, I never detach against Indians.'" And again, in the same campaign, gen. Jackson observed to the witness, "that he never detached, or suffered small parties to march through the Indian country." The court will please to bear in mind the official relation that subsisted in January, 1836, between general Jackson, col. Lindsay and myself; that I never had been in the interior of Florida; that

gov. Eaton, in his letter to me of February 3, 1836, speaking of the hostile Seminoles, said: "Their numerical force cannot be less than 3,000, probably more;" that colonel Lindsay has testified, in answer to my 27th question, what must be evident from the surface of the country, that, from dispersion, the enemy had great facilities of concentration, that I had seen, before the columns advanced from Fort Drane to Volusia, by general Gaines' letter to general Clinch, dated the 29th February, that the writer supposed himself to have been surrounded in Camp Izard, by "not less than 1,500" warriors, and that, although he had from a thousand to eleven hundred good troops with him, I saw that he could neither pass the Wythlacoochee, nor venture to make a sortie. All these considerations induced me, Mr. President, to hold the troops under my command, in three columns, until I could feel my way a little, and judge for myself. When I had satisfied my mind that there were not, in all Florida, more than 1,200 Indian warriors, probably less; and that, of that force, perhaps not 500 had been concentrated at any time in the war, the court will find that I then became a little bolder, and detached, freely, and far, in all directions; and it is gratifying to recall that, notwithstanding all the bugbears by which I had been for a moment frightened from my bent, not a disaster—not one defeat ensued. I speak, sir, of detachments beyond supporting distance; for all the columns were habitually subdivided within that limit in searching for and in attacking the enemy.

The first of these distant detachments was that of 340 men left under major Cooper, only twelve miles south of the Wythlacoochee, and which gallantly maintained itself from the 2d of April till the 18th, when it was absorbed on the return of Clinch's column. Major Cooper commenced a work for defence, but the enemy gave him no leisure to complete it. Gen. Eustis, approaching Tampa, brought his mounted men to the depot, but left his foot, from the 5th of April to the 18th, at Camp Shelton, under brigadier general Bull, sixteen miles in the rear, without even a breastwork for its defence.—With the same body of foot, I myself marched to Fort Alabama, whilst the South Carolina horse, under colonel Goodwin, was on the distant service of searching for the enemy, about the head of Peas creek. At the same time, colonel Smith, and his Louisiana volunteers, fit for duty, (about 200) with small parties from the U. S. ship Vandalia, under lieutenant Powell, and from the revenue cutter Dallas, under captain Green, scoured the lower part of that creek to the extent of about 60 miles from Charlotte harbor. Colonels Smith and Goodwin thus visited what we had supposed to be among the favorite haunts and strong-holds of the enemy. I, myself, the 20th of April, with a single company of South Carolina horse, marched from the Big across the Little Wythlacoochee; again, the 24th, with but two companies, I went to Volusia, a day in advance of Eustis' column; sent a small detachment the 25th to scour the country east of Spring Garden lake, and personally proceeded, with colonel Gadsden, captain Canfield and lieutenant J. E. Johnson and seventeen men, in a miserable little steamer, to explore the St. John's river to the head of Lake Monroe. Gen. Clinch and colonel Lindsay also made detachments about the same period, and I had detached major Read, with the battalion of Floridians, by water, to search the lower Wythlacoochee, as early as the 17th.

As this last expedition was the only one made under my command that failed to reach the destination given, and to accomplish its objects, and for that reason alone, has brought upon me infinite obloquy, I beg the court will pardon me for dwelling upon it a moment.

It has been seen by the deposition of Mr. Newcombe, the quartermaster at Tampa, in April last, that by extraordinary exertions on his part, and not a little energy on mine, ample, and even extra, means were provided for maj. Read's small battalion of, perhaps, about 200 men. First, there were two large and one smaller schooner; two (instead of one) cutters, under midshipmen Reid and Drake, manned and furnished, at my request, from the U. S. ship, Vandalia, captain Webb, a large scow, in pieces, with mechanics, nails, oakum and pitch, so as it might be put together, and launched in two hours, many ship boats or yawls, and piLOTS. The deponent, an experienced and excellent officer declares, in respect to the sufficiency of these means, both for transporting the troop to the mouth of the river, and for ascending it—"I did not doubt, nor do I know that any body else did—I do not think major Read himself doubted, although he attempted to find fault with the means." (See also col. Gadsden's second deposition).

But let us now see, what use was made, by the major, of the outfit thus furnished. I shall quote his report to me, which is dated April the 27th, being himself near the mouth of the Wythlacoochee, he says:

"I despatched all the small craft to the transports, with orders to the officers in command aboard of them to commence debarking the men as fast as possible."

"On the return of the boats, transporting, as I had ordered, as many men as they could receive, the morning reports of the officers in command were handed to me, by which the frightful picture of an increase of forty, (40) to the sick list in less than two days was presented. Special communications from the surgeons were also handed me, in which the most horrible consequences were predicted, unless the men could be taken forthwith to some place where medicines and good water could be procured. The water on board the schooner Caroline, it was said had already become putrid. Without going a board, I despatched an order for [the transports to] hoist all sail, and to proceed with the utmost possible despatch to St. Marks, the nearest port, I remanded aboard the detachment first ordered to debark, and directed a select number of ten to join me on board the small craft for the purpose of making the reconnaissance and surveys, which I find, upon perusing my order more carefully than at first I did, were the principal objects of the expedition."

"When informed by the pilot that we were almost at the mouth, I went myself into the second cutter of the Vandalia; it draws less water than the other, taking with me only two of my detachment."

"When I had gotten over the bar, I proceeded some two miles or upwards, to within a short distance of a large smoke, the fire that afforded which, was, perhaps, three miles distant. I deemed it not prudent to go farther, and caused the boat to return." When the major proceeded to St. Marks after his battalion.

Here, I will not say, Mr. President, why all this fire and haste? But I may ask, sir, whence all this smoke and precipitation? Some parts of the report are doubtless, as obscure as others are strange. For example: When the major heard of the new cases of sickness, how many well men were left? He does not tell us. The water, too, on board of one of the transports had suddenly become putrid, and the medicines deficient. How so? Why not have gone on board, in order to inquire into these extraordinary matters in person? And was there no good water in the other vessels, or in the Wythlacoochee, at the farthest, within nine or twelve miles, at the falls? We have seen that there were many well men remaining, ten of whom he retained with him, and sent back others in the boats which had brought them from the transports. Why not have retained all these, and have sent for more, to enable him to ascend the river in his smaller vessels, scow, &c. In that case, he might have passed through the "large smoke," and have reached the falls. But the major appeals to his "order," and I shall exhibit both his instructions and orders.

By my directions, col. Gadsden, on the 14th of April, gives to major Read, in a letter of instructions, among other matters to be attended to, these: "You will embark with your whole battalion, including invalids and sick, for the mouth of the Wythlacoochee; that you come to anchor in the nearest and safest accessible harbor to the mouth of the stream, and that you proceed, with your effective force, (leaving your sick and invalids on board), with the boats at command, to examine its entrance, and to penetrate as far as practicable, and consistent with the security of your command," &c. &c. "You will preserve notes of your observations and report," &c.—"detailing, minutely, the character of the anchorage at the mouth of the Wythlacoochee; the navigability of that river for boats, the probable distance to which it may be penetrated; the character of its banks, and the facilities, generally afforded for the forming of depots, with a view to supplying an army operating hereafter on or near its waters. This duty performed, you will proceed to St. Mark's, Florida, in the transports, where your command will be honorably discharged." &c.

Mr. Depeyster, a gentleman of Florida, and then a volunteer in general Eustis' staff, has said before this court, that he was at my quarters the day before, (the 16th of April), major Read embarked, when that officer called on the subject of his expedition. The purport of this witness' answers, as the court will perceive is, that two days after the written instructions to major Read, I endeavored, in the most impressive terms and manner, to point out to him the importance of the expedition to ulterior operations; called his attention, specifically, to the necessity of examining the river, and making a sketch or draught of its soundings and course, up to the foot of the obstruction or falls, believed to be twelve miles; and that I desired major Read to select a point, for a future post, with reference to wood, as near those falls as practicable.

In respect to every object, except the mere entrance into the Wythlacoochee, we have seen that the expedition was a signal failure.

The first knowledge that I had of this most unexpected result was received May the 1st, at St. Augustine, through a letter from governor Call, dated April 26th, and which gave me the more astounding intelligence, viz: "A few days since, I received a communication from major McLemore, stationed on the Suwannee frontier, informing me that, under orders from general Scott, he had ascended the Wythlacoochee river, and erected a block house on the south bank, some ten or twelve miles above its mouth, and that he had left a garrison of 40 men in the block house, and a large quantity of corn and pickled beef. This morning, at daylight, major Read, of the Florida battalion, arrived at [Tallahassee], bringing the intelligence that he discovered at the mouth of the river one-half of a large flat boat, which had been cut in two, apparently with a dull axe, and by an inexperienced hand. His description corresponds with that given of the boat left at the block house," &c.

As this letter was addressed to me, or the commanding officer at Fort Drane, like the report, dated April 11, of the establishment of the block house, and signed by major McLemore's adjutant, (McCants), both papers were read by general Clinch, and together transmitted to me, then at St. Augustine. I have said that I received them on the 1st of May.

The court has seen, Mr. President, the correspondence between general Clinch, then at Fort Drane, and myself, on this most painful subject. The time of his volunteers having expired, or being about to expire, he had already sent most of them home, and, in his attempt to raise a party of mounted men in the Alachua settlements to go to the relief of the block house, he utterly failed. I early became satisfied that gen. Clinch, under the circumstances, did all in his power in adopting the second suggestion of governor Call, viz: "But should it be impracticable for you to send a sufficient force, by land, to ascertain [the fate of the party in the block house] I have ordered a fortified boat to be in readiness at Suwannee Old Town, to proceed with a part of the men at that place to the relief of the garrison, and transport it back to Old Town, unless the commanding general should otherwise direct. You will, therefore, be pleased to send an express to major McCants, commanding at Old Town, and inform him whether troops have been sent by land to the relief of the block house, or whether the boat which will be in readiness shall be sent on that service." General Clinch sent the order for the boat to proceed, and the detachment in the block house was ultimately taken off by major Read, and without firing a gun.

It is in evidence that maj. Read's report to me, (of his first expedition), though dated the 27th of April, came to hand at Columbus (Geo.) as late as the 8th of June, when I had not leisure to give attention to it, even if it had been less illegible, and thus it happened that I never knew its contents until, with some accidental assistance, the judge advocate made out to decipher it before this court. The last paragraph of his report appears to be as follows:

"I discovered at the mouth of [Wythlacoochee] the half of a flat bottom boat, a common ferry flat boat it appeared to have been. It had been cut asunder," &c. "When I arrived at St. Mark's, I learnt, to my astonishment, mortification and regret, that your excellency [general Scott] had ordered major McLemore to establish a depot at that place," &c. "All which was studiously concealed from me. I did not learn, either from your order, or from the numerous interviews I had the honor to hold with your excellency, that major McLemore was even in the field, much less that I was going to relieve a detachment of his command ordered out by your excellency."

The court has seen in my report upon this subject to the adjutant general, dated at St. Augustine, May 11, which was founded on governor Call's letter noticed above, and an article in a newspaper, handed to me as the production of major Read. I said that he (major R) "has at Tallahassee, caused a statement to be made, declaring that I had refused him permission to ascend the Wythlacoochee! And again, presuming the statement to have been furnished by him, he denies having ever heard that, possibly, he might find a block house and garrison established near the falls of the river. Now, I affirm that it was generally known throughout the right wing of the army that it was just possible that major McLemore, a highly meritorious Floridian, had made such establishment. The possibility was mentioned to major Read, and although colonel Gadsden by accident omitted the subject in the letter of instruction, yet when the major saw half of a flat, rudely cut in two, [so gov. Call had written], that which was extremely doubtful before, became a matter of the most perfect certainty; and if the major had been bound home without other orders, it immediately became his imperative duty to go instantly to the relief of his countrymen. The flat could never have belonged to Indians, and it would not have been destroyed if the garrison had returned by water to the Suwanee, and major Read, knew that it could only have returned by water.

Now, sir, I did not say in this or any other letter that I had told major Read any thing of a detachment having been permitted to visit the Wythlacoochee about the end of March. The court will presently learn how it happened to be omitted in col. Gadsden's letter to major Read, and by me in conversation with the latter. Nevertheless, the subject was not forgotten at headquarters, nor had ceased to be occasionally mentioned among the officers who had come down to Tampa Bay from Fort Drane. One of these, captain Drane, has testified before this court that he, at Tampa, stated his impression to major Read that "there was a detachment of Floridians on the Wythlacoochee with provisions," the witness having heard "at Fort Drane [and thinks] general Clinch had stated it to [him] that major McLemore had volunteered his services to go to the mouth of the Wythlacoochee."

I do not here, Mr. President, embody this testimony to contradict major Read, but simply to account for the strong language applied to him in the letter last quoted. Two of the harsher expressions therein contained are here intentionally suppressed. I had not, in May, as has been seen, received his report. I, at that time, verily believed, on the opinion of others, as well as from internal evidence, that the false assertions of the article in the Tallahassee paper were from his pen, or his lips; and governor Call's letter had said not one word as to the causes which led to the failure of the expedition—the spread of sickness among the men, the want of medicines, and the want of good water. Now, sir, although I think that at least two of those causes might have been guarded against by due foresight and activity on the part of the commander, and when reported to him ought to have been closely scrutinized in person, before abandoning the great objects confided to his intelligence and conduct—I am not only unwilling to reproduce those harsher imputations, but regret that they were ever made. Sir, up to this day, I have received no note or message of any kind from major Read. My recantation is founded on the recent assurance of a friend, (general Clinch), that major Read had no agency in the published article alluded to, and to his previous and subsequent gallantry and good conduct in the same war against the Seminole Indians.

In the first deposition of colonel Gadsden, (which is in evidence), he gives the history of the block house on the Wythlacoochee, thus:

"Major McLemore sought the service, by a private letter to the undersigned, stating that he had, on the Suwanee, a boat suitable for the expedition, and supplies, which he could bring with him to that point, if with the consent and approbation of gen. Scott. The following is the reply penned by me, and by direction of the general, to whom it was read before transmitted."

I beg, Mr. President, that the court will again read every word of this letter. I regret that I am too much fatigued to embody it entire in this summary. The perusal of it will show how unnecessary it was deemed, at Tampa, to call the attention of major Read specifically to the very remote chance of his finding any detachment on the Wythlacoochee. Nevertheless, though it was more than a hundred to one that the detachment was not there, as late as the 14th of April, or even the 4th, if the major could have ascended only seven miles higher up that stream, (and nobody doubted that he could and would) he would have found the gallant band, still firm in its position.

The letter to major McLemore is dated at Fort Drane, March the 25th. Col. Gadsden, by way of giving to the major the outline of my plan of operations, says: "The whole army will, probably, form a junction at or near [the Cove] by the 29th or 30th inst. It is impossible, at this time, to anticipate the ulterior operations of the army after it has encountered and defeated the enemy in their probably strong hold in the Cove," &c. "It is more than probable, however, that we may be detained in that vicinity many days reconnoitering the hammocks and searching for Indians in the jungles and thickets of that section of the country. If so, your co-operation and the supplies which you report you can bring, may prove of essential service. I am directed, therefore, by the general commanding, to say that, after securing the post on the Suwanee with an adequate garrison, you may proceed with the remainder of your command in the boat you have prepared for the service; provided, in addition to your own supplies, you can transport from 750 to 1,000 bushels of corn at least for the use of the army. Should your boat be properly secured, as you report, with bulwarks, you may enter the river and ascend to the rapids," &c. "You must be at that point by the 30th instant, or you will possibly, be too late to afford any aid to this wing of the army, the sole motive which sanctions the service to which you have been called."

"As your movement is intended to assist, and not to embarrass this wing of the army, you must not move without an adequate supply of ammunition, and from thirty to forty days' rations for your whole command at the least, in addition to the corn you may transport for our relief." (He is then requested to bring, if possible, extra pork or bacon.) "On reaching the point on the Wythlacoochee designated, you will use all due precautions to secure your boat and command, and, by building a block house, or by the construction of some other defence, until you hear from or of the army. If after, however, the second or third of April, you receive no tidings of or from this wing, under the command of general Clinch, you may be sure that it has proceeded south to unite with Eustis and Lindsay, and having left the Wythlacoochee, your detention on its waters will be no longer necessary. You will, therefore, return without delay to your post on the Suwanee, and there wait the future orders of the commanding general, or those which may be transmitted to you by the executive of Florida."

Col. Gadsden's first deposition adds, in continuation of this history: "It appears, however, from information received from one of the men who was in the block house, that the detachment did not reach the mouth of the Wythlacoochee until the fourth or fifth of April, two days after it had been ordered to quit it, and when gen. Scott" had reached the vicinity of Tampa Bay. "Notwithstanding, however, its fearless commander, and on his own responsibility, penetrated the river, established a block house, and left it garrisoned, with a promise to return and relieve it in eight or ten days. Unfortunately, however, as he entered the Suwanee, he was assailed with a fever, and fell a victim to its effects."

Thus perishes, Mr. President, a valuable citizen, whose patriotic zeal, pushed a little too far, has brought upon me, unintentionally, I know not what amount of general odium. This I have long borne in silence; but, sir, the star of truth approaches the zenith, and as it sheds its light over this court and land, the deep shades of calumny are made to disappear.

In relation to the Florida campaign, Mr. President, I have one point more to notice, and I shall have done.

Among the prodigious mass of documents turned over by the different offices of the war department to be read by the judge advocate in evidence against me, as if to crush by their physical weight, if they could not otherwise effect their purpose, there is from the hon. J. M. White, the Florida delegate in congress, a letter dated at Washington, May 28, to the president of the United States, with an endorsement in the hand of the latter, which directs "A copy of this letter to be sent to general Scott, with an order to withdraw from the command in Florida."

A. J."

Of this endorsement I had no knowledge until the original was read in this court. What were the feelings which it excited I may not, I will not say; but the associations recalled to my mind may be inferred from the following facts:

To my elaborate report of what I had done, and of the operations projected, the adjutant general, May the 5th, replied:

"Your communications of the 12th of April, reporting the operations of the army in Florida under your command, since your departure from Fort Drane and your arrival at Tampa Bay, has been submitted to the president, and this day to the secretary of war. I am happy to inform you that the president approves of your intended plan of operations," &c. "I am desired by the secretary of war to say that, from the tenor of your report, as well as by the communication he has just received from the governor of Florida, it is probably that, owing to the approaching season of the year, the campaign in the field cannot be much longer vigorously pushed. In this event you will make a judicious selection of the posts necessary to be occupied by the troops during the interval of active operations which may be best calculated to protect the frontier inhabitants, and prevent Indian depredation of any kind. For this purpose all the regular troops, including the 4th infantry, must be kept on duty in Florida."

As I had intimated in my letter of April 12 would be done, all this had been attended to before the receipt of the adjutant general's communication, and which is here cited principally to show that, certainly as late as the 5th of May, no displeasure had been officially expressed against me at Washington.

But in my report of the 11th of May, animadverting upon major Read, and which, according to a note on the original, (now in evidence), was received at Washington the 21st; seven days before White's letter to the president of the United States, there is this paragraph:

"I feel and know the risk I incur by the use of this language. Major Read is the favorite of governor Call, and his excellency's support may well turn the tables against me at Washington."

Sir, I had seen, among the papers which accompanied the instructions given me for the Seminole war, a letter, (in evidence with that document), from general Call to the president of the United States, dated Jan. 9, 1836, in which the writer says:

"I should be highly gratified to command the army, and believe that I could soon bring the war to a close, I fear, however, this I cannot do without injustice to general Clinch. He is a brave and good man; but I fear he is too slow in his movements to conduct a war against the Indians."

With an official copy of this letter in my possession, it may be supposed that I knew my danger. But, sir, I do not complain that, soon after my animadversions on maj. Read, he was appointed a brig. general in the militia of Florida; that a lieutenant colonel of the army, whom I reported in my letter of March 20th as having left for duty elsewhere, but went off to Washington, was, in a little time, rewarded by a colonelcy not by seniority; nor that the president's endorsement on Mr. White's letter was soon followed by governor Call's being "gratified," with the direction of the war in Florida. But, sir, I have, in defence, a right to advert to those extraordinary facts to show that if, in my operations to the south, I had the enemy to conquer in my front, I was, at the same time, not a little insecure in my rear. The effect of such position every soldier will readily comprehend; and I respectfully submit the point to the consideration of this court. A yet more extraordinary fact, of the same general character, will be developed in the sequel. But, at present, I will return to Mr. White's letter to the president of the United States.

I think, sir, that I have shown that this letter did not do me all the injury that was intended at the time. But why, sir, is it brought here with its endorsement, in accusation against me? Mr. White, in a letter to the president of this court, dated December 13th, 1836, says: "This places me in an attitude that I do not choose to occupy."

"Since the publication of that letter [to the president of the United States] I have, in the National Intelligencer, over my own name, as an act of justice to gen. Scott, corrected, upon better information, the complaints which I deemed it my duty as the representative of the people of Florida, to make against him. I am unwilling that the first letter shall be laid before the court without the second; and as I have no copy of it with me at present, I take this occasion to say that I am satisfied, upon a full and impartial review of the facts and circumstances connected with the Florida campaign, and upon evidence not then before me, that the failure is not to be attributed to major general Scott, nor to causes which it was in his power to control, or remove."

This voluntary and unsolicited retraction is manly and noble. In my judgment and feelings, it shows the correspondent of the court to be worthy of being called the honorable Mr. White, by a higher claim than that of mere courtesy. It is true, sir, that, in his recantation, he excepts what he had originally said of my order No 48, on the subject of panics. I know not that this reservation ought to break squares between that gentleman and myself.

The order, although there were many apologies for the inhabitants, was founded on information at once full and precise; and, as I said of it in my letter to the secretary of war, dated June 21st: "Besides, I was advised, by respectable citizens of Florida, to come out with an order in that spirit, as likely to rally the inhabitants, and I have reason to know that the order did good." If good resulted, I am content with the enmities I brought upon myself by the act; for, sir, since the war began to rage in that quarter, there has not been a moment, up to this time, when I would not have made any sacrifice of person to have stopped its ravages. I deeply mourn over the many afflictions the good people of that desolated territory have experienced; and I freely forgive, as I pray that God may forgive, the injustice of laying those evils, in part, to my account.

¶ The ceremony of counting the votes for president and vice president of the U. States, and the election of vice president, &c. are amply detailed in our congressional proceedings.

¶ The present sheet is filled with subjects of great interest. In addition to the second division and conclusion of the defence of general Scott, before the court of inquiry at Frederick, it contains a letter from the president of the United States to the committee appointed under Mr. Wise's resolution to investigate the manner in which the various executive departments have conducted their business, in which he refuses to assist the committee in investigations of the character they have instituted, &c.—a message from the same functionary to the senate of the United States, recommending the passage of an act authorising reprisals, and the use of the naval force of the United States by the executive, against Mexico in the event of the refusal of that government to come to an amicable adjustment of the controversy, upon another demand thereof made from on board one of our vessels of war on the coast of Mexico—the explanations of Messrs. Peyton, Wise, &c. in reply to Mr. Whitney's letter published in our last—Mr. Bell's bill to preserve the purity of elections—a synopsis of the land bill passed on Thursday last, in the senate, with the yeas and nays thereon—a detailed account of the proceedings on counting the ballots for president and vice president, &c.—a notice of Mr. Calhoun's remarks on a letter of the president to him, in which Mr. C. is charged by the president with having asserted that he, (the president) was concerned in speculations in public lands—together with detailed accounts of all business of interest that has transpired in both houses of congress, since our last publication, &c. &c.

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO. The message of the president of the United States to the senate recommending a war of reprisals upon Mexican commerce, will, no doubt, cause some surprise in the minds of our readers; but especially when they recollect that the last official communication from this government to Mr. Gorostiza, previous to his departure from this country, breathed the most conciliatory spirit, and that the last rumors from Mexico represented that nation on the point of declaring war against us for an invasion of her territory, &c. From the instructions of the secretary of state to Mr. Ellis, our minister to Mexico, which we have in type, but are unfortunately compelled to omit for want of room, it now appears, that an unfavorable issue of our negotiations was anticipated, and that that representative returned to this country, not because Mr. Gorostiza had closed his diplomatic relations here, but in pursuance of instructions from the secretary of state. The whole subject is one of curious interest, but is not intelligible without the documents referred to, which shall have a place in our next.

TRIAL OF GEN. GAINES. The military court at Frederick is still engaged in the trial of gen. Gaines. We see it stated that a court is to be held at the same place for the trial of major Gates, who was dismissed from the service, (but again reinstated) for alleged cowardice in the Florida war. His case has excited much sympathy, and the impression is general that the decision of the president was based on erroneous information.

MEXICO. In addition to the particulars given below, we have learned that gen. Bravo arrived at Metamoras on the 9th of January in advance of his troops, which were, however, arriving in small detachments, but in a very miserable condition.

The report of a revolution in California is confirmed, and it is stated that capt. Kennedy of the American squadron, had landed several hundred men to assist the insurgents.

Extract of a letter from an officer of the United States ship Natchez, dated at Vera Cruz, Mexico, January 9.

The Natchez touched off the port of Metamoras on the 28th ultimo, and was first to convey thither the intelligence of SANTA ANA's liberation by the government of Texas, and his departure for Washington. It was received with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of joy by the officers at the port, some of whom are his personal as well as his political friends. They repeatedly caught the gentlemen who imparted the information, in the a la mode Castilian embrace, nearly overwhelming them with the extravagance of their caresses, and at evening entertained them with a serenade and salute from muskets, and treated them during their stay with a profusion of hospitality. A courier was immediately despatched to proclaim the glad tidings in the city, and a celebration of the event was had by the firing of artillery, accompanied by acclamations of "long live Santa Ana!"

"Thumpico, Jan. 12, 1837.

"Since the last uproar we had here with the conspiracy, tranquillity has not been disturbed, and public confidence begins to revive. The usual effects of a conspiracy of this kind having been kept down by the sagacity of a few individuals, in making the government believe there was no such plot; the elements for a revolutionary movement, however, still exist, though much deranged by the return of Bustamente, which has created such a division among those who professed to be Santanites or federalists, as to give more consistency to a government, which, previously to that event, could not be called one. I must here repeat what I stated in my preceding letter, that the Mexicans worn out with the mismanagement of the affairs under Santa Ana and Tornel's administration, are fast rallying to Bustamente's standard, in the hope of a change for the better. The clergy, the merchants, the land-owners, and a great majority of the military, have pronounced in favor of their former president; and, indeed, things are assuming such an aspect as to place beyond doubt the triumph of Bustamente and his party.

"The conduct of Santa Ana in the Texian campaign exasperated most of the officers of the army; and his journey to Washington to settle the affairs of Texas, at a moment when the people generally blame and condemn the conduct of the American government, and would prefer a rupture with the United States to the present state of things, has given great umbrage to the nation at large.

"The troops of our garrison, 900 strong, are constantly on the move, and so are the forces under Amador, at Metamoras, consisting of about 2,500 men. Bravo has still his head quarters at Saltillo, and his forces there amount to 1,500 men. The reserve, 1,200 strong, is at San Luis. The fears of some revolutionary movement here will not permit, at present, the troops of our garrison being removed; and as to the forces at Metamoras and Saltillo, they are watching the movements of the Texians, who, but a few days ago, it was reported, were meditating an attack upon Metamoras. The government has decided that the army designed to operate in Texas shall be composed of 7,000 men, 3,000 of whom are to form a division of reserve to be stationed at Metamoras and Saltillo. It is difficult to say when and how these troops are to enter Texas; for as yet the navy is not ready, and no magazines of any consequence have been formed for the campaign. A brig of war arrived at Metamoras from Vera Cruz, ten days ago, with warlike stores, and a floating bridge of boats constructed at Campeachy, and intended to facilitate the passage of the troops across the rivers and creeks in Texas. Indeed, my friends at Metamoras inform me that the preparations making there are on a larger scale than they were last year."

ENGLAND AND NEW GRENADA. A rupture is anticipated between these two countries. It appears that a rencounter that took place in one of the streets of Panama, between the English consul, Joseph Russell, and signor Paredes, on the night of the 20th November—in the course of which signor Paredes was severely wounded. The cries of his wife, who was with him at the time, attracted persons around—and Mr. Russel was knocked down without ceremony, after having been disarmed—and hurried to prison.

Mr. Turner, the British minister, has interfered and demanded the release of the consul, the removal from office of the functionaries who imprisoned him, the restoration of the consul's house, &c. and the payment of one thousand pounds sterling, as a compensation for the cruelties he suffered. All of which was promptly refused.

Santander has issued his proclamation, appealing to the honor and the patriotism of his countrymen to sustain themselves against the efforts of Great Britain or any other power, to humiliate them in their own eyes, and in the eyes of the world. He says the sons of New Grenada will choose the patriotic part of dying with glory, rather than to see their own country humble herself at the feet of the soldiers of Albion.

The secretary of foreign affairs (senor de Pombo) thus concludes one of his letters to the British minister:

"If you determine on adopting the alternative of hostilities, be pleased to communicate your intention as soon as possible, that we may prepare for our defence. New Grenada, in such cases possesses the indisputable right of repelling force by force; and she shall accordingly resist any hostile act of the British arms. The unequal contest, it is true, will be lamentable—but the world will see the justice of our cause, and that we are forced to this painful extremity, in defence of our national rights, and honor, and dignity, against the unjust demands of a powerful and hitherto friendly nation."

FROM THE WEST INDIES. The Barbadoes legislature was opened for the first time under the government of sir E. J. McGregor, on the 25th October. His excellency was addressed by "his majesty's loyal and dutiful subjects," a committee of the "free descendants of Africa" residing in Barbadoes, and by the free colored inhabitants of St. Kitts, with congratulations upon his appointment, and assurances of their high anticipations from his just and equitable administration, of their respect for the laws, and loyalty to the king.

The Jamaica house of assembly and council have passed a bill to regulate the qualification of voters and legislators, which seems to give great dissatisfaction. Voters must have a freehold of £30 per annum, or a rent charge of £50, and pay taxes to the amount of £5. Members of the assembly must have £3,000 real, or 5,000 personal property. A petition to the mother country against the law, was proposed to be circulated for signatures.

A bill was before the assembly, establishing a qualification also for admission into the ranks of the militia!

Another subject of warm discussion, in and out of the legislature, was the proposed establishment of a colonial bank.

THE NASHVILLE RAIL ROAD. The legislature of the state of Mississippi have, at the session just closed, after a close contest between the friends and opponents of the measure, passed an act granting a charter, within that state, to the Nashville and New Orleans rail road.

DEATH OF O'CONNELL. The Boston Galaxy states that information has been received in that city, via Halifax, of the death of Daniel O'Connell. All Dublin was in mourning, the shops shut, and the merchants meeting as though each had lost a friend. His age was sixty-four.

THE LAND BILL. In the senate on Thursday last, the land bill, as amended by the committee on public lands, to which it was recommitted, was passed by a vote of 27 yeas to 28 nays. We find the following synopsis of it in the Intelligencer of yesterday:

1. That no person shall be entitled to enter by entry, or at auction, more than two sections of the public land; and previous to entry or to purchase, must make and file with the register and receiver of the land district an affidavit that the lands are sought to be purchased for his own use, and not in trust for another, nor for sale or speculation; and that he has made no contract, written or verbal, to sell, lease, mortgage or otherwise encumber the land, or any part of it; that he is at least twenty-one years of age, and has not previously purchased or entered, under this act, any public land, which, together with what he now buys, would exceed two sections. He must then pay the money, whereupon he gets a receipt for it from the receiver, with the consent of the register endorsed on it.

2. Within five years from the date of his receipt he must prove, to the satisfaction of the register and receiver, by the oaths of two competent and disinterested witnesses, that he has erected a dwelling house on the land, and cleared and cultivated at least one-tenth of it; or that he has resided on it one year of the five. He may then get his patent. If he fails in this proof he forfeits the purchase money. If he dies within the five years, and his death shall be proved within six years from the date of the receipt, the patent is still to issue.—Any sale, lease, or mortgage, or contract for sale, &c. before the patent, is void.

8. Before-emption is allowed, on proof as above, that the applicant has actually occupied and resided on any tract of the public land before the 1st of December, 1836, and has cultivated any part of it within the year 1836. There are several guards to this section of the bill to cover reserved tracts, lead mines, &c. lands to which the Indian title has not been extinguished, and lands beyond the bounds of the states and territories.

4. The owner of a farm may enter any adjoining land subject to private entry, not exceeding one section. An affidavit is required that the land is sought to enlarge his farm, and not for speculation, &c. and the whole must not exceed two sections.

5. A parent, being a citizen of the United States, may enter land for his children, but not over two sections in all; and no patent to come till the child becomes of age.

6. Purchases may be made in quarter-quarter sections; but no one shall enter more than four quarter-quarter sections not contiguous. All land to be taxable by state authority from the day of purchase.

7. The law to continue to the 30th of June, 1840.

THE RESTRAINING LAW. We subjoin a copy of the bill for the repeal of the restraining law, as it passed the senate, and substantially as it passed to a third reading in the house on Thursday, by a unanimous vote. It provides as the reader will perceive, for a simple repeal of the law, and for the re-enactment of the provision of the revised statutes in relation to foreign corporations. In this shape, the bill may be regarded as entirely satisfactory to every reasonable friend of the removal of the existing restrictions.

An act to repeal in part the revised statutes, relating to unauthorised banking, and the circulation of certain notes or evidences of debt issued by banks.

The people of the state of New York, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

Sec. 1. So much of title twenty, chapter twenty, part first of the revised statutes, relating to unauthorised banking, and the circulation of certain notes, or evidences of debt issued by banks, as prohibits a person or association of persons not incorporated, from keeping offices for the purpose of receiving deposits, or discounting notes or bills, be and the same is hereby repealed.

Sec. 2. This act shall not be so construed as to authorise or permit any incorporation created by the laws of any other state, to keep any office for the purpose of receiving deposits, or discounting notes or bills, or issuing any evidence of debt to be loaned or put in circulation as money within this state.

Sec. 3. No incorporated bank in this state, nor any officer or director thereof, shall open or keep an office of deposit or discount under this act, or be interested or concerned, directly or indirectly, in any such associations. The bank officer or director shall forfeit the sum of one thousand dollars for each violation of any of the provisions of this section.

Sec. 4. This act shall take effect immediately on its final passage.

The amendments made by the house are as follows: substituting in the second section the word "corporation," for "incorporations"—and adding the words, "or country" after the words "any other state," and erasing the word "immediately," in the fourth section. [Albany Argus.]

THE INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE AND THE PRESIDENT.

From the Washington Globe of Saturday, the 4th inst. In select committee of the house, to inquire into the executive departments, January 23, 1837.

The following resolutions, as amended, were adopted, and a copy of the same directed to be sent by the chairman to each of the heads of the departments.

1. Resolved, That the heads of the several departments be directed to furnish this committee with a statement showing the sums of money paid within the year ending on the first of December last, by such departments respectively, their agents, or deputies, without authority of law, if any, to printers or editors of newspapers; specifying the names and residence of such printers and editors, and also the names and places of publication of the newspapers owned or published by them; and showing the services and consideration for which such sums have been paid, giving each item as stated in the accounts of such printer or editor, and the reasons for making such payments.

2. Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested, and the heads of the several executive departments be directed, to furnish this committee with a list of all the officers, or agents, or deputies, who have been appointed or employed and paid, since the 4th of March, 1829, to the 1st of December last, if any, without authority of law; or whose names are not contained in the last printed register of public officers, commonly called the "Blue Book," by the president or either of the said heads of departments respectively, and without nomination to, or the advice and consent of the senate of the United States; showing the names of such officers, and agents, or deputies; the sums paid to each, the services rendered, and by what authority appointed and paid, and what reasons for such appointment.

3. Resolved, That the heads of the several departments be required to furnish this committee with a statement showing the various amounts of money paid within the last four years, ending on the first of December last, for contingencies, whether appropriated or not by law, to whom and for what appropriations have been changed from specific to other objects of expenditure than those for which they were made, and how such change was authorised or effected; and showing the amount of illegal or irregular expenditures, allowances or payments of every description whatever, if any, made by said departments respectively, since the 4th day of March, 1829, to the 1st of December, 1836, and whether paid by treasury warrant or draft, or otherwise, to whom and for what paid, and the authority and reasons for such expenditures.

4. Resolved, That the heads of the several departments be directed to furnish this committee with a list of all officers, agents or deputies, who have, since the 4th day of March, 1829, to the 1st of December last, within the departments respectively, received salaries, pay or emolument of any kind, without rendering service to the government; who have received salaries, pay or emolument of any kind, without being in office; whose commissions have been ante-dated; who held other stations or appointments, state or federal, when receiving pay for particular offices or agencies, or who have been engaged in private employment, and what, whilst receiving pay from, and rendering no service to, the government of the United States, with the names of such officers, or agents, or deputies; the sums or salaries paid to each, and the times of service of each respectively.

5. Resolved, That the various executive officers, in replying to the foregoing resolutions, be requested, at the same time, to furnish a statement of the period at which any innovations not authorised by law, if such exist, had their origin; their causes, and the necessity which has required their continuance.

6. Resolved, That the secretary of the navy be directed to furnish this committee with the report, or copy of the report, of John P. Van Ness and Amos Kendall, commissioners appointed by authority of the president of the United States, to receive and report such testimony as might be offered touching certain charges preferred by Mr. Hanson Gassaway, relative to the condemnation, and delivery to him, of sundry pieces of ordnance at Washington arsenal; and certain other charges connected with sundry contracts, and other matters connected with the office of the navy commissioners, which commissioners sat during the year 1833.

In select committee of the house to inquire into the executive departments, &c. January 23d, 1837.

The following resolutions were adopted and the chairman directed to furnish the president of the United States with a copy of the same:

Resolved, That the president of the U. States be requested, and the heads of the several executive departments be directed, to furnish this committee with a list or lists of all the officers, or agents, or deputies who have been appointed or employed and paid, since the 4th of March, 1829, to the 1st of Dec. last, if any, without authority of law, or whose names are not contained in the last printed register of public officers, commonly called the "Blue Book," by the president or either of the said heads of department respectively, and without nomination to, or the advice and consent of the senate of the U. States, showing the names of such officers and agents, or deputies, the sums paid to each, the services rendered, and by what authority appointed and paid, and what reasons for such appointment.

Resolved, That the various executive officers in replying to the foregoing resolutions, be requested at the same time to furnish a statement of the period at which any innovations not authorised by law, if such exist, had their origin; their causes and the necessity which has required their continuance.

The president's letter to the committee.

[COPY.]

Washington city, January 26, 1837.

SIR: I received on the evening of the 24th inst. your letter, covering a copy of certain resolutions purporting to have been adopted by a committee of the house of representatives, of which you are chairman, and request that you will lay before that committee, this, my reply, which I hasten to make.

It appears, by the published proceedings of the house of representatives, that the committee, of which you are chairman, was appointed on your motion. The resolution offered by you, and finally adopted by the house, raised a direct issue with that part of my annual message in which I held the following language: "Before concluding this paper, I think it due to the various executive departments, to bear testimony of their prosperous condition, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce in all of them a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business; and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the object of their creation." Your resolution is in the following words:

"Resolved, That so much of the president's message as relates to the 'condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation,' be referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said departments, or their bureaus or offices, or any of their officers or agents of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured and impaired the public service and interest, and that said committee in its inquiries, may refer to such periods of time as to them may seem expedient and proper."

It also appears, from the published proceedings of the house, that this resolution was accompanied and supported by a speech of considerable length, in which you preferred many severe but vague charges of corruption and abuse in the executive departments. The resolutions adopted by the committee, as well as that adopted by the house itself, must be taken in connection with your introductory speech, which gives a character to the whole proceeding. When thus regarded, it is obvious that, by the resolution of the house, an issue is made with the president of the United States; as he had alleged, in his annual message, that the heads of the executive departments had performed their official duties with ability and integrity. In your speech you denied this; you charged them with manifold corruptions, and abuses of trust, as you had done in former speeches, to which you referred; and you demanded an investigation through the medium of a committee. Certain other members of congress, as appears by the published debates, united with you in these accusations; and for the purpose of ascertaining their truth or falsehood, the committee you demanded was ordered to be raised, and you were placed at its head. The first proceeding of the investigating committee is to pass a series of resolutions, which, though amended in their passage, were, as understood, introduced by you, calling on the president and the heads of the departments—not to answer to any specific charge; not to explain any alleged abuse; not to give information as to any particular transaction; but, assuming that they have been guilty of the charges alleged, calls upon them to furnish evidence against themselves!

After the reiterated charges you have made, it was to have been expected that you would have been prepared to reduce them to specifications, and that the committee would then proceed to investigate the matters alleged. But instead of this, you resort to generalities even more vague than your original accusations, and in open violation of the constitution, and of that well established and wise maxim, "that all men are presumed to be innocent until proven guilty, according to the established rules of law," you request myself and the heads of the departments to become our own accusers, and to furnish the evidence to convict ourselves; and this call purports to be founded on the authority of that body in which alone by the constitution, the power of impeaching us is vested! The heads of departments may answer such a request as they please, provided they do not withdraw their own time, and that of the officers under their direction, from the public business, to the injury thereof. To that business, I shall direct them to devote themselves, in preference to any illegal and unconstitutional calls for information, no matter from what source it may come, or however anxious they may be to meet it. For myself, I shall repel all such attempts as an invasion of the principles of justice, as well as of the constitution; and I shall esteem it my sacred duty to the people of the United States, to resist them as I would the establishment of a Spanish inquisition.

If, after all the severe accusations contained in the various speeches of yourself and your associates, you are unwilling of your own accord to bring specific charges, then I request your committee to call yourself and your associates, and every other member of congress who has made the general charge of corruption, to testify before God and our country, whether you or they know of any specific corruption or abuse of trust in the executive departments; and if so, what it is. If you are able to point to any case where there is the slightest reason to suspect corruption or abuse of trust, no obstacle which I can remove shall be interposed to prevent the fullest scrutiny by all legal means. The offices of all the departments will be opened to you, and every facility furnished for this purpose.

I hope, sir, we shall at last have your charges, and that you will proceed to investigate them, not like an inquisitor, but in the accustomed mode. If you either will not make specific accusations, or if, when made, you attempt to establish them by making freemen their own accusers, you will not expect me to countenance your proceedings. In the short period which remains of my official duty, I shall endeavor, as I have heretofore endeavored, to fulfil the obligations of that oath of office by which I engaged "to the best of my ability, to preserve, protect and defend the constitution of the U. States;" and for this, and other reasons of the most solemn character, I shall, on the one hand, cause every possible facility consistent with law and justice, to be given to the investigation of specific, tangible charges, and, on the other, shall repudiate all attempts to invade the just rights of the executive departments, and of the individuals composing the same. If, after all your clamor, you will make no specific charges, or bring no proof of such as shall be made, you and your associates must be regarded by the good people of the United States as the authors of unfounded calumnies; and the public servants whom you have assailed will, in the estimation of all honorable men, stand fully acquitted.

In the mean time, I cannot but express my astonishment that members of congress should call for information as to the names of persons to whom contingent moneys are paid, and the objects of those payments, when there are six standing committees under the seventy-seventh rule of the house of representatives, whose special duties are to examine annually into all the details of those expenditures in each of the executive departments. The like remark is applicable to some other branches of the information sought by you, ample details in respect to which are to be found in the reports laid before congress, and now on your files, and to which I recommend you to have recourse. I am, respectfully, &c. (Signed) ANDREW JACKSON.

To the hon. Henry A. Wise, chairman of the investigating committee of the abuses and corruptions charged against the executive departments.

I certify that this is a true copy from the original sent. Test, A. JACKSON, JR.
Private secretary, &c.

DEFENCE OF MAJOR GENERAL SCOTT. Reported for the National Intelligencer.

THE SECOND DIVISION AND CONCLUSION OF THE DEFENCE OF MAJOR GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT, BEFORE THE COURT OF INQUIRY AT FREDERICK CITY, JANUARY 20, 1837.

II.—Delay in opening and prosecuting the Creek Campaign.

MR. PRESIDENT: Through much labor and several weeks of indisposition, I have at length reached in this summary the second general head of inquiry directed against me, and here again the evidence in my favor is ample and overwhelming. The whole of this I anxiously desire to compress and embody; but fear that my diminished strength will prove unequal to the task. The records, however, are before the court; and, on its researches, as well as its intelligence and justice, I confidently rely.

On the 15th of April, Mr. Secretary Cass wrote to me to say that, as soon as the state of affairs in Florida would, in my judgment, permit, he wished me to direct my attention to the Creek Indians, and to adopt such measures as I might "find necessary to preserve or restore tranquillity to that part of the country." By accident this letter was not received before the 20th of May, as is shown by major Kirby's endorsement.

In the secretary's next letter, dated May 16th, my attention was again strongly called to the Creek country, with power to require troops from Alabama.

From the same source I received a third letter, dated the 19th of May, transmitting "for [my] information a copy of a letter [that] day addressed to brevet major general Jesup," in which copy it is said: "Should major general Scott, under the instructions he has heretofore received, proceed to the theatre of operations, he will of course be entitled to the command, and you will serve under him."

On the 19th of May it was known at Washington that I was, about the beginning of the month, sick at St. Augustine, and hence the doubt whether I had proceeded to the Creek country. The 19th was two days prior to the receipt of my letter of the 11th, animadverting on major Read, and nine before the date of Mr. White's letter to the president of the United States.

On the 12th of June, a fortnight after I had reached the Chattahoochee, I received another letter from the acting secretary, (Mr. Harris), dated the 1st, and directed to me at Fort Mitchell, in which was enclosed a copy of Mr. White's, without the president's endorsement, and without the slightest allusion to it. After adverting to a previous letter, of May 25th, enclosing me a copy of the full instructions to governor Call, to assume, in a certain event, the command against the Seminoles, Mr. Harris concludes: "I am instructed to inform you that, under these circumstances, the president deems it unnecessary for you to return to the command in Florida."

Now, the 20th of May, immediately on the receipt of the letter of the 15th of April, I had charged brig. gen. Eustis with the full command in Florida, and had personally set out for the Creek country.

Behold me, then, Mr. President, from the 31st of May to the 6th of July, (the day on which the letter of recall reached me), in the larger, and at the moment the more important command, against the Creeks, without having heard that my conduct in Florida, even by letter respecting major Read, or Mr. White's to the president, had led to the expression of one syllable of official displeasure at Washington. On the contrary, sir, the letter from the adjutant general, (of May 5th), written by command of the president, on the receipt of my report from Tampa Bay, contained expressions of decided approbation, and the secretary's letters of the 16th and 19th, written after the receipt of mine of April 30th, reporting that active operations in Florida had terminated for the season, contain nothing but the language of consideration and respect. The elements of discontent, it seems, began to lower and mutter between the 21st and 28th, although I heard them not; but when a celebrated letter reached Mr. Blair, the storm thickened, the clouds were rent, and I was struck by the winged bolt on the distant banks of the Chattahoochee. I must not, however, sir, anticipate.

Before leaving St. Augustine, as I reported from Savannah, May 22d, "I ordered the new musket accoutrements, [about 1,800] the new arms, [750 Hall's patent rifles], and the new tents from Picolata, and St. Augustine, to Augusta, and also some spare fixed ammunition from the former place." The route of these articles was immediately changed, after writing this letter, from Savannah via Augusta, &c. to from Savannah, by the way of Darien, the Altamaha and Ochmulgee, to Hawkinsville or Macon, distant from Columbus, Hawkinsville about 110 miles, and Macon about 88. This change of route was made upon the information of the hon. Mr. Justice Wayne, and the assurance of the agent of the navigation company then in Savannah, that the Altamaha and Ochmulgee would remain navigable for common, if not for steam boats, many weeks longer, and which assurance, aided by a long succession of heavy showers, was more than verified. The court has seen that the rifles, accoutrements, &c. took this better route instead of ascending the Savannah river to Augusta, and thence by land 220 miles to Columbus.

Having transacted other business in Savannah, the court has seen that I was at Augusta on the 25th of May. Here I learned that, by orders from Washington, a large quantity of subsistence had been purchased in Charleston, to be transported thence by land carriage, via Augusta, to Columbus, and immediately I directed lieutenant Dimmock, the quartermaster at Augusta, to write to Charleston to cause that subsistence to go by the way of Darien, for the reasons already mentioned. This letter, however, did not arrive in Charleston in time, which produced at Augusta a part of the embarrassment experienced there in obtaining wagons. (See lieutenant Dimmock to me, May 29th). Subsequent instructions were given by me in respect to all the other heavy articles, which, by orders from Washington, were to take the route from Charleston via Augusta.

According to the testimony of major Kirby, I called, when at Augusta, for a return of property at the United States arsenal near that city; marked upon the return the arms (including the only six pounder fitted for the field) and ordnance stores which I thought might be wanted, and ordered that the articles so marked should be forwarded to Columbus. The arsenal contained no accoutrements, and few or no cartridges for muskets. It contained, however, several thousand of muskets.

But this, sir, was my position in respect to arms. 1. I had already ordered, from Florida, 750 rifles, complete, and 1,800 musket accoutrements, because I had learned, by recent experience, as is in evidence, that the United States southern arsenals contained but few or none of those articles, and I wanted them to make up deficiencies. 2. I did not know, nor could I tell, until I could see governor Schley, at Milledgeville, what muskets he might want to arm the troops he had ordered to the Creek country. 3. I confidently relied, as a farther resource, should it be necessary, on the United States arsenal at Mount Vernon, from which, by steam, arms, &c. might be obtained more promptly than by wagons from Augusta, and I had then in my possession, transmitted by the adjutant general, a letter from captain Hardin to governor Clay, dated February 8, 1836, which showed that there were, at that date, in the Mount Vernon arsenal, "10,000 superior new muskets, with buck shot and ball cartridges, and ten pieces of field artillery, completely equipped." 4. I arrived at Milledgeville the 28th of May, when I learned that the state arsenal being deficient in arms, the governor had the day before required from the arsenal at Augusta, 1,000 muskets, &c. which his excellency thought would be enough to make up deficiencies, even before he knew that I had ordered to Columbus the 750 rifles (mentioned above) for a like purpose. See major Baden's letter to me, dated May 31, enclosing the requisition of his excellency, dated the 27th. Major Baden said to me in that letter, "I have this day turned over to the assistant quartermaster here for transportation to Columbus * one thousand muskets," but not the accoutrements (also required) because there were none in the arsenal.

Well, sir, I reached Columbus on the 30th of May. Many companies of the Georgia line, ordered out by the governor, had preceded me, and others were coming up daily. It was soon ascertained by major Kirby, the mustering officer, that those troops had brought with them a smaller number of arms, and those of a more inferior quality, than governor Schley and myself had expected. (See testimony of the major under my 15th question, and the deposition of the honorable colonel Dawson, M. C. to answer to my third interrogatory.) The heavy rains which had been falling for a week, and which, by carrying off bridges, and rendering bad roads worse, also soon alarmed me on the subject of the thousand muskets coming from Augusta, and the rifles and accoutrements coming from Hawkinsville. Accordingly, on the 3d of June, I addressed the urgent letter of this date to captain Hardin, commanding the United States arsenal at Mount Vernon, in which I said:

"On the receipt of this, you will lose no time in hiring a steamer of light draught of water, and put on board of her for this place, four pieces of ordnance, two howitzers and two six-pounders, with harness and implements complete, and at least one hundred and fifty rounds of ammunition (fixed) for each piece. If you have no howitzers, you will send four six-pounders. Let the greater number of rounds of fixed ammunition be grape and canister, with some shells for the howitzer and some round shot for the six-pounders. Put on board the same boat 3,000 stands of muskets, complete; but I fear you have no accoutrements. Nevertheless, send the arms, with prickers, primers, &c. Send, further, 100,000 rounds of fixed musket buck and ball, and some buck cartridges, and 50,000 flints. I rely upon your using the utmost despatch," &c.

In his reply, dated June the 14th, captain Hardin said to me, that "the governors of Alabama and Florida have completely exhausted my stock of arms and ammunition," and that hence he sent my requisition to the Baton Rouge arsenal; that "governor Clay had drawn from this depot the following ordnance and ordnance stores, to wit: 4 six-pounders, complete; 6,800 muskets, complete; 175,000 buckshot and ball cartridges; 307 six-pounder canister; 105 six-pounder strap-shot; 9,700 flints; 1,492 sets of infantry accoutrements; 50 yards of slow match; 1,000 priming tubes and 133 port-fires. Of the above, 6,000 muskets, 4 pieces of ordnance and a due proportion of other stores were shipped to Montgomery, and the balance were ordered to Claiborne, for the troops called out by the governor, and to be rendezvoused at Irwinton, Barbour county, in this state. I am at this moment engaged in preparing ammunition, and shipping it to Montgomery, which I shall continue to do until the close of the campaign."

Now, when it is recollected that Montgomery is less than fifty miles from Tuskegee, the headquarters of the Alabama line, the court will begin to see by what superior energy and despatch major general Jesup was enabled, without giving me the least intimation, and against my orders, to commence operations on the 12th of June, and to invert my plan of campaign! At Tuskegee he found the troops in great numbers, already assembled, and armed from the United States arsenal, conveniently situated in his rear. But to return to my situation on the Georgia side of the enemy.

I have said that I arrived at Columbus the 30th of May, accompanied by his excellency governor Schley, major general Jesup, major Kirby and captain Parrott; the three latter of the army. I had not with me one staff officer, not even an aid-de-camp, except paymaster Kirby; but he was, as I have elsewhere said, almost a host within himself, performing in rapid succession the duties of adjutant general, inspector general, quartermaster general, &c. but even his zeal and abilities had their limits, and I found, at Columbus, no staff officer, and no depots or stores of any kind. On the latter point, see the testimony of major Kirby. Every thing was still to be collected, or created and organized. No subsistence, and no stores of any kind had yet arrived or were near at hand, by any order issued at Washington.

The instructions for general Jesup I hastily drew up, when already much indisposed. I had left St. Augustine in a convalescent state; but travelling night and day from Augusta, in storms of rain, I had now relapsed. General Jesup set out for the headquarters of the Alabama line, at Tuskegee, on the 4th, and took with him captain Parrott.

The Georgia troops continued to arrive at Columbus as late as the 28d of June. Of the regulars, one company (captain Monro's) reached that place on the 14th; major Lomax's small battalion, that of major Pierce, and colonel Henderson's first detachment of United States marines, followed at intervals of two, three and five days. The remainder of the United States troops came even a little later. And here it is proper to say, that not a man was in the field by my order. The regulars were all sent from the north by directions from the war and navy departments, and the volunteers, mediately, at least, by the governors of their respective states.

Hearing, from passengers arriving at Columbus in the public coaches from the east, that the wagons, loaded with muskets, &c. sent by maj. Baden from the Augusta arsenal, were much delayed by the heavy rains, and consequently injury to the roads and bridges, I despatched, the 18th of June, an intelligent volunteer, John Crowell, jun. esq. remarkable for his zeal and energy, to proceed rapidly until he should meet the train, and then to hire extra wagons, distribute the loads and force the whole to move, day and night, towards Columbus. See his report to me, dated the 16th, and the disposition of governor Schley, (answer to my 23d interrogatory). This train, which Mr. Crowell thought would reach Columbus the 19th, did not arrive until the night of the 20th.

The 18th, having heard nothing of the approach of the rifles, musket accoutrements, &c. which had been expected at Columbus about the 12th, from Hawkinsville, I instructed an aid-de-camp, lieutenant Betts, to proceed day and night to meet, and to hasten on by similar means, those articles. After he was in the saddle for this purpose, major Beard, who had been for some time employed in the quartermaster's department on the Ochmulgee, arrived, and assuring Mr. Betts and myself that he (the major) had placed the Hawkinsville train under a most energetic conductor, I permitted Mr. Betts to dismount. Two steamboat accidents had delayed these arms, &c. coming up from Darien to Hawkinsville; and on the road thence a most extraordinary panic seized the conductor and his wagoners, by which several days more were lost. (See Mr. Betts's testimony). The rifles, accoutrements, &c. did not arrive at Columbus till the 23d or 25th, after I had moved with the whole disposable armed force of Georgia and the regulars who had come up.—Major Alford's mounted battalion was left to arm itself with a part of the rifles, and to follow; and directions given for sending down the river the remainder of the rifles, the musket accoutrements, &c. for the use of the troops in advance. Major Alford, in a few days overtook the foot, and participated in the operations which ensued.

That every exertion and much foresight had been exhibited by me to obtain the arms, &c. needed to equip the Georgia volunteers as early as possible, say by the 12th, or at the latest, the 14th of June, is further and conclusively shown by the depositions of governor Schley, major general Sanford, and colonel Dawson, in answer to my 23d, 15th and 3d interrogatories, propounded to those distinguished individuals respectively, to whose depositions I particularly invite the attention of this court.

If the question be asked why I did not take the field, say as early as the 15th of June, with the armed portion of the Georgia line and the only company of the regulars (Monro's) that had then arrived—the answers are numerous, but I shall here only give two: 1st. The want of subsistence for four more days, none having yet arrived, principally from the same causes which had delayed the arms, and this reason will be more fully developed in the sequel. 2d. There were not armed men in sufficient numbers (before the 21st of June, the day when the muskets were distributed, and a movement in force actually commenced), on the eastern side of the enemy, even to guard the important points on the Chattahoochee, to prevent parties of Indians from escaping across towards Florida. (See, on this point, the decisive replies of governor Schley to the 22d question; of major general Sanford to the 5th and 2d, and of colonel Dawson to the 3d, addressed to them respectively). And so important was this object considered by the government, that the unusual course was adopted of causing major general Macomb to write to me, with his own hand, June 26th, as follows:

"The secretary deems it very important that a strong force should be stationed so as to prevent the escape of the Creeks in that direction (towards Florida); it is, therefore, the order of the secretary of war, that you station a sufficient force so as to prevent them making their escape and taking that direction."

I apprehend, Mr. President, that it would be difficult to employ language at once more urgent and specific. When I received that letter, I flattered myself that I had in hand the emphatic approbation of government; for the measure therein enjoined, originally adopted by his excellency governor Schley, before the Georgia troops had been mustered into the service of the United States, was followed out after I had assumed the command, in proportion to the arrival of men with arms. O, most simple and short sighted mortal! Only three days thereafter, another letter from major general Macomb, dated June 28th, followed:

"SIR: I have received through the secretary of war, the order of the president to recall you to the seat of government. You will, therefore, on the receipt of this letter, turn over to brevet major general Jesup the command of the troops serving against the hostile Creeks, and repair to the city of Washington."

This order, sir, was brief and emphatic, and I felt it as it was intended—a heavy punishment.—No cause was assigned—not the slightest explanation of the grounds of dissatisfaction intimated. I quietly and courteously obeyed; set out for Washington—wearing myself but little with conjectures, and expressed not one. At Norfolk, as I afterwards found to be the fact, the true cause was very fully mentioned to me. I repelled the rumor, which however gained strength at Baltimore; but, on arriving at Washington, I saw the treacherous weapon that had stabbed me in the dark—the original letter from major general Jesup to Mr. Blair, marked "private," and only to be shown to the president of the United States!

Since this deep degradation, and lying prostrate under the ban of executive displeasure, I have been assailed from several quarters, without intermission and with perfect impunity. I shall cite here but two examples of this servile war made upon me—both of which are in evidence, and belong to this branch of inquiry.

1. General Jesup, at his headquarters in the Creek country, found leisure to write a second letter to Mr. Blair, dated September 3d, 1836, and published in the Globe of the 26th. This letter was accompanied by some selected letters from me to general Jesup, and his replies, with ingenious notes. To the trick of the publication, and the false impressions given by it as a whole, I may, perhaps, recur before closing this address.

2. A neat little pamphlet (pink paper) written in the "Creek country, August 8, 1836." This was evidently gotten up with the assistance of gen. Jesup and the use of his official papers, and which ingeniously mixes together misstatements of facts with false principles. Among the latter, the secretary's order, and my measures to prevent the enemy from escaping across the Chattahoochee towards Florida, are ridiculed and derided. The joint production of the general and his captain-aid-de-camp, is, however, only signed by the latter.—The road to favor had already been discovered, and the captain was soon rewarded with the rank of colonel.

A word more, sir, in respect to arms prior to the arrival of the muskets on the 20th, and the rifles and accoutrements about the 25th of June.

Major Kirby said to this court that he "mustered into the service of the United States forty-five companies of the Georgia troops, at Columbus, early in June. They were generally entirely destitute of arms and accoutrements. The few arms they had were generally unfit for service in the field."

Soon after this period, it ought to be stated, in justice to governor Schley, that some wagon loads of state arms which he had mentioned to me at Milledgeville as being already on the road to Columbus, arrived, which enabled us to arm and despatch several heavy reinforcements to guard the passes of the river below, in the direction of Irwinton. I have no memorandum of the number of these arms, and I can only conjecture that it might have been from 600 to 800, that is, muskets, but with few or no accoutrements. But after those arms were distributed, and as many troops sent below, or put on board armed steamers, to cruise up and down the river, for the important purposes mentioned in colonel Dawson's answer, to the first interrogatory, (and on which duty he was himself placed as a captain), major general Sanford, in his reply to the second interrogatory submitted to him, says:

"Of the troops remaining under my immediate command, less than one-third were armed, and those variously and indifferently. Our miserable deficiency in this respect was strikingly displayed to my view when, upon the occasion of an alarm, it was expected that the enemy would be upon us in full force, I had the mortification of beholding, within my lines, 1,500 or 1,600 men with no weapons of defence beyond their side-arms, clubs and club-axes."

General Sanford's camp was at this time four miles in advance of Columbus, on the west side of the river, towards the enemy.

But, Mr. President, there was another, and a conclusive reason why it was necessary to wait, at least as late as the 17th of June, for muskets and rifles, with which to arm the whole of the Georgia line, before commencing active operations on the east side of the enemy: for, as late as the 17th, I had cause to entertain serious doubts whether the Alabama troops would consent to come into the service of the United States.

General Jesup arrived at Tuskegee, the headquarters of the Alabama line, on the 4th of June. The 8th he wrote to me, in advance of the return to Columbus of his escort, a strange letter, containing this sentence: "I have not yet obtained the command of the troops, but if I obtain it at all, I shall probably enter on duty to-morrow;" and not a word of explanation preceded or followed.

Surprised, in the extreme, at this intimation of a want of zeal and constitutional devotion on the part of the Alabama troops, I eagerly inquired, and caused others to inquire among the very intelligent officers of the escort, and several gentlemen who accompanied it as individuals, and the apprehensions excited by the letter were much increased.—(See, on this point, governor Schley's answer to my 18th interrogatory). Nay, it appeared to me, and to many others, who knew the circumstances, as certain, that the Alabamians had, from the 4th to the 8th of June, refused to come under the authorities of the United States, or, at least, under the command of general Jesup, and that they would continue so to refuse was even more than probable.

In this state of apprehension, I reported the circumstance to the adjutant general, June the 12th, adverted to the subject in my report to him of the 14th, and again in my report (by means of the paper enclosed) on the 17th.

In reference to the doubts so reported, the secretary of war in his letter of the 20th of June, instructed me, in the name of the president, that if, contrary to the confidence reposed "in the governor and citizens of Alabama," the militia of that state should "not have been mustered into the service of the United States agreeably to the requisition of the department." I was immediately to "stop all expenditures and supplies of every kind whatever, on the part of the United States, for such militia."

The next letters from general Jesup were received by me on the 17th of June, and dated the 15th and 17th. These I acknowledged in a letter to him of the 17th, in which I said:—"You had not informed me—you do not even now tell me, that you are in command of the Alabamians." It is true that that fact might, on the 17th, have been inferred; but it was not explicitly stated before his report to me dated the 20th.

Hence, Mr. President, the justness and force of governor Schley's answer to my 22d interrogatory, in which he says:—"With the great uncertainty with regard to the Alabama troops, and the situation of general Jesup, I considered it all-important that the whole of the Georgia troops should be prepared to take the field." And, sir, it has been shown that the muskets arrived on the night of the 20th were distributed on the 21st of June, and a general movement immediately commenced.

I have thus incidentally shown that I was without any letter from general Jesup after that of the 8th, until the 17th of June, when his two letters of the 15th and 17th were received. Whence this long silence, Mr. President? In his report of the 20th—the first paper sent by him to me deserving of that name—he said:

"I was not aware, until yesterday, that a letter which I wrote to you on the 9th instant had not been sent to you. It was accidentally put up with a bundle of papers, and I found it only yesterday morning, and from no notice having been taken of my letter of the 12th, I fear it has not been received. It was sent by a runner. I enclose a copy of it."

Sir, I am sorry to say that this account of the letter of the 9th is strange, if not altogether improbable; and I think, for reasons which will appear, that it is doubtful whether the letter of the 12th was ever confided to an Indian runner. Perhaps, on further search, it has been found, like its predecessors retained among other papers. And as the point is far otherwise than trivial, I will here quote, in support of my conjectures, what the same writer found himself compelled to say, in similar cases, to a higher functionary.

From Tuskegee, Alabama, August 2d, 1836, general Jesup said to governor Schley: "Knowing that I had written to you in reply to your communication, I was surprised when I received a copy of a letter you wrote to the president, in which you declare that I treated with silent contempt the reasonable request of the governor of Georgia." I examined my letter book, and found my letters to you recorded in their proper places," &c. "I felt indignant that a charge so entirely unfounded, as I then thought, should have been made; but am now induced to believe that, by some oversight or omission, my letters or at least one of them, had not been sent to you." He adds that an officer, late of his staff, "left Fort Mitchell for Washington city on the 1st of July. In looking over a file of papers put up by him the morning he left, and not opened since, until last night, I found the enclosed letter. The endorsement is in — hand, and I think it probable that it was put upon file in place of being sent to you."

August 28th. The same to the same. "I received your letter of the 15th instant at the moment of setting out for," &c. "I was detained longer than I expected, and only returned this morning.—Your letter of the 30th of June was not answered; but the omission was inadvertent, not intentional. I had forgotten that letter until I received yours of the 15th."

Now, sir, I will ask, what credit is to be attached to the declarations of one, upon a subject like the present, who has shown himself so forgetful, and of habits so irregular?

But, bad as was his memory, and disrespectful as were his practices, in matters of imperious duty, towards the chief magistrate of Georgia and myself, it is in evidence, sir, that, when the object was either to give effect to malignity, or to emblazon his own judgment and prowess, general Jesup never forgot, and always had the leisure to address the president of the United States, through Mr. Blair, or the less effective channel—the secretary of war. See his two letters to "Francis P. Blair, esq." dated, respectively, June the 20th and September 8, 1836, and his three official communications addressed to the secretary of war, dated, respectively, the 10th, 11th and 25th of June, 1836.

These five extraordinary productions, for they may be respectively denominated—the first two mentioned, private-official, and the last three official-private, call for a few specific remarks:

1. The whole are highly laudatory of the writer, major general Jesup himself, to a degree which might have palled upon the palate of his correspondents, but for the equal and happy admixture of censure of me.

2. The two private official letters have both been printed in the Globe newspaper: the first, with the president's endorsement, but without the initial and most sinister word (PRIVATE) on the face of the letter. Public rumor, without the least agency of mine, and which, indeed, was rife in Washington, Baltimore and Norfolk, whilst I was yet far to the south, without suspicion, and without knowledge of the matter, ultimately forced out this production, but not in all its deformity, for it was mutilated in the Globe of that word which gave character to all the others.

3. The letter of the 3d of September was expressly written in support of that of the 20th of June, and accompanied by official documents with notes—all professedly furnished by general Jesup for publication. As the best evidence, Mr. Blair was summoned as a witness to establish that fact. At first, he informed the judge advocate that he would attend on a given day, but afterwards wrote to that officer that he would prefer that his testimony should be taken by deposition at Washington. I immediately drew up interrogatories, which were duly transmitted by the judge advocate. Ample time had elapsed when I was last in court, and no answer having been received, the printed communication and Mr. Blair's letter to the judge advocate were offered by me, and received, in evidence. One important object I had in view remains, however, unaccomplished. The Globe, under the editorial head, speaking of my official reports made in the field, said, August 8, 1836. "Some were sent to us for publication, as we understood, at his [general Scott's] instance." Now, as I knew that this was not so, and had uniformly denied the charge—which, moreover, if true, would have rendered me justly obnoxious to the censure of this court, under the instructions given to it by the president of the United States—one of my interrogatories requested Mr. Blair to inquire into the grounds of that understanding, and to favor me with his answer.*

4. The three letters of Mr. Secretary Cass were given in evidence by the judge Advocate. They had never been published, nor had I heard of them until they were read in court. Whether the writer was ever rebuked by that functionary may be more than doubted. They were certainly not sent back, as they ought to have been, or they would not now have been here. I have denominated them official-private; for, sir, it is evident to me that, when severally written, they were, like the celebrated letter to Mr. Blair of the 20th of June, intended, by general Jesup, only for particular eyes. Thanks to the chief magistrate, he made one public by his endorsement, and thanks to the justness and manliness of Mr. Secretary Butler, the other three were not retained in the secret pigeon holes of the war office. And what is the character of these so long held official-private documents?—This it is now my purpose to expose.

It has been seen that gen. Jesup says he reported to me on the 9th of June, put the letter in a bundle, and forgot it. No wonder. His vanity was too much flattered with the honor of writing to Mr. Secretary Cass, for the eye of the president, to think of me who was charged, at the moment, with the general direction of the war. On the 10th, he made a report to the secretary, overlooking, as he did me, the adjutant general and the general-in-chief. The next day he made another report to the same functionary. In the first, he says that he has "about 900 volunteers and militia," and "about 200 friendly Indian warriors." "I shall move to-morrow, or the next day, at the farthest, against the hostile Indians," that he expected "to be joined by 500 mounted men," and "by 200 Indian warriors, and [he] hoped to strike the enemy in five days." But not an allusion to me, nor the instructions I had given him.

The 11th, from the same place, Tuskegee, he makes his second report to Mr. Secretary Cass.—He says that he has been delayed. "I shall move forward to-morrow, however, and occupy a position on the Fort Mitchell road, about twenty eight miles in advance, and there await the arrival of the Indian warriors under," &c. "or, if I can find the enemy without Indian guides, attack him immediately."

*The deposition was presented by the judge advocate at the opening of the court; but there was not time to read it. Gen. S. was understood to say that it acquitted him of the charge above specified.

[Reporter.]

Now, not a word is said, in either of these reports, of his having commenced defensive operations "for the purpose of staying the tomahawk and scalping-knife, and of preventing the devastation of entire settlements or neighborhoods on the frontier;" nothing of his having "none of that courage that would enable [him] to remain inactive when women and children are daily falling beneath the blows of the savage." These were flourishes which occurred to him subsequently, after I had rebuked him for violating my orders; for moving prematurely, and without notice to me, and operating on a line which inverted the plan of operations agreed upon between us. From his two reports to the secretary, it is plain that none of those devastations and horrors were then going on. The frontier settlements of Alabama had been tranquilized and rendered secure before his arrival at Tuskegee, and every white inhabitant within the enemy's country, who was at all exposed, had been previously murdered or had escaped. (See gen. Sanford's answer to my sixth interrogatory. It is conclusive on this point, for nobody better knew the Creek country). No, sir, gen. Jesup commenced operations on the 12th, without the crying necessity afterwards invented; without "the altered circumstances of the country" from the date of my instructions, (1st of June), which he alleges, in his letter to me of the 17th. He says not a word of the kind in his two formal reports to the secretary of the 10th and 11th; but, on the contrary, suppressing all allusion to my instructions, shows himself in haste to take the war into his own hands; and the court will recollect how it happened, no thanks to his foresight or activity, that he found the Alabamians amply provided with arms and ammunition.

The court has also seen, by the deposition of gov. Schley, under my 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th and 6th interrogatories, and the answers of major Kirby to my 3d, 4th and 5th questions, that general Jesup not only fully concurred in my plan of campaign against the Creeks, without suggesting a modification, but, claimed to have had the same plan in view as a conception of his own; and that I steadily adhered to it in all its outlines and details, until it was inverted or broken in upon by the isolated and unexpected movement of that general. The plan and its details, so shamefully denounced (with my Florida operations) in his letters to Mr. Blair, and pamphlet, will appear in the sequel.

In my instructions to gen. Jesup, dated June 1st, founded on the views so fully and frequently developed in conversations with him, I directed that he should repair to the head quarters of the governor of Alabama, understood to be either at Montgomery or Tuskegee, in order that the former, by an interview with the latter, might charge himself with the command of the Alabamians, and the direction of the war on that side of the enemy. His first step, after the interview, was to cause the volunteers, already called out in sufficient numbers, to be mustered into the service of the United States—if the enemy allowed time for that essential measure.

"His excellency the governor of Alabama [I said, in continuation] has proposed, in a letter that you have seen, [to the commanding officer of the Georgia militia, who might be at Columbus] to commence vigorous operations against the enemy, as early as the 5th instant. You have seen my reply to that letter, and are well acquainted with all the considerations which have induced me to propose a postponement to the 15th. In the meantime, however, and before the regulars and all the forces of Georgia shall arrive, I think something very advantageous may be safely attempted from a point at or below Irwinton, and operating up the country." (The court has seen that I then had expectations of receiving at Columbus the arms ordered, by the 12th or 14th). My letter to gen. Jesup continues: "I shall wish you, therefore, as soon as you are in command, to send as many of the Alabamians as can be safely spared from other great objects [evidently the defence of the Alabama frontier settlements] to co-operate with any surplus troops of Georgia that we may have for the field, after guarding the important points on this river [the Chattahoochee]. What that surplus may be, at the end of (say) eight or ten days, I cannot speak with confidence; but from the expectations of his excellency governor Schley, I think we shall by that time be able to send to that point from 1,000 to 1,500 men, including horse and foot. With this force, and a little addition to that which governor Clay, as you have seen, proposes to send to Irwinton, and some four or five companies of regulars, which may be here in time, I think we may clear the lower part of this river: that is to say, the whole of Barbour county, of the enemy, by the 17th instant, and before the arrival of the last of the regulars expected from the north. By that time all our forces on this side will be up, and be ready to be thrown across the river for vigorous co-operation, and, as we advance up the country, a portion of the volunteers guarding the river may be crossed over and united with the pursuing army." Many of the regulars, however, were unavoidably behind this calculation, from four to seven days. The letter concludes: "You will take care to communicate to me fully, from time to time, your means, your movements, and your plans, and you will hear from me frequently."

Yet the court has seen that, after the receipt of the enigmatical and alarming letter of the 8th of June, I did not again hear from general Jesup till the 17th, when he reported himself to be within fourteen miles of Fort Mitchell!

Sir, he not only did not report to me himself (until long afterwards) any of the important facts which he so fully disclosed to the secretary of war, as we have seen; but his presence at Tuskegee, in all probability, prevented his excellency governor Clay, then there, from acknowledging my two letters of the 31st of May, as I now certainly know it prevented any reply to a letter of the same date and tenor from governor Schley. This fact is established by the answers of the latter to my 15th and 16th interrogatories, in which it is said that gov. Clay replied to another letter written by the deponent many weeks subsequently, "that the management of the war had devolved on generals Scott and Jesup, which seemed to render any further correspondence between us [the two governors] upon that subject unnecessary." Yet a reply to either the letter of governor Schley, or the two from me, would, under the mysterious silence of gen. Jesup, have much diminished my embarrassments at the time.

In general Jesup's second report, dated the 11th of June, to the secretary of war, he says: "I have no means of communicating directly with general Scott. This circumstance inclines me to strike a blow at once, though there is some hazard in it.—General Scott, when I left him, expected to be ready by the 15th."

Why, sir, had he no direct means of communicating with me? His letter of the 8th came to Fort Mitchell by an Indian runner. My letters to him of the 10th, 16th, &c. were sent by single Indians, and he had a large body of friendly Indian warriors with him. I early charged captain Page, who was, at the time, caused with the Indian department, and the transmission, by Indian runners, of my letters to general Jesup, to be summoned here; but the judge advocate informs me that the captain is detained at the south by illness. General Jesup, however, has nowhere remarked the non-reception of any one of my letters.

My second letter to him was dated the 10th, alluded to in the third [16th of June] by mistake, as if dated the 12th. In this letter [of the 10th] I said:

"We shall be much delayed in taking the field, on this side, by the non-arrival of our most essential supplies—rifles, muskets, musket accoutrements, ammunition, &c. I had expected these, with subsistence stores, to begin to arrive here from the Ochmulgee by the 7th instant; but here is a letter from the agent, Mr. Beard, dated at Hawkinsville, the 5th, in which he reports that nothing had reached that place. He immediately despatched a boat to Darien to make inquiries, to hasten, &c.—We have now on the Chattahoochee about 3,000 Georgians, most of them remarkably fine men.—Of the whole number, however, not a third have sufficient arms, and a still smaller number good accoutrements. It will, therefore, be impossible to arm and equip the remaining two-thirds without the muskets, the Hall's rifles, and musket accoutrements expected by the Ochmulgee. From the foregoing, it will be seen that it is impossible for the Georgians to commence operations from the neighborhood of Irwinton, say in eight or ten days, nor even then, unless the arms and accoutrements shall have arrived. I have not had a line from governor Clay," &c. "We have more than doubled the force placed in the lower counties of Georgia to prevent the Creeks from escaping to the Seminoles."

In my third letter to general Jesup, dated June 16, after telling him (as in my second letter—in order that his own movements might not be precipitated) of the arms, &c. having been heard from, and that they might be expected in a few days, I say: "At present, of the 2,200 men major general Sanford has in his camp, (on the other side of the river), only about 400 are armed, [and these but indifferently]; all the other armed men have been detached below, to guard the river, and which, as yet, from the want of armed men is but very imperfectly guarded." I then allude to the mysteries and omissions of his letter of the 8th. After animadverting on several, my letter proceeds:

"You further tell me that if a movement be determined on, I will send you information of it by a runner. A movement to be determined on! By whom? The Alabama commanders, or those in conjunction with yourself? Either you were placed in command, or you have not been. In the first case you would certainly determine on no scheme of offensive operations without my previous concurrence and readiness to co-operate; yet, without receiving any runner from you, or communication of any kind, since the 8th instant, a passenger in the stage by the upper route, just arrived, here reports that you, at the head of about 3,000 Alabamians, and 1,000 friendly Indians, was about to march upon Ne-o-mi-co's band, and to commence operations on a grand scale! I have no doubt there is a gross mistake in this report. You may, perhaps, have been about to make some defensive movement, or operation, to clear a frontier settlement of a portion of the enemy; but I will not believe that you have declared your independence of my authority."

The court will be pleased to remark that I was, until very recently, ignorant of the fact that general Jesup, though silent towards me, had been quite communicative against all regulations and decent usages of the army, to the secretary of war.

My letter to him, of the 16th, continues: "It is certain that brigadier general Moore, of Alabama, has commenced a course of offensive operations, from Irwinton up the country. From this fact alone, I have rather inferred that you have not even yet been invested with the command of the Alabamians, or you certainly would have stopped his premature and isolated movement. These doubts and conjectures, in the absence of all direct intelligence from you, are sufficiently harrassing."

"I mean to be explicit and precise on my part.—I desire you instantly to stop all offensive movements, (if you are in command), on the part of the Alabamians, until the Georgians are ready to act; say on the 21st inst. the greater number of them will be armed and ready for the field. By that time, too, there will be on the frontier the greater part of the regulars and marines ordered from the north. On that day, if the movements of general Moore shall not render a modification of my plan necessary, I shall begin to assemble the troops on this side of the nation, some where in the neighborhood of Irwinton, and operate up the country. It is my desire that you meet me about that time and place, and that you bring with you any disposable force you conveniently can, or that you hold the whole of the Alabamians in defensive positions on the frontier settlements till I shall bring the war into their neighborhood, when you can come into the general line of operations with me."

June 17th, I addressed a fourth letter to general Jesup, of which the following are extracts:

"Sir: I have this moment received your two letters of the 15th and 17th instant."

"I am infinitely astonished and distressed to hear of your near approach, and in a starving condition, to Fort Mitchell. You knew that your forces were not wanted there; you knew that no supplies would reach Irwinton from New Orleans earlier than the 21st instant, if so soon; and you knew by my letter of the 10th inst. that nothing had arrived as high as Hawkinsville upon the Ochmulgee, and, consequently, nothing could have reached this place by the present date, from that river. I ought, also, to add, that you knew when you left here, that the troops, daily increasing, were living from hand to mouth on the precarious supplies of the neighborhood. Under these circumstances, imagine my astonishment to learn that, instead of marching the disposable force of Alabama upon Irwinton, with subsistence for at least ten or five days in advance, you have come through the heart of the Indian country, seeking private adventures, which, if successful, could hardly have advanced the war, and against my known plan of operations, to Fort Mitchell, forty five miles out of position! It is precisely general Gaines' movement upon Fort King, where there was no subsistence, and there is none, as you ought to have known, at Fort Mitchell! My grief and distress are at their utmost height. This strange movement you have made, without giving me the slightest notice. You have not informed me—you do not even now tell me, that you are in command of the Alabamians; and your last letter states that it was doubtful whether you ever would be invested with that command. All this is infinitely strange, and was the last thing in the world that was to be expected from you."

The letter concluded with these words: "Though in grief, I still remain yours with great regard."

General Jesup has given this letter, with notes of his own upon it, as part of his communication to Mr. Blair, printed in the Globe September 20, 1836. In one of those notes he says, "to dis credit my describing him to be approaching Fort Mitchell in a starving condition," that, at the time, "he had subsistence for the troops under his command to the 22d of June."

Now, in his letter of the 15th, written from the interior of the enemy's country, he had said to me: "I find it impossible to obtain either corn or subsistence here. The hostile Indians have destroyed all that they have not taken away." Same letter: "June 16th. I am now at the Big Spring, within fourteen miles of Fort Mitchell." "I have to request that provisions and corn be sent to Fort Mitchell. I have only five days' rations, and not a grain of corn." "I shall, probably, be compelled to fall back on Fort Mitchell, or to a position near to it.—I hope to receive orders from you at that place, to which, if I do not go myself, I shall send wagons for subsistence." And in his note to me of the 17th, received with the letter of the 15th-16th, he says: "I find that we have less than two day's rations in addition to two day's rations in the hands of the men. Whether successful or not against Ne-o-a-mathla, I shall be compelled to go to Fort Mitchell. Can you give us provisions and corn there? By all means do so."

Here, then, Mr. President, is a great general, who takes the field against the orders and without the knowledge of his commander; puts himself on a wrong line of operations, without plan or object; without the assured means of subsistence, and, when out but from three to five days, breaks silence only to call for help, and in piteous accents declares that, whether successful or not, he will be obliged to fall back! We may now see why these letters were not given to the Globe; they would have supported every assertion of mine so indecently contradicted in the printed notes. Take this as a second example: General Jesup says that, when he arrived at Fort Mitchell "he found in the neighborhood several thousand bushels of corn, which he had directed captain Page to secure early in June." If so, why the urgent entreaty that I would send provisions and corn there? I again regret the absence, by sickness, of captain Page. My accuser adds, in the same place, "If general Scott was not acquainted with the resources at his command, it was not the fault of general Jesup." This sneer is happy enough; but, unluckily for its author, I myself gave him, in my letter of the 19th of June, the first information he had probably ever received of that corn! In the same printed notes, general Jesup says, when he "arrived at Fort Mitchell, on the night of the 18th of June, he found a steamboat with 70,000 rations, which he had ordered from New Orleans before he had left Washington city." How exclusive in his foresight! Again, "he expected the arrival of the steamboats with supplies at Columbus by the 15th of June."

The court will here please refer to my letter, written at Augusta, May 26th, and repeated from Milledgeville the 28th, addressed jointly to the quartermaster and commissary at New Orleans, and then turn to the testimony of major Kirby. From the latter it will be seen that, upon a calculation made by general Jesup and myself, we both thought that his letter from Washington and mine from Augusta, on the same subject, would, very probably, reach New Orleans together. And, according to major Kirby's letter to general Irwin, dated June 2d, it was thought the first supplies might arrive from that city by the 18th or 19th. General Jesup, therefore, could not have expected those "supplies at Columbus by the 15th of June;" and he knows, in fact, as I several times told him in my letters, that we both thought it would be fortunate if they arrived by the 22d. By great good luck, however, the first steamboat did actually arrive at Fort Mitchell on the 18th or 19th, whereby the whole army was saved from the misfortune which general Jesup's false movement would otherwise have occasioned, viz: of being reduced to half or third rations for many days. (See, on this point, the testimony of maj. Kirby, lieutenant Waite, and lieutenant Betts; also, the deposition of major Huson).

In all this time, Mr. President, from the 4th of June, when he reached Tuskegee, to the 17th, it had never once occurred to general Jesup that a movement from the frontier settlements of Alabama, upon Fort Mitchell, (at the opposite side of the Creek country) was the way to protect the women and children (whom he left far behind) against the uplifted tomahawk and scalping knife; or that he had none of that courage that would enable him to look on such scenes. No, sir, "devastations of entire settlements," as well as women, children, the tomahawk and scalping knife, are entirely omitted in all all his letters—the two to the secretary of war, dated the 10th and 11th of June; his letter to me of the 8th; the copy of that dated the 12th, but handed to me by his aid-de-camp on the 20th, and his two other letters to me dated the 15th-16th, and on the morning of the 17th." But, after he had taken the war out of my hands, and found himself "compelled to fall back on Fort Mitchell" for corn and subsistence; when, in short, he had, late on the 17th, received my letter of the day before, quoted in great part above, then, and not till then, did those moving topics occur to him—in the use of which he has been as happy, as in the invention. See his second letter to me, dated the 17th of June, in which those weapons are powerfully handled both for defence and offence, and which letter closes his communication in the Globe of the 26th September. But, powerful as that letter may seem, he did not dare to include my reply to it, dated the 19th, and which, in all fairness, ought to have been published at the same time. This the court will perceive, from the following extract:

"On my return to Columbus, late last evening, I received your second of the 17th inst. This is fully as strange as any of your previous communications. In it you repeat nothing of your previous intention of marching upon Fort Mitchell, but you take care to insert two or three topics which would furnish a good basis for a popular appeal against the hardship imposed upon you of undertaking no system of offensive operations without my previous concurrence and readiness to act in concert with you. It would seem to be for this purpose, I can imagine no other, that you tell me that your operations have been 'commenced, and have been continued for the purpose of staying the tomahawk and the scalping-knife, and preventing the devastation of entire settlements or neighborhoods on the frontier.' Nothing, certainly, could have been more meritorious. The direct protection of the Alabama settlements was within your competency, and, indeed, among your paramount duties. But why commence a grand system of offensive operations, which has brought you out on this side of the Creek nation at a point where I did not want you, without giving me the slightest intimation that you were about to commence, and, of course, without waiting for my approbation and co-operation? To have waited for such co-operation, and to have given me notice of your intended movements, were, allow me to say, also, among your paramount duties.

"Your next popular flourish is in these words: 'I have none of that courage that would enable me to remain inactive when women and children are daily falling beneath the blows of the savage!' I certainly believe that you have not, and there was not the slightest objection, in any quarter, to your protecting the women and children of the frontier, with the defence of which you were directly charged. Again, nothing could have been more praiseworthy; but how does this excuse your leaving those women and children, and, instead of marching upon Irwinton where you were required, marching in hostile array, seeking battles, upon Fort Mitchell, where you were neither expected nor wanted?

"On the subject of the Alabama frontier settlements, I am happy to learn by your letter, that you made such arrangements for their safety as to leave you assured on that point.

"The last dead point you make, as if it were for future use, against me, is this: 'I would have struck the enemy to-night but for your letter; if he is not struck to-morrow morning, he will escape for the present, but the force I have in the field is sufficient to pursue and reduce him.' Here I am made to deprive you and the country of a great imaginary victory. I say imaginary, for I am inclined to think you are a little too sanguine on this occasion in your calculations. But the true answer is this: Who gave you authority to roam at pleasure through the Creek nation, at the head of the Alabamians and a body of friendly Indians, without giving notice to, and without concert with, the Georgians and regulars brought to this frontier for the same war, and at an enormous expense to the government? Besides, from the position now occupied by you, you are forced to operate down the country, instead of getting below the enemy and operating up. This precisely inverts what you knew to be my plan of campaign—a plan fully developed in conversation with you, and to which you did not in the least object, although you were invited to discuss it freely!"

Here, sir, it will be seen that I distinctly predicted that general Jesup's second letter, of the 17th, assuming new and unfounded reasons for his false and unauthorised movements, was intended much more for the public than his immediate commander. Hence those topics of appeal, and hence its appearance in his communication to the Globe, without my reply!

The court has also seen in that reply, that I discredited the idle vaunt that he would have struck the enemy a fatal blow on the 17th or 18th, but for my letter of the 16th. Now, sir, it is distinctly in evidence, notwithstanding that gasconade, that he not only disobeyed my orders, but, in the attempt to strike the blow, egregiously failed! See his third official-private letter, addressed to Mr. Secretary Cass, dated June 25th, and which so unexpectedly has been brought within my knowledge. It was on this, and the circumstances connected with the point, that I wanted the testimony of gen. Woodward. My 14th interrogatory to governor Schley relates to the same matters.

I have given above an extract of my letter to general Jesup, of the 19th of June. The following is a continuation of the same communication:

"Whilst writing the above, I received your letter of this date, written at Fort Mitchell. You charge me with harshness. I have certainly, in previous letters, complained heavily of you, as in the beginning of this, and have, in every instance, I think, given the grounds of those complaints. The facts stated by me, I think, bear the construction I have placed upon them, and I have infinitely regretted the existence of those facts.

"You are mistaken in supposing that I upbraided you for asking for small supplies of rations and forage for your troops. I regretted the scarcity of your resources in such supplies, and apprehended a scarcity bordering on starvation, for a few days. Fortunately 80,000 rations have arrived at Fort Mitchell, (and about 20,000 here), which yesterday were not expected earlier than the 22d, perhaps the 23d instant; and I am confident that, when here, we both, by calculation, did not expect any thing from New Orleans before the 21st or 22d. I am rejoiced as much on your account as my own, that we both have an abundant supply of rations for the present; and we know that 150,000 more will soon follow."

"General, in haste, I have not intended to say any thing to injure you. I have shown in strong terms the construction I had a right to place upon your acts and letters. This, I know, may appear harsh. But on the other hand, allow me to say that I have the greatest, and an undiminished confidence in your honor, your intelligence, gallantry and capacity for war. You use the word friendship. I have cherished for you for more than twenty-two years a warm and a sincere affection, which I would not part with on any consideration. It has been a little shaken since I saw you, but one expression of your letter goes far to recall it. I think you have not been attentive to my plans and instructions. In this I certainly believe that you have erred, and also in your failure to report fully to me. Throwing for a moment seniority aside, I ask it of your ancient connexion with me to be more careful in those particulars in future. It will give me sincere delight to put down this war with you, and to give you all the fame which I know you are so capable of winning."

The letters between general Jesup and myself were duly, from time to time, enclosed by me to the adjutant general for the information of government. In writing to the latter on the 21st of June, I enclosed general Jesup's letter to me of the 19th, and the above reply, of the same date, and said to the adjutant general:

"With respect to this distinguished officer, [gen. Jesup], I have every motive in the world, public and private, to act in perfect harmony. All my ancient affection for him is fast returning. I hope it will be entirely restored in a day or two, that is, as soon as I shall learn that he conforms himself to my plans and instructions."

Having subsequently received gen. Jesup's report dated the 20th, giving his operations and motives from the 12th to that date, with several other official letters, (in evidence); having, as I passed down the country the evening of the 23d, met and conversed with him on the subject, confiding in the facts and motives alleged by him on the several occasions, and being absolutely ignorant then, and long afterwards, of his letters to Mr. Secretary Cass, and, above all, of the dastardly attack through Mr. Editor Blair, in the since notorious letter of the 20th, the court may imagine how, with my reviving feelings of kindness, I was led to write the voluntary apology for gen. Jesup's conduct, dated the 23d of June, and addressed to the adjutant general. In this letter I requested that such of my reports as had animadverted on general Jesup might be returned to me, on the ground that, as we were again friends, no trace might remain on record to show that we had ever been otherwise. He had met and rode some miles with me that evening. As he entered my room I finished the letter, handed it to him to read, (before I had read it myself), and it was instantly recorded by an aid-de-camp in my letter book. I did not tell him "on the morning of the 24th," as he writes to Mr. Blair, September 8d, that I "would ask to withdraw" the letters, &c. The request, and my reasons for it, he had seen the night before. With the letter in his hands, he intimated an objection to the word explanations, offered by him; but, on an admonition, on my part, of firmness and kindness, he read the letter through, and expressed himself gratified. Why, sir, did he not then tell me of, or instantly take measures to counteract, his assassin-like letter so recently written to Mr. Blair, and which, beyond all doubt, he despatched after the receipt of mine of the 19th?

A miserable apology is attempted, by general Jesup, for addressing the president of the United States on official matters, through the secret channel of Mr. Blair, in the printed sheet or pamphlet, (before noticed), signed by gen. Jesup's aid-de-camp. In this joint production, it is said: "The official channel of communication was through gen. Scott. To make the application through him would have been indelicate," &c. But where was the convenient channel, through Mr. Secretary Cass, which gen. Jesup had twice used, (on the 10th and 11th of June), before the letter of the 20th to Mr. Blair, and once afterwards—the 25th of June—on other military subjects—all whilst I was in command? Have those acts of direct insubordination towards me ever been rebuked? It is to be presumed not, sir, or those letters would not have been found in the same department in the time of Mr. Secretary Butler.

The truth is, Mr. President, general Jesup left Washington on the 22d of May—the day after the receipt of my letter respecting major Read; and, aware of the displeasure which that letter had brought upon me, he believed himself at liberty to defy my authority, with but little observance, as often as his vanity might dictate. Hence his repeated boasts, (in his letters), that he had been sent into the field by the president himself, although, in the instructions to him, he was expressly told that if he found me there, he was to serve under me, and obey my orders—as the rules and articles of war would have told him, independent of those instructions; and hence, from the same cause or causes, of all those letters official-private and private-official, with the pamphlet and communications in the Globe, which I have brought under the review of this court. The blood of the Seminoles may be made to crimson the waters of Florida, but neither one nor both can wash away that stain which his conduct to an ancient friend has brought upon him. Sir, a moment more, and I shall be done with his name forever.

Much having been objected to my plan of operations against the Creeks, as against that in Florida, and there being really some danger that any plan of campaign may, from the sneers of some of my contemporaries, be, in future, considered as unworthy of the native genius of American commanders, I beg leave, Mr. President, to fortify my last humble conception in this way, by the opinions of three highly distinguished gentlemen who have favored me with their depositions. The following interrogatories, but slightly and accidentally varied, were propounded by me to each of the deponents:

1. "What, in the opinion of the witness, were the relative advantages or disadvantages between the plan of operations beginning on a line at or a little above Irwinton and below the hostile Creeks, and acting up the country, and beginning, (say), on a line from Tuskegee to Fort Mitchell, above the greater number of the enemy, and thence operating down the country?"

2. "If the whole disposable force of Georgians, Alabamians and regulars, with the friendly Indians acting as auxiliaries, had been placed in line below the enemy, and had operated up the country, whilst the frontier settlements of Georgia and Alabama were guarded by competent detachments, is it not probable that fewer of the enemy would have escaped across the Chattahoochee, in the direction of Florida, than actually did so escape; and also, that the war would have been earlier finished than it actually was?"

3. "Is it not probable, or certain, that the movement of general Jesup and the forces under his immediate orders from Tuskegee upon Fort Mitchell, and from that line below, before all the other forces (upon the Chattahoochee) were ready to take their positions on that river and the base line below the enemy, put the enemy upon the endeavor to escape in the direction of Florida, and led to the many severe conflicts which took place on the soil of Georgia?"

4. "Which of the two plans of operations—that of operating with the whole disposable force under the general command of the said Scott upwards from a line below the enemy, and beginning, (say), about the 25th of June; and the plan pursued by the said Jesup, viz: beginning an isolated movement, (say), about the 12th of the same month, from Tuskegee towards Fort Mitchell, and thence operating down the country—would, in the opinion of the witness, have the sooner terminated the war by the capture of a great body of the enemy?"

These questions are here differently numbered from the numbers they bore in the several papers drawn up by me to be submitted to the witnesses.

I regret, Mr. President, that I have not the time or strength to embody the answers to the several interrogatories given by his excellency governor Schley, a near, an anxious, and close observer of all that passed; of major general Sanford, who commanded the Georgia line from an early period to the end of the war; and of the hon. Mr. Dawson, a colonel at home, but a captain in the campaign. Each is clear and emphatic in favor of my plan of operating upwards in preference to the reverse plan; in favor of a delay to about the 25th of June, with a view to a united movement upwards, with all the disposable forces; and of the opinion that the war would sooner have been terminated by that delay in the beginning, and with better results. I know not an intelligent officer, who was with me in the campaign, who would not have given a like opinion if called on for the purpose.

To this, or a similar question propounded, viz: "Is the witness aware that the said Scott, in any particular, when not ill in bed, (about ten days), failed in point of zeal, activity or judgment, in the direction of the war against the hostile Creek Indians before mentioned?"

The answers of governor Schley, major general Sanford, colonels Dawson and Kenan; and major Kirby, to this question, are all again too complimentary to be by me reproduced, and no other witness with me in the Creek campaign was interrogated on the subject.

Mr. President and gentlemen of the court:

I am exhausted; but should do equal wrong to justice and to my own feelings not to offer to each and every one of you my hearty thanks for the patience and impartiality you have all shown, including the judge advocate, in this long investigation.

Every material fact that has been given in evidence, which more than by mere possibility could effect your judgments to my prejudice, and I recollect but few of that character, will be found carefully embodied, or specifically referred to, in this summary. Much I know to be wholly omitted on the other side. These declarations I am confident no examination will be able to controvert. And here I may add that there is not an important circumstance in all my recent conduct in the field which was not at the time duly reported, and with my own hand, for the information of government. With, then, this overwhelming mass of testimony in my favor, permit me again to ask, by what strange fatality do I find myself here? It is for this court, with the approbation of the president of the United States, to bid me depart in honor; and that that decision may be without the farther alloy of suspense—in which I have now but too long been held, under circumstances perhaps uncontrollable—I will ask that it be speedily awarded.

FREEDOM OF ELECTIONS.

The bill introduced by Mr. Bell into the house of representatives on Wednesday the 25th ult. to secure the freedom of elections is as follows:

A BILL TO SECURE THE FREEDOM OF ELECTIONS.

Whereas, complaints are made that officers of the United States, or persons holding offices and employments under the authority of the same, other than the heads of the chief executive departments, or such officers as stand in the relation of constitutional advisers of the president, have been removed from office, or dismissed from their employment, upon political grounds, or for opinion's sake; and whereas, such a practice is manifestly a violation of the freedom of elections, an attack upon the public liberty, and a high misdemeanor; and

Whereas, complaints are also made that officers of the United States, or persons holding offices or employments under the authority of the same, are in the habit of intermeddling in elections, both state and federal, otherwise than by giving their votes; and whereas, such a practice is a violation of the freedom of elections, and a gross abuse, which ought to be discountenanced by the appointing power, and prohibited by law; and

Whereas, complaints are also made that, pending the late election of president and vice president of the United States, offices and employments were distributed and conferred, in many instances, under circumstances affording a strong presumption of corruption, or that they were conferred as the inducements to, or the reward of, influence employed, or to be employed, in said election; and whereas, such a practice, in the administration of the patronage of the government, will speedily destroy the purity and freedom of the elective franchise, and undermine the free system of government now happily established in these United States, therefore, to prevent the recurrence of any practices which may give rise to similar complaints in future,

Sec. 1. Be it enacted, &c. That, from and after the 4th day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, no officer, agent, or contractor, or other person, holding any office or employment of trust or profit, under the constitution and laws of the United States, shall, by the contribution of money, or other valuable thing, or by the use of the franking privilege, or the abuse of any other official privilege or function, or by threats and menaces, or in any other manner, intermeddle with the election of any member or members of either house of congress, or of the president or vice president of the United States, or of the governor, or other officer of any state, or of any member or members of the legislature of any state; and every such officer or other person, offending therein, shall be held to be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall pay a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars; and any officer other than the president, vice president, and judges of any of the courts of the United States, so convicted, shall be, thereupon, removed from office, and shall be, ever after, incapable of holding any office or place of trust under the authority of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to interfere with the right of suffrage as secured by the constitution: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall so operate as to prevent the president, or the head of any department, who is invested by law with the power of appointing inferior officers, from removing from office, at any time, any incumbent, who the president or the head of a department, as the case may be, shall be satisfied has intermeddled in any election, state or federal.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the 4th day of March, 1837, no officer who, by the constitution and laws of the United States, is authorized to appoint, or nominate and appoint, any officer or agent of the government, shall, by himself, or by any other person or persons in his behalf, give, or procure to be given, or promise to give, or procure to be given, any office, place, or employment to any person or persons whatsoever, with intent to corrupt or bribe him or them, or upon any agreement that such person or persons to whom, or for whose use, or on whose behalf, such gift or promise shall be made, shall exert his or their influence in any election, or by himself or themselves, or by any other person or persons, at his or their solicitation, endeavor to secure the election of any person or persons to represent any state, or any district in any state, in congress, or of any person to be president or vice president of the United States, or of any person to be governor or other officer of any state, or of any person or persons to be a member or members of the legislature of any state; and every such officer offending therein shall be held to be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall pay a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars; and any officer other than the president, or the judges of any of the courts of the United States, so convicted, shall be thereupon removed from office, and shall be incapable ever after of holding any office or place of trust under the authority of the United States; and every person who shall receive or accept, by himself, or by any other person or persons, in trust for or in behalf of such person, any office, place, or employment, with the intent aforesaid, shall be held to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall pay a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, be removed or dismissed from such office, place, or employment, and shall be incapable ever after of holding any office or place of trust under the authority of the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the several fines imposed by this act shall, when collected, be paid into the treasury as other moneys belonging to the United States.

ADMISSION OF MICHIGAN.

The following were the yeas and nays in the house of representatives on the 25th ult. on the passage of the bill from the senate for the admission of Michigan into the union:

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS,

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

[The following gentlemen compose the joint committee of the two houses of congress to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for president and vice president of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, viz:

Of the senate. Mr. Grundy, Mr. Clay, and Mr. Wright.

Of the house of representatives. Mr. Thomas, Mr. Cambreleng, Mr. Reed, Mr. Connor and Mr. Lyon.]

February 1. Mr. Nicholas' resolution calling on the secretary of the treasury for information obtained by special agents, in relation to alleged frauds on the public lands in the state of Indiana, having been amended and passed, (as stated in the last "REGISTER,") the senate resumed the consideration of the land bill. A series of amendments were offered, some of which were adopted and others rejected—but without taking a final vote, the senate, at about 7 o'clock adjourned.

[We will hereafter publish a detailed notice of the various amendments, &c.]

February 2. Mr. Moulton having qualified and taken his seat, Mr. Clay presented an address from certain living authors of Great Britain, requesting the passage of a law, by which their right of property in the works written and published by them may be protected—after a brief discussion, which shall have a place in our next, the memorial was, on motion of Mr. Grundy, referred to a select committee consisting of Messrs. Clay, Preston, Buchanan and Ewing, of Ohio.

Among the resolutions offered was the following: By Mr. Calhoun—Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to report to the senate, as early as practicable, the aggregate expense of collecting the duties on the lakes during the year 1836, including the expense of revenue cutters, the nett amount of duties collected, and the expenditure of the government on the lakes during the same period, in constructing harbors, breakwaters and light houses, with the current expense attending the light houses on the lakes during the year.

As stated in our last, the remainder of this day's session was taken up with the consideration of Mr. White's substitute for the land bill; without coming to any action thereon, the senate adjourned.

February 3. After the presentation and reference of petitions,

Mr. Davis, from the committee on commerce, to whom was referred the senate bill No. 79, made a written report, accompanied with a substitute for the bill; which substitute suspended, for one year, the tax of 20 cents each on American seamen, for a hospital fund, and appropriated $150,000, for one year, in lieu thereof, to be paid from the treasury. The report was accompanied with the following resolutions, calling on the secretary of the treasury for information on the subject:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be instructed to ascertain what it will cost to erect three hospitals, of suitable dimensions, for the relief of sick and disabled seamen and watermen upon the waters of the Mississippi river, at the most suitable places for that purpose; also, what it will cost to erect the same number, if needed, on the most important points on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be further instructed to draw up the project of a law to regulate the disbursement of funds for the relief of sick and disabled seamen, and for the government of hospitals erected for that purpose.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be instructed to enumerate those posts and places in the United States where, because suitable accommodations for the sick cannot be obtained, or from any other cause, there is a strong necessity for hospitals, and to make report upon this and the other instructions in those relations at the next session of congress.

Mr. Davis, after the reading of the report, asked for the immediate consideration of these resolutions; which requiring the unanimous consent of the senate, Mr. Calhoun who had not heard the report, expressed a wish that the resolutions might lie one day on the table.

Mr. Davis briefly explained the nature and objects of the bill and the resolutions, remarking that the bill was designed to supply the deficiency in the interim, while congress might obtain the requisite information, and mature and adopt some proper system on the subject.

Mr. Calhoun said he understood this to be the commencement of a change in the system as heretofore existing, by which the hospital fund was supplied by a tax on seamen. He believed that the great and prevailing disease of the times was centralism here; and he was utterly opposed to any thing which would tend to increase it. As soon as the system of affording relief to seamen from the treasury should commence, there would be no limitation; and he would, therefore, give his protest in advance against the measure proposed by the bill. He was opposed to opening all sluices to further expenses of the government, as tending to corrupt the public morals, and to endanger our institutions.

The burden (Mr. C. maintained) of relieving sick and disabled seamen did not fall on the seamen themselves, but on the particular branch of business in which they are employed, by which it ought to be borne; otherwise it would become, like harbors on the lakes and light houses, an improper burden upon congress.

Mr. Davis said he was not exactly willing that the measure should go off under such an impression. Mr. C. he thought, would withdraw his objection, if he had paid better attention to the subject. The hospital tax, Mr. D. maintained, fell on the wages of the sailor; and the senator would agree with him that no class required a higher degree of protection, or were more worthy and meritorious; and no class asked less of the government. When did the senator know a sailor to ask for any thing? Mr. D. had not known an instance in which a sailor had asked for a pension or any other grant. He would call the attention of the senator to a notable case, the destruction of the Philadelphia.—While a large number of people engaged in that portion of the service had been for a number of years asking congress for something, it had never been done by a sailor; it had been demanded by their representatives, and not by themselves.

But all this had nothing to do with this matter. It was thought that something ought to be done for this class of persons on the western waters, exposed to the peculiar diseases of that region, far away from their friends and the means of comfort. In order to effect this purpose, a tax of twenty cents each had been laid upon their wages by congress.—The government had not been so liberal as the senator supposed. The tax, indeed, proved inadequate to the purpose, and the government had every year appropriated more or less, not much, but enough to cover the expenses. The fund had been conducted, as far as Mr. D. was able to ascertain, with prudence and economy, and had been disbursed under the direction of the government. But there had been no law on the subject, though the committee thought it was best that it should be regulated by law.

Now, all Mr. D. proposed by the resolutions before the senate was, an inquiry as to the expense of erecting three hospitals on the western waters, and three on the Atlantic coast, and so many he was sure were needed. He did not propose now to commit the government to any course of policy.—In the bill there was indeed a proposition to change the policy for a single year; but the government then retained the matter in its own hands, to pursue such a course as might be found expedient and proper. The passage of these resolutions was as much wanted, if the bill should not pass, as if it should.

Mr. Calhoun said he knew the resolutions did not involve the principle to which he objected, but the bill did; and it was his design now to give notice that he should, therefore, oppose it. He agreed with the senator that seamen were a meritorious class, and that they were not importunate on congress. They would not do the mischief, but the persons interested in erecting and conducting the hospitals. Mr. C. again insisted that though the tax imposed on seamen was taken in the first place from their wages, it ultimately fell on the branch of business in which they were engaged; and the interest concerned ought to pay the expense. The patronage of the government, he maintained, ought not to be extended. He saw no reason why the government should pay the expense of sickness in one branch of business more than in another. They might just as well pay such expense in the cultivation of sugar, or rice, or cotton. The tendency of the government was already to the destruction of liberty, and he was opposed to every thing that would give impulse to that tendency. He had no objection to the resolutions, but hoped the bill would not receive the sanction of the senate.

Mr. Davis said he thought there was a very wide difference between the cases which Mr. Calhoun had made parallel. Legislation in regard to seamen commenced with the existence of this government, and was intimately connected with the subject of commerce, which was wholly subject to the legislation of congress; and one leading object in this connexion had been to cherish the employment of seamen as necessary to the defence of the country; and on this same account a preference had been given to American seamen in contradistinction from foreigners. Was there no difference between extending protection to these men, far from home, destitute of the means of comfort, and not addicted to laying up their wages, and those men who lived on plantations, directly surrounded with the means of health and comfort? And were the two classes equally important in providing for the defence of the country? Mr. Nicholas moved to amend the resolutions by inserting "the gulf," in connexion with "the Atlantic." Mr. Davis thought it was unimportant; the gulf was a part of the Atlantic, and the insertion of it might lead to the enumeration of bays and inlets. Mr. Nicholas preferred that it should be noticed more distinctly; and the amendment was accordingly adopted. The resolutions, as amended, were then adopted. The bill also was read, ordered to a second reading, and the accompanying report was ordered to be printed.

After several bills of minor importance, had been reported, read and ordered to a second reading—

Mr. Davis offered the following resolution, on which he asked immediate consideration, and accompanied it with an introductory explanation, as follows:

"Mr. Dodge, the consul at Bremen, represents his belief that the merchants of that place, who import goods to this country, evade the 7th section of the act of 1823, which requires that such persons should verify their invoices before the consul, by neglecting to take the oath before him. This implies that entries are fraudulently made here, by the perjury of those who take the necessary oath, or by the negligence of the custom house officers."

Resolved, That the letter of Mr. Dodge be referred to the secretary of the treasury, with instructions to inquire if any abuses, such as he intimates, are practised here, or in any other country, in the importation of goods into the United States; and to report to the senate, at the next session of congress, the result of his investigation.

The resolution was, by consent, adopted.

The following resolutions were offered, and by consent adopted:

By Mr. Linn—Resolved, That the committee on Indian affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety of making some compensation to the Iowa tribe of Indians for their interest in the lands ceded to the United States by the Sac and Fox Indians in the treaties of July 15, 1830, and 21st September, 1832, to which lands it was admitted in the treaty of August, 1825, the said Iowa Indians had a joint claim with the said Sacs and Foxes; and also into the expediency of negotiating with the deputation of Iowa Indians now in this city, for the extinguishment of their title to the lands to which the Sacs and Foxes and themselves have still a joint claim under said treaty of 1825.

By Mr. Swift—Resolved, That the committee on pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act of congress of the last session, granting pensions to the widows of deceased officers and soldiers of the revolution, as not to exclude from the benefit of its provisions any person who shall be a widow at the time of her application for a pension under said act, in consequence of her having married subsequent to the decease of her former husband, for whose services she claims the benefit of said act.

By Mr. Morris: (lies over one day)—Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary inquire whether the river Nile is navigable, and the navigable waters leading into the river St. Lawrence, which are declared by the ordinance for the government of the territory north west of the river Ohio to be common highways, and forever free to the inhabitants of that territory, as well as the citizens of the U. States, are so far within the power of the general government as that congress can provide by law for the regulation of steamboat and other navigation of the same, for the security of commerce, the prevention of casualties and accidents, and the recovery of damages for injuries from neglect, or purposely done, and for the punishment of acts of violence.

The bills from the house making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, and for the fulfilment of Indian treaties, and for the support of the army for 1837, were severally read twice, and referred.

The bill for the relief of John E. Wool was read a third time, and passed.

The senate were occupied until a late hour upon the land bill, which received a number of additional modifications. The question was at length obtained on striking out the whole to receive Mr. White's substitute, but it was negatived; yeas 14, nays 29.

Mr. Walker, now considering the bill and amendment as both lost, moved, as a last resort, to recommend the bill to the committee on the public lands and, pending this motion, the senate adjourned.

February 4. A message was received from the president of the United States through Mr. Jackson his private secretary.

Mr. Clay presented a list, on parchment, of additional names of British authors to the address which he had submitted the other day, and which by mistake he had not received. He moved that it be printed with the other names attached to the address, and that it be referred to the select committee raised on the subject: which was accordingly ordered. He also moved the appointment of an additional member of the select committee, which was ordered.

Mr. Clay also presented a petition from sundry American authors, praying amendments in the law of copy rights, which was, on his motion, referred to the select committee heretofore appointed.

Other petitions and memorials were presented and appropriately referred, when

Mr. Grundy, from the select committee on the election of president and vice president of the U. States, reported that some five or six cases had been found in New Hampshire, Connecticut and North Carolina, of electors of president and vice president having voted who had the same names with officers under the government; that the committee had confined their investigation to those states in relation to which charges had been made; that owing to the want of time, and the certainty that the number of spurious votes could not change the result of the election, the investigation had not been so full as it would otherwise have been; and that the committee had not made inquiry on the subject of a general law to prevent the casting of spurious votes. The report was read, and ordered to be printed.

Two resolutions accompanied the report: the first resolution providing that the two houses should meet on Wednesday next, at twelve o'clock, in the hall of the house, to determine and settle the election of president and vice president, in the usual manner, which was specified.

The second resolution provided that the votes of Michigan should be recorded, with a statement that if they were counted, the vote would be so; and if they were not counted, the vote would be so; and in either case the general result would be the same. Thus leaving the question of the genuineness of the Michigan votes undecided.

Mr. Grundy moved that these resolutions be now considered.

Mr. Hubbard inquired if the committee had examined the case of the pension agent in New Hampshire, (who was understood to have resigned his agency after he was chosen an elector).

Mr. Clay said in reply, that all the committee had concurred that the resignation of a government officer subsequent to his election as an elector could not remedy his constitutional disqualification; otherwise the whole design of the constitution would be defeated, in addition to the violation of its express injunction, that no officer under the government should be appointed an elector. The great object of this provision of the constitution was to secure the election against official influence which could not be done after the election.

Mr. Webster inquired if the committee had examined into the vote of Massachusetts.

Mr. Grundy said that had been omitted by him, because he did not believe the charge that one of the votes was spurious, and because it would have required a day's time to make the inquiry. He also said that a resignation, after being chosen an elector, could be of no avail.

Mr. Norvell asked a division of the question on the two resolutions. Michigan had given her vote while she was a state, and before the counting of the votes she had been solemnly admitted into the union. He would therefore protest against any measure which went at all to invalidate her vote.

Mr. Grundy said that in the 2d resolution the same course was pursued as formerly, in the case of Missouri. He thought that there was imminent danger in pursuing any other, on account of a difference which might arise between the two houses, which might defeat the election wholly. But if he were compelled now to give his opinion, he would say that the vote of Michigan was not valid.

Mr. Norvell said Missouri was not admitted to the union when her votes were counted; and Indiana was not admitted when her votes were counted.

Mr. Clay said he agreed with the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Grundy), that the committee had pursued the right course in the 2d resolution, relating to Michigan. Exactly the same course had formerly been pursued in regard to Missouri. The question in regard to Michigan was now to be left merely undecided; and he thought all would admire the discretion of their predecessors in congress, in avoiding a difficult question on this subject, till it became necessary that it should be decided. In the case of Indiana she had fully complied with the conditions of her admission into the union before her votes were cast, and there was therefore nothing wanting but a mere formality, which, in the case of Ohio and other states, had been dispensed with entirely.

Mr. Calhoun insisted that if it was proper to admit to their seats her senators and representatives, who were chosen prior to her admission into the union, it was equally proper to admit her votes for president and vice president, given under similar circumstances.

Mr. Lyon inquired what would be done if the vote of Michigan should decide the election. He would protest, with his colleague, against rejecting her vote.

Mr. Grundy said such a case had never occurred. And what would be done when it should occur, the wisdom of the day must decide.

Mr. Preston entered at considerable length into the argument which had been suggested by Mr. Calhoun, that Michigan, before her admission into the union, was fully as well qualified to elect a president as members of congress.

Mr. Webster said he wished the chairman of the committee had inquired into the alleged spurious vote in Massachusetts; but, as he had not done so, Mr. W. would say that the office of the gentleman who cast that vote had been some time vacated by him, and filled by another person before he cast it.

The first resolution was adopted without a division.

The second resolution was adopted by yeas and nays, on the call of Mr. Norvell, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis, Ewing, of Illinois, Ewing, of Ohio, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Ala. King, of Georgia, Knight, Linn, Moore, Nicholas, Page, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wright—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Fulton, Lyon, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Preston, Walker, Wall—9.

On motion of Mr. Grundy, the chair was authorized to appoint a teller for the senate.

After a number of reports had been received and disposed of, and several bills from the house had been twice read and referred, a struggle ensued as to the order of business.

Mr. Buchanan expressed his hope that the land bill would be taken up, and some final disposition made of it, so that the other business of the country might proceed. Mr. Walker expressed the same desire, and said that it was his intention to move that the bill be recommitted to the committee on public lands. Mr. Webster inquired of Mr. Walker whether, in the general bill reported by the latter to-day, there was not one section exactly the same as one of the sections in this land bill? Mr. Walker replied in the affirmative. Mr. Webster then observed that it was contrary to the rules of the senate that they should have two bills before them at the same time, for the same thing. He had no objection, as at present advised, to the principle to which the section related, which was that of the power of a state to tax the public lands within its bounds as soon as sold, and made the inquiry only that the due order of business might be preserved.

The senate then proceeded to take up the land bill; and the question being on the motion of Mr. Walker to recommit the bill to the committee on public lands, Mr. Webster inquired whether the motion had not been to recommit the bill, with all the amendments thereto which had been agreed upon in the senate, to the land committee. The chair replied that, by a rule of the senate, when a bill was recommitted to the committee which had reported it, all amendments dropped, of course, and it went back to the committee in its original form. A discussion arose on the point of order, which occupied the senate a considerable time, but which was finally arranged by the adoption of two distinct motions: one to recommit the bill, (which went back in its naked form); and another to commit to the same committee the several amendments made thereto, with the understanding that the committee would not, in again reporting the bill, change the great and leading points on which the senate had come to a deliberate decision; though, on points of minor consequence, and on those not decided, they would be considered as at liberty to modify it at pleasure. Before the question of recommitment was decided on, Mr. Calhoun took the floor on the negative of that question, in a speech in which he discussed the general merits of the bill, opposing it with great earnestness, and in the most decided manner. Mr. Calhoun having concluded, the question was taken by yeas and nays; and decided in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 20. So the bill was recommitted. And the senate then adjourned.

February 6. Nearly all of this day was spent in the presentation and disposition of petitions from various quarters of the union, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, &c.—They gave rise to considerable discussion, and several decisions of interest—of all which we must postpone an account until we have more room at our disposal.

Mr. Walker, from the committee on the public lands, reported, again, the land bill, with sundry amendments, which were ordered to be printed, and made the order for to-morrow.

And then the senate adjourned.

February 7. The following message was received from the president of the United States, through Mr. Jackson, his private secretary:

To the senate of the United States:

At the beginning of this session, congress was informed that our claims upon Mexico had not been adjusted, but that, notwithstanding the irritating effect upon her councils of the movements in Texas, I hoped, by great forbearance, to avoid the necessity of again bringing the subject of them to your notice. That hope has been disappointed. Having in vain urged upon that government the justice of those claims, and my indispensable obligation to insist that there should be "no further delay in the acknowledgment, if not in the redress of the injuries complained of," my duty requires that the whole subject should be presented, as it now is, for the action of congress, whose exclusive right it is to decide on the further measures of redress to be employed. The length of time since some of the injuries have been committed, the repeated and unavailing applications for redress, the wanton character of some of the outrages upon the property and persons of our citizens, upon the officers and flag of the United States, independent of recent insults to this government and people by the late extraordinary Mexican minister, would justify, in the eyes of all nations, immediate war. That remedy, however, should not be used by just and generous nations, confiding in their strength for injuries committed, if it can be honorably avoided; and it has occurred to me that, considering the present embarrassed condition of that country, we should act with both wisdom and moderation, by giving to Mexico one more opportunity to atone for the past, before we take redress into our own hands. To avoid all misconception on the part of Mexico, as well as to protect our own national character from reproach, this opportunity should be given, with the avowed design and full preparation to take immediate satisfaction if it should not be obtained on a repetition of the demand for it. To this end I recommend that an act be passed authorizing reprisals, and the use of the naval force of the United States by the executive against Mexico, to enforce them, in the event of a refusal by the Mexican government to come to an amicable adjustment of the matters in controversy between us, upon another demand thereof made from on board one of our vessels of war on the coast of Mexico.

The documents herewith transmitted, with those accompanying my message in answer to a call of the house of representatives of the 17th ultimo, will enable congress to judge of the propriety of the course heretofore pursued, and to decide upon the necessity of that now recommended.

If these views should fail to meet the concurrence of congress, and that body be able to find in the condition of the affairs between the two countries, as disclosed by the accompanying documents, with those referred to, any well-grounded reasons to hope that an adjustment of the controversy between them can be effected without a resort to the measures I have felt it my duty to recommend, they may be assured of my co-operation in any other course that shall be deemed honorable and proper.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Washington, February 6, 1837.

The message was read, and,

On motion of Mr. Buchanan, it was ordered to be printed, together with the accompanying documents, and referred to the committee on foreign relations.

A number of petitions were presented and variously disposed of; when Mr. Morris presented an abolition petition from Ohio, which was read at his request. Mr. Walker moved that it be not received. Mr. Hubbard moved to lay this motion on the table, which was done accordingly by yeas and nays, on the call of Mr. Morris, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Dana, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Alabama, King, of Ga. Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Parker, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Strange, Walker, White, Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Ewing, of Ohio, Hendricks, Knight, McKean, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Robbins, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson—11.

Mr. Bayard presented the preamble and resolutions of the legislature of Delaware, instructing their senators to introduce and support a resolution to rescind the expunging resolution of Mr. Benton, and to restore the journal of the senate to the state in which it was before this act of violence was committed upon it.

Mr. Bayard said it would be impracticable, or at least improper, to obey these instructions at this session of congress, as Mr. Benton's resolution must be regarded as expressing the sense of the senate as at present composed. But he gave notice that, in compliance with these instructions, he would introduce such a resolution at the next session, and would do so at every succeeding session, as long as he should continue a senator, till the object should be accomplished; which attempt he hoped would be followed up by every senator from Delaware. Being thus actuated by the same spirit of continence which had been so much lauded by the senator from Missouri, and which in his case had proved so successful, he hoped the day was not distant when they would restore the journal, and make it what he believed was, at this moment, the public sentiment of the people of the United States. He moved (after its reading) that the resolution be laid on the table, and printed.

Mr. Brown said he did not doubt the perseverance of the gentleman. He would also vote for printing the document, as a matter of respect to the legislature of Delaware; though in one case, which he instanced, he believed a motion to print such a document had not been carried.

The motion to print and lay on the table was then carried.

The following resolution was offered by Mr. White, and, by consent, adopted:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be, and he hereby is, requested to inform the senate whether commissions or any other compensation is allowed to officers of the army, or to other persons who receive salaries, monthly or daily pay for disbursing public moneys in payment of annuities to Indians, or for any other purposes connected with the Indian department, and, if so, what is the measure of compensation allowed or claimed, and to whom have such allowances been made, or by whom have such claims been set up.

Several resolutions of a private or local character having been offered and appropriately referred, various committees were discharged from the consideration of subjects referred to them; and others reported bills in favor of petitions, &c. referred to them, which were ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Hendricks, from the committee on roads and canals, reported a resolution appropriating $5,000, to make experiments on "the self-acting double safety valve" of Samuel Broad. Two thousand extra copies of the report were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Wright, from the committee on finance, reported, without amendment, the bill referred to them to amend the act establishing branch mints; and the bill, by consent, was considered, and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. W. also reported the bill making appropriations for the army for 1837, with a verbal amendment, and with notice that he should call it up to-morrow morning.

The resolution offered by Mr. Calhoun, calling on the president for information in regard to the aggression committed by the authorities of Bermuda on a southern vessel, freighted with slaves, which was driven by distress into the ports of Bermuda, being before the senate,

Mr. Calhoun explained the character of the aggression, expressing his surprise and regret at such an aggression by the authorities of a nation so just, honorable and humane as Great Britain. The resolution was then adopted.

The resolution authorising the distribution among the new senators of nineteen copies of the American state papers, published by Messrs. Gales & Seaton, coming up for consideration, it was, after a brief discussion, laid on the table on motion of Mr. Walker.

The other resolutions and unfavorable reports on the table (with two or three exceptions), were taken up and adopted.

The senate took up the land bill, reported with amendments from the committee on public lands; and the discussion of the bill and amendments occupied the senate to a late hour, when the amendments were finally agreed to, and the bill ordered to its third reading. The senate then adjourned.

February 8. The chair presented a communication from the war department relating to the compensation of Indian agents. Ordered to be printed, and referred.

Also, the report of the second auditor respecting trade and intercourse with the Indians. Ordered to be printed.

A message was received from the president of the United States, through Mr. Jackson, his private secretary, with communications from the war department, in relation to the treaty with the Sac and Fox Indians.

Mr. Webster addressed the chair nearly as follows:

I rise, Mr. President, for the purpose of presenting to the senate a petition signed by fourteen or fifteen hundred mercantile houses in the city of New York, praying the establishment of a national bank in that city. These petitioners, sir, set forth that, in their opinion, a national bank is the only remedy, of a permanent character, for the correction of the evils now affecting the currency of the country, and the commercial exchanges. The petition is accompanied by a short communication from the committee raised for the purpose of preparing the petition, in which they state what I believe to be true, from some knowledge of my own, that the petition is subscribed without reference to political distinction; and they inform us, on the authority of their own observation and knowledge, that, in their opinion, on no subject did the mercantile community of New York ever address congress with more entire unanimity than they now approach it, in favor of a national bank.

Mr. President, (said Mr. W.) my own opinions on this subject have long been known; and they remain now as they always have been. The constitutional power of congress to create a bank is made more apparent by the acknowledged necessity which the government is under to use some sort of banks as fiscal agents. The argument stated the other day by the member from Ohio, opposite to me, (Mr. Morris), and which I have suggested often, heretofore, appears to me unanswerable; and that is, that, if the government has the power to use corporations in the fiscal concerns of the country, it must have the power to create such corporations. I have always thought that, when, by law, both houses of congress declared the use of state banks necessary to the administration of the revenue, every argument against the constitutional power of congress to create a bank of the United States was thereby surrendered; that it is plain that, if congress has the power to adopt banks for the particular use of the government, it has the power to create such institutions also, if it deem that mode the best. No government creates corporations for the mere purpose of giving capacity to an artificial body. It is the end designed, the use to which it is to be applied, that decides the question, in general, whether the power exists to create such bodies. If such a corporation as a bank be necessary to government, if its use be indispensable, and if, on that ground, congress may take into its service banks created by states, over which it has no control, and which are but poorly fitted for its purposes, how can it be maintained that congress may not create a bank, by its own authority, responsible to itself, and well suited to promote the ends designed by it?

Mr. President, when the subject was last before the senate, I expressed my own resolution not to make any movement towards the establishment of a national bank, till public opinion should call for it. In that resolution I still remain. But it gives me pleasure to have the opportunity of presenting this petition, out of respect to the signers; and I have no objection certainly to meet with a proper opportunity of renewing the expression of my opinions on the subject, although I know that so general has become the impression hostile to such an institution, that any movement here would be vain till there is a change in public opinion. That there will be such a change I fully believe; it will be brought about, I think, by experience, and sober reflection among the people; and when it shall come, then will be the proper time for a movement on the subject in the public councils. Not only in New York, but from here to Maine, I believe it is now the opinion of five-sixths of the whole mercantile community, that a national bank is indispensable to the steady regulation of the currency, and the facility and cheapness of exchanges. The board of trade at New York presented a memorial in favor of the same object some time ago. The committee on finance reported against the prayer of the petitioners, as was to have been expected from the known sentiments of a majority of that committee. In presenting this petition now to the consideration of the senate, I have done all that I propose on this occasion, except to move that the petition be laid on the table and printed.

Sir, on the subjects of currency and of the exchanges of commerce experience is likely to make us wiser than we now are. These highly interesting subjects—interesting to the property, the business and the means of support of all classes—ought not to be connected with mere party questions and temporary politics. In the business and transactions of life men need security, steadiness and a permanent system. This is the very last field for the exhibition of experiments, and I fervently hope that intelligent men, in and out of congress, will co-operate in measures which may be reasonably expected to accomplish these desirable objects—desirable and important alike to all classes and descriptions of people.

The petition and accompanying letter were then ordered to be printed.

Mr. Morris presented a petition from a large number of the inhabitants of Lorraine county, Ohio, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and moved that it be received, read and referred. Mr. Grundy moved that the whole matter be laid on the table; and it was so ordered.

Other petitions and memorials were presented and several bills reported by various committees disposed of.

The bill to amend the act establishing branch mints of the United States was read a third time, and passed.

A message was received from the house of representatives, through Mr. Franklin, their clerk, informing the senate that the house were ready to proceed to count the votes for president and vice president of the United States.

The senate accordingly adjourned to the hall of the house.

The senate having returned to their chamber, and the president resumed the chair,

On motion of Mr. Grundy, a resolution was adopted for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on MARTIN VAN BUREN, and inform him of his election. And Mr. Grundy was appointed by the chair to act on the part of the senate.

Mr. Grundy then, from the joint committee on the election, reported a preamble and resolution, stating that no election of vice president of the United States had been made by the college of electors; that Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, and Francis Granger, of New York, were the highest on the list of persons voted for; and resolving that the senate do now proceed to elect one of these gentlemen vice president of the United States; and that senators give their votes, viva voce, in their places on the call of the secretary.

The resolution was agreed to, and the senate proceeded to vote accordingly, the result of which was as follows:

For Richard M. Johnson.

Mr. Benton, of Mo.	Mr. Morris, of Ohio.
" Black, of Mississippi.	" Mouton, of Lou.
" Brown, of N. C.	" Nicholas, of Lou.
" Buehanan, of Penn.	" Niles, of Conn.
" Cuthbert, of Georgia.	" Norvell, of Michigan.
" Dana, of Maine.	" Page, of N. H.
" Ewing, of Illinois.	" Parker, of Virginia.
" Fulton, of Arkansas.	" Rives, of Virginia.
" Grundy, of Tenn.	" Robinson, of Illinois.
" Hendricks, of Ind.	" Ruggles, of Maine.
" Hubbard, of N. H.	" Sevier, of Arkansas.
" King, of Alabama.	" Strange, of N. C.
" King, of Georgia.	" Tallmadge, of N. Y.
" Linn, of Missouri.	" Tipton, of Indiana.
" Lyon, of Michigan.	" Walker, of Miss.
" McKean, of Penn.	" Wright, of N. York.
" Moore, of Alabama.

For Francis Granger.

Mr. Bayard, of Del.	Mr. Prentiss, of Vermont.
" Clay, of Kentucky.	" Robbins, of R. I.
" Clayton, of Delaware.	" Southard, of N. J.
" Crittenden, of Ky.	" Spence, of Maryland.
" Davis, of Mass.	" Swift, of Vermont.
" Ewing, of Ohio.	" Tomlinson, of Conn.
" Kent, of Maryland.	" Wall, of N. Jersey.
" Knight, of R. Island.	" Webster, of Mass.

The president of the senate (Mr. King, of Alabama) then rose, and proclaimed the result of the election, as follows:

The whole number of senators of the U. S. is	52
Majority necessary to a choice	27
Quorum required by the constitution	35
Whole number of senators present	49
For Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky,	33
For Francis Granger, of New York,	16

From which it appears that RICHARD M. JOHNSON, having the votes of a majority of the whole number of senators, as required by the constitution of the United States, is duly elected; and I therefore declare that RICHARD M. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, has been chosen by the senate, in pursuance of the provisions contained in the constitution, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1837.

On motion of Mr. Grundy, a resolution was adopted for the appointment of a joint committee to inform R. M. JOHNSON of his election; and the chair was authorised to appoint the member thereof on the part of the senate.

On motion of Mr. Webster, the senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Feb. 3. Mr. W. B. Shepard from the committee for the District of Columbia, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That, on Wednesday and Thursday, the 15th and 16th days of February, this house will consider the bills relating to the District of Columbia, at 12 o'clock each day.

Several amendments were proposed, and disagreed to; and the question being taken, the resolution was rejected.

Mr. Jarvis from the committee on naval affairs reported the following resolution, which was concurred in:

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of instituting an examination of George's bank, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of forming an artificial island upon it, to lessen the perils arising from that most dangerous shoal, to every vessel approaching the eastern coast of the United States from foreign countries, and to vessels of the United States engaged in the coasting trade, between the eastern and southern states.

The house proceeded to the consideration of the resolution reported on yesterday by Mr. Sutherland, from the committee on commerce; which was read and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be requested to report to the house of representatives, at its next session, upon the propriety of establishing a system of telegraphs for the United States.

Mr. Reed, from the committee on naval affairs, reported the following resolution; which was read, and agreed to by the house:

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of building six sloops of war of the second class.

Sometime was spent in considering a resolution from the committee on commerce for the relief of John Kern, deputy collector, and John D. George, deputy naval officer of Philadelphia—but before coming to a decision thereon, the house proceeded to the private orders of the day: but on motion of Mr. Phillips, suspended the rule to enable him to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to inform this house of the progress which has been made in the arrangements for the surveying and exploring expedition, authorised at the last session of congress, and of the objects and measures to which said expedition is to be devoted, and also of the size and names of the vessels designated by the department to be employed in the exploring expedition with the number of the officers and men necessary to receive them, together with a statement of the expenditures already incurred in fitting out the expedition, and an estimate of the further expenditures which will be necessary until its successful termination, on the plan now projected.

The house, by consent, proceeded to the consideration of the resolution, when a motion was made by Mr. Robertson to amend the same, by striking out all after the word Resolved, and inserting as follows:

"That the secretary of the navy be directed to communicate to this house the number of vessels designed and fitted out, or now fitting out for the exploring expedition to the Pacific ocean and South seas, the class to which they respectively belong, the cost already incurred, and that which it is estimated will be incurred, in completing their equipment, the time when the expedition may be expected to sail, and its probable cost afterwards; also, whether either of the said vessels, or any other public vessel, has been put in requisition for the conveyance of general Santa Ana to Mexico or elsewhere; and, if so, the authority under which such requisition has been made, with all orders to and from the department in relation thereto."

And on the question to agree to this amendment, it was decided in the negative.

A motion was made by Mr. Mercer to amend the resolution by adding thereto as follows:

"Also, a list of the officers of the navy, the dates of their respective appointments, and the number of years that each has been at sea since the year 1814."

This amendment was disagreed to; and the resolution was then agreed to by the house.

The house proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution granting a pension to Susan Decatur, widow of the late commodore Decatur; which said resolution is as follows:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That Mrs. Susan Decatur, widow of the late commodore S. Decatur, be paid from the navy pension fund a pension for five years, commencing from the 30th June, 1834, in conformity with the provisions of the act concerning naval pensions and the navy pension fund, passed 30th June, 1834; the said pension not to be liable for her responsibilities on account of the debts of her late husband; provided that the said pension shall cease on the death or marriage of the said Susan Decatur.

A motion was made by Mr. Washington to amend said resolution by striking out the words "the said pension not to be liable for her responsibilities on account of the debts of her late husband," and inserting, in lieu thereof, the following: "and that she be allowed, from said fund, the arrearages of the half pay of a post captain from the death of commodore Decatur to the 30th June, 1834, together with the pension hereby allowed her."

To which amendment the following was offered by Mr. Mercer, and accepted by Mr. W. "And that the arrearage of said pension be vested in the secretary of the treasury in trust for the use of the said Susan Decatur."

Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, moved to commit the resolution to the committee on naval affairs; which was lost. The amendment of Mr. Washington was then agreed to, and the resolution as amended was then engrossed, read a third time, and passed, and sent to the senate for concurrence.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of war ad interim, transmitting a report of the survey of the harbor of Havre-de-Grace, and other documents connected therewith, called for by the house on the 30th of January.

The speaker laid before the house a report of the secretary of war ad interim, transmitting a report of the survey of James river, and other documents connected therewith, called for by the house on the 30th of January. Also,

A letter from the secretary of the navy, setting forth that it does not appear that any resolution has been received at the navy department directing a survey of the coast from the Rigolets to Mobile point. Information as to the progress made in said survey was called for by the house on the 30th ult.

The engrossed bill authorizing the secretary of the navy to place the name of Dr. John P. Briggs on the navy pension list, was read a third time and passed, and sent to the senate.

The following engrossed bills were also severally read a third time and passed, and sent to the senate. An act granting an increase of pension to Empson Hamilton; an act for the relief of Abigail Appleton. And the house adjourned.

Saturday, Feb. 4. Mr. Cushman presented the joint resolutions of the legislature of the state of New Hampshire, instructing her representatives in congress to use their influence to procure a reduction of the tariff, and in favor of such graduation and limitation of the sales of the public lands as will best promote the actual settlement and occupancy of the same. Also, to vote against any bill providing for the distribution of any moneys to the states, which may hereafter be in the treasury of the United States; or for any change of the law now in existence regulating the deposit of public moneys so as to distribute or relinquish the payment thereof.

Mr. Garland, of Virginia, from the select committee appointed to investigate the agency of the deposit banks, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the chairman of the select committee of investigation, appointed on the 2d of January, 1837, be directed to ask the house of representatives for an order to print so many copies of the journal of this committee as they may think proper to order, for the use of the members, to be printed, and laid on their tables with their report.

Mr. G. gave as a reason for asking that the journal be printed at this time, that the session was so near the close, and as the journal would be indispensable to the understanding of the report, there would not be time to print the former, unless the printing were now commenced.

On motion of Mr. Cave Johnson, the resolution was so amended as to restrict the number of copies to the ordinary number in cases of documents published for the use of the house, namely, one thousand and thirty.

And the resolution thus modified, was concurred in.

Some time was occupied in considering the report of the committee on commerce on the petition of John Kern and John D. George, which was finally laid on the table. Several bills, &c. were reported, among them the following:

Mr. Cambreleng, from the committee of ways and means, reported amendments to the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of government; which were committed to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Sutherland, from the committee on commerce, reported a bill making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors therein mentioned, for the year 1837; which bill was twice read, and committed.

On motion of Mr. Sutherland, the reports and surveys in relation to the harbors at Havre-de-Grace and James river were ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Thomas, the committee on the judiciary had leave to sit during the sittings of the house for the purpose of investigating the charges of official misconduct against judge Thruston, of the district court of the United States for District of Columbia.

The following engrossed bills, on motion of Mr. E. Whittlesey were read a third time and passed:

The bill to amend an act entitled an act to establish branches of the mint of the United States.

The bill respecting discriminating duties upon Dutch and Belgian vessels and their cargoes.

[At the suggestion of Mr. Adams this bill was so amended, by general consent, as to strike out the words "234th chapter."]

On motion of Mr. Garland, of Louisiana, the bill from the senate to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans, was read a third time and passed.

The house, on motion of Mr. E. Whittlesey, passed to the previous orders of the day; and the bill for the relief of David Kilbourn coming up on its final passage, an animated debate ensued, which was terminated by the previous question, moved by Mr. Reynolds, and the main question being taken, the bill was passed—ayes 83, nays 78.

The bill for the relief of Robert Waln was next taken up, and the question being on its third reading, a debate ensued, but before the bill was disposed of,

Mr. McKenna moved that the house do now adjourn, but withdrew his motion in order to afford opportunity to the committee of five appointed on a former day to make their report in relation to the counting and declaration of the votes for president and vice president of the United States; which report on motion was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Peyton asked the indulgence of the house to notice a matter personal to himself, which had appeared in the official journal of this morning.

Leave being given,

Mr. Peyton rose and said: The house would bear him witness that he had not been in the habit of annoying them with matters personal to himself which occurred out of doors. Now, however, he felt bound to request a moment's indulgence, not so much on his own individual account, as because it was due to the committee, and to the house of which he was a member. He (Mr. P.) referred to a statement which appeared in the Globe of this morning, which was as follows:

"If this statement be true, or even approach the truth, it is evident that a gross outrage was committed by Mr. Peyton towards a witness summoned to testify before the committee, and therefore under its protection; and an act of such disrespect to the committee itself, as should have subjected Mr. Peyton to its severest censure."

The statement of Whitney alluded to was not only untrue, but it did not even approach the truth. In answer to it nothing more was necessary for him to do than simply to state to the house the facts of the case, as they appeared upon the journal of the committee.

It would be sufficient to state that his friend from Ohio, (Mr. Hamer), though differing from him (Mr. P.) in politics, moved, on the conclusion of the occurrence in question, a resolution of censure against Reuben M. Whitney for insulting him, (Mr. P.) which passed unanimously. The committee had authorized him (Mr. P.) to publish this resolution, which he (Mr. P.) would lay before the house.

Extract from the journal of the committee of investigation, J. Garland, Chairman, Wednesday, Jan. 25, 1837.

By Mr. Peyton. Question 15—Did you receive any letter of recommendation from Roger B. Tane, or did he in any manner countenance or encourage you in applying for the agency contemplated, or did he positively refuse to recommend, receive, or countenance you in that capacity, while he was at the head of the treasury department?

Mr. Whitney. Answer—I decline answering this interrogatory; more particularly as the individual propounding it has asserted, positively and publicly, that the substance of the latter part of it is true, beginning with "or did he," &c. therefore, being the party accused, I am not a proper witness. I think, in justice that the individual who has made the allegation should be called to produce his proof.

The witness was desired to withdraw.

Mr. Hamer moved that the foregoing answer to the 15th question be returned to the witness, leaving no reply to the interrogatory, and disrespectful to a member of the committee.

The witness, (R. M. Whitney), immediately after the passing of this resolution, was brought into the committee room, out of which he had been sent, and the resolution of censure was read to him, (R. M. Whitney), and his answer was returned to him. He (R. M. Whitney) then apologized to the committee, and took back his answer, after which he peaceably answered the next question which was propounded to him, and such as before he had most indecorously refused to answer. This statement of the simple fact would at once show who was wrong in the occurrence referred to; it would show the unanimous decision of the committee to be that the witness was wrong, and his subsequent apology was an acknowledgment of it.

Having stated thus much, which he (Mr. P.) flattered himself was an ample refutation of the charges implied in the Globe, and other papers, perhaps it might not be unnecessary to relate what was the actual occurrence on the occasion referred to. His friend from Virginia, (Mr. Garland), and every other member of the committee, would do him the justice to say that he (Mr. P.) had in the first instance, treated Whitney with as much courtesy as he would have shown even to chief justice Marshall himself, if he had been alive and there; and for him (Mr. P.) to do so, when the course and conduct of the man to him (Mr. P.) was considered, it required on his part no little exertion of philosophy. He, (Mr. P.) however, had done so.

From the time the witness (R. M. Whitney) first came into the committee room he (Mr. P.) had put about sixty questions in regular succession, and at different times, to all of which he could not get more than ten or twelve answers; the witness threw them off contemptuously, denouncing them as inquisitorial, and this contemptuous course he (Whitney) repeated day after day, and night after night. It was manifest that he (R. M. Whitney) had totally mistaken the feelings which prompted his (Mr. P.) course, and from this indulgence in his insolence he made a miscalculation, and went at length too far; no doubt he imagined that because his card in the Globe had not been noticed by me, therefore, I was to be insulted with impunity. On the night of the occurrence (said Mr. P.) I put to him a question, in order to draw from him the truth of my statement, which he carded me for making; the question related to Mr. Tane's refusal to countenance him, but, as on former occasions, the witness would not answer, affirming that he had a right to demand from me proof of this matter, as I had stated it to be true. Sir, I suffered this conduct to pass unnoticed by me, both because he was a witness, and because I did not wish to enter into personal altercation with one who is as completely shielded from the notice of all honorable men by his infamy as a mad dog is by his hydrophobia. But, sir, he accompanied that answer with a scowl, a frown, an insulting look of defiance, directed boldly to me personally, which perhaps no one else then saw. I appealed, sir, immediately to the chair, to know if the witness should be permitted to insult me; I walked up to him, and said I would teach him better than to insult me, that I would let him know that I required no constitutional privilege to chastise him if he dared to insult me; that, if he did, I would put him to death on the spot. Sir, I used language which was harsh, for I was excited, as any man would have been who has a soul within him fit to be saved. The chair called to order, and I took my seat. He says I drew a pistol upon him: it is false. After I sat down, he rose and began again; I walked to him again, and he, at that moment, seemed as if he was about to use a weapon: he had his hand in his pocket, and, when I walked up to him, I put my hand in my bosom, but I drew nothing from it; every one present believed from his attitude he was armed with deadly weapons. My friend from Virginia (Mr. Wise) interposed; the witness was withdrawn, and the committee unanimously passed a resolution censuring his insulting behavior. As soon as I could, sir, I made an apology, which I felt due to the committee for having been transported by such provocation to lose the momentary command of my temper. The witness, on being again brought into the room, apologized for the insult, and was afterwards, as he had been by me before, treated with perfect respect, as due to his position as a witness. I think, sir, this explanation and statement of the facts is due to the committee and to the house; the prompt course adopted by the committee is alone a sufficient refutation of the false statements which have rendered this explanation necessary. I knew what was due to a witness, and I felt what was due to myself. I do not envy, sir, that wretch his calousness and insensibility, who, when assailed by a ruffian, would not, without regard to who he is, resist, if necessary, force by force. Grateful to the house for the indulgence which it has accorded to me, I shall not any longer occupy its time unnecessarily.

Mr. Peyton having concluded, then resumed his seat.

The resolution of the committee of investigation was then read by the clerk of the house.

Mr. Wise then rose and said—

Mr. Speaker: I request the same indulgence that has been granted to my friend from Tennessee, (Mr. Peyton), I request the indulgence not so much on my own account, personally, as in respect to the committee of which I am a member. I wish to show how the proceedings of that committee have been misrepresented and belied by that infamous wretch who has published his card in the Globe. From the first moment he, (R. M. Whitney) came before the committee, I saw, or thought I saw, in what his examination might result before its termination. It may have been imagination, but I anticipated his intentions from the start. He was evidently disposed to try my friend from Tennessee and myself. He had felt his way, for some time before, in the Globe. He tried our patience there by attempting to draw our attention towards him by his insulting cards and paragraphs. We both had failed to take any notice of him; we could not recognise him as a gentleman in any respect. His behaviour and manner, when he came before the committee, was that of a supercilious, self-important, contumacious and contemptuous witness. His answers to interrogatories were given in writing. He would write his answer at the table, and then, with an impudent air of nonchalance, would fold his arms, cock up his legs against the wall, and cast glances, full of defiance and expressive of contempt at me and my friend from Tennessee, as if anxious to insult us by his looks. To all this behaviour, sir, not a remark was applied; no notice of his insolence was taken; we treated him with quiet composure and decent respect, until emboldened by our forbearance, he went further; he behaved worse: he tried the experiment of being personal in his answers. His course, I think, was tentative; he wanted to see how far he might dare to go. The night this occurrence happened, I was sitting, with several of my colleagues of the committee, on a sofa in a corner of the room, on one side of the fireplace, conversing in perfect good humor, in a way certainly very agreeable to myself, telling anecdotes in whispers. The silence which reigned was broken only at intervals by the announcement of an interrogatory, or the reading of an answer. The answer to the question which caused the affray was announced; the attention of all to the reading of it was called. The witness was sitting at a table in the corner, on the opposite side of the fireplace from the sofa; a long table was sitting in front of the fireplace; the chairman and Mr. Peyton were sitting on the side next the fire, the former towards the end next the sofa, and the latter towards the end next the witness. The clerk was sitting on the opposite side of the table. The back of the chairman towards me, and when he read the answer, and Mr. Peyton looked around, it brought his, (Mr. P's) full face towards me. As soon as the answer was read, I looked at my friend, and saw he was flushed with excitement; his face beamed with indignation; no one could mistake his feelings. He first addressed the chairman, by saying, "Mr. Chairman, I wish you distinctly to inform the witness that he is not to insult me here." He was proceeding, when I arose, and remarked, "Mr. Chairman, the d—d insolence of this witness is insufferable, and has been borne long enough." He had, in fact, Mr. Speaker, declined to answer one question because it was "inquisitorial;" and because another was "inquisitorial," he declined to answer it, and had rung all the changes upon that word till, if reiteration could convince and supply the place of truth, one might have believed, from mere repetition, that the committee was, what it has been denounced to be, worse than a Spanish inquisition! Sir, he had received his cue.

But to proceed: My friend rose as I uttered these words respecting the witness, put me back with his arm, and said, "This is my business, Wise; not yours." And he walked straight up to the witness where he sat, and said to him nearly these words—I will endeavor to give his very words, however harsh: "You talk about my shielding myself behind my constitutional privileges. Now, I tell you that I claim no constitutional privileges to protect me from your insults in my presence; and you d—d thief and robber, if you dare to insult me here or elsewhere, to my face, I will put you to death on the spot!" The chairman had called me to order, and I had sat down; he immediately called my friend back to his seat. For it is but due, Mr. Speaker, to the chairman to say that he has done his duty, in all respects, on that committee. My friend took his seat, when the witness rose, and began to say, "Mr. Chairman, I have been summoned to appear before this committee, and I claim its protection." He did not finish the sentence before my friend rose, and told him to sit down. "Sit down, sir! you have no right to speak here but in writing, and you shall not utter a word; if you speak another word, I will!"

Sir, I do not remember here exactly what he said he would do; he used many harsh epithets, such as "d—d scoundrel." The witness uttered not a word, but he was standing, and immediately advanced his left foot, and put his right hand in his pantaloons' right pocket. I was standing then immediately behind my friend, and, seeing Whitney assume this attitude, I walked quickly around the end of the table, near to Whitney's left side. I expected him to draw a deadly weapon on my friend. I watched the motion of that right arm, the elbow of which could be seen by me; and, had it moved one inch, he had died upon the spot! That was my determination. Let me not be misunderstood or misrepresented. I mean to say that, if he had drawn his deadly weapon on my friend, it should never have done its execution. I considered my friend in imminent danger and stood prepared to arrest it—to prevent his life from being taken by a villain, who wore every appearance, and assumed the very attitude of an insidious assassin. Happily, I had no occasion to interpose, but in a friendly manner, to force my friend away, who had, seeing the position of the witness, put his hand in his bosom. I stepped in between them, took hold of Mr. Peyton, caught him by his waistcoat, and closed it. I told him Whitney's blood was not worth spilling, and was not fit to stain any man—he was not worthy of his notice. My friend sat down, saying, "Yes, he is worth my notice when he comes to my face and insults me. I would notice any d—d dog!" The chairman expostulated with him, and my friend replied, "You have not seen him, sir; he has been looking at me—looking at me, sir, and he shall not look at me again! I submit it to you, sir; whether I have not treated him as if he were a gentleman." The chair remonstrated against further disorder. Whitney had not uttered a word after he was ordered by my friend to be silent, and did not until after he had retired and returned to the committee room. Mr. Hamer had been speaking; the witness was requested to retire. Mr. Hamer offered the resolution you have heard read; it passed unanimously; witness was called in; the chairman returned him his offensive answer, and informed him of the resolution, and he immediately said, "Mr. Chairman, if I have been disrespectful to the committee I regret it, sir, and apologize for it." The clerk took down his words immediately, unknown to most of the members, and the committee, afterwards, when Mr. Hamer was about to move to insert the witness's apology, withdrew his motion, because the committee concurred unanimously, I thought, that the clerk had correctly recorded it already. Thus ended the whole affair.

I went to the chairman, to Mr. Hamer, Mr. Martin, and Mr. Fairfield, all, I think, of the committee, and begged them not to adjourn until my friend's excitement entirely subsided. I suggested that he should be permitted to ask another question or two, and that the committee should discharge the witness before it adjourned, so that Mr. Peyton might become calm, and not retire at the same time with the witness. This course was adopted, and successfully pursued. Whitney came back into the committee room, after he had retired, entirely humbled, I thought, and answered the next question propounded in the only becoming manner he exhibited at all. Such, sir, is a true statement of the whole transaction, and such was the part in it which I bore. I put it to the members of the committee to say whether what Whitney has published of my conduct on that occasion is correct; whether, with the exception of my first denunciation of his insolence; and of my after expression that he was not worthy of notice, my interposition was not peaceful. Sir, I acted on the occasion the part of pacificator. He says I approached him with my friend to ogle him and frown him down. It is true, I did approach him, and eye him, when I suspected his design to draw a weapon; I stood ready and watchful to protect my friend; but I call upon every gentleman on the committee, of all parties, friend or foe, to say whether I have not stated the facts truly. I say that no part or parcel, jot or title, of the statement of that infamous wretch, Whitney, is true, except the one statement of the question and answer. He states nothing as it occurred, and something that did not occur at all. I call upon the chairman of the committee, who should be the best witness, to say if these are not the facts.

Mr. Garland, of Virginia, said that it was extremely unpleasant to him at any time, and under any circumstances, to make a statement in reference to a personal controversy, but from the various hues in various directions which had been given to the transaction referred to by his colleague, (Mr. Wise), he thought it due to the committee, to the house, and to the country, that a correct statement should be made. Mr. G. said, without expressing any opinion in regard to the "card" referred to, or any other part of the transaction, he would simply say, that the statement of the facts and circumstances related by his colleague was substantially correct, and detailed very much as they happened. Some things stated he did not see; others occurred which were omitted, not affecting the substantial correctness of the narrative. Mr. G. said he did not see the scowl and contemptuous look which the gentleman from Tennessee states Mr. Whitney to have given him; his eyes were turned in another direction at the time it is said to have happened, but he distinctly remembers hearing the gentleman from Tennessee complain of it at the time, and as the principal cause of his excitement. Mr. G. said the occurrence was very sudden, and the gentleman from Tennessee was certainly very much excited. He said that, with a view to restore quiet, he stated to Mr. Whitney that a question would arise as to the disposition of his answer, and that he must retire, which he did. After Mr. Whitney had left the room, Mr. Peyton became more tranquil, apologized to the committee, and stated that he had been very much excited on account of the insult which he regarded as having been given him in the answer of Mr. Whitney, and the scowl and contemptuous look with which it was accompanied. Mr. Whitney was then called in, and the resolution of the committee in reference to his answer read to him; he then apologized to the committee in the terms contained in the copy of the journal of the committee just read.

Mr. Gillett then rose, and, after stating the difficulty of any two, much more, any nine, witnesses stating facts precisely alike, or agreeing in many, it might be, important particulars, said that many things which Whitney had stated were true, but he had been guilty of some omissions; he, however, would not undertake to detail what did occur, and he thought no one should, in this way, before the house, as what was said there might be equally misreported and misrepresented. But, if the house wished to know exactly what did occur on the occasion, it should order the committee to report the facts, and he, therefore, proposed to offer a resolution to that effect.

[This motion, the reception of it being objected to, was not in order at this time.]

Mr. Wise then again rose to conclude his remarks, which he had not finished before Mr. Gillett rose. He said: Sir, in continuation of my statement, I have to remark that my friend from Tennessee is pardonable for much he said and did on that occasion. He spoke many harsh words, but under the strongest excitement. We both looked upon Reuben M. Whitney as a base minion of executive power, who went there with a predetermination to insult us: he came backed, and endorsed, and prompted by the highest authority to brow-beat and taunt us, and to trample upon the power of a committee constitutionally raised by the representatives of the people to detect and expose his villainous connexion with the executive branch of the government. My friend regarded the wretch as a mere agent, a miserable tool of others—others the highest in power. It was too much, sir, to suffer his authorised insults. My friend did not treat him as an equal, but he was transported with passion at his insolence and effrontery. He did and said many things which became not himself, but which Whitney richly deserved. As soon as he became calm and cool, he apologized to the committee in the most respectful terms.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. Gillett) says that "many things which Whitney says are true." I repeat, sir, that no part or parcel, jot or tittle of his statement, except the question and answer, is true; it is wholly false in matter and manner; in fact, and coloring, and context—emphatically false—false in italics! His statement as to his apology when he returned to the committee, I venture to say no member of the committee will vouch; and that he makes especially a marked statement by words in italics. In this he is wilfully and brazenly false; and no member on the committee can endorse his statement. The gentleman from New York (Mr. Gillett) says he will not undertake here to make a statement. Sir, I care not whether he does or not. I have my statement, confirmed by my honorable colleague, (Mr. Garland), and that is all I want. It may be, sir, I don't say it is so—but it may be likely, that some gentleman who was present so lost his wits on the occasion that he could not make a statement if he were to try! Now it is proposed to couple the name of my friend in a resolution with that of R. M. Whitney. I hope, sir, the house will not so degrade my friend, by the association even of names. What! couple the name of a villain, pensioned for his perjury, with the name of Balie Peyton in the same resolution! Sir, if you had been present and witnessed the scene of that night, you would have been struck with the immense difference between the two men. I will tell you what you would have seen: you would have seen the high elevation of an honest, bold, courageous, manly, noble disposition, above a low, base, cowering, cowardly, dishonest wretch! That, sir, was the only spectacle you would have seen.—And I say, sir, let those of the two classes of spirits then present be respectively consorted together, and assimilated to each other!

Mr. Hamer (a member of the committee) said that he should not detain the house with any remarks of his, were it not for an observation that fell from the gentleman from Tenn. (Mr. Peyton), and had been repeated by the gentleman from Virginia, who last occupied the floor, (Mr. Wise).—They had stated that the gentleman from Va. had notified the members of the committee, that when this subject came before the house, he would call upon them to pronounce Mr. Whitney's card false in every part, except so much as related to the proceedings of the committee. If he (Mr. H.) now remained silent, after what had occurred, it might be inferred that he had borne testimony to the falsehood so charged. He did not intend that any such inference should be drawn. He agreed with the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Gillett), that no nine individuals who might be present at an affair of this kind could be found, who would afterwards state all the details alike; and at this time he would not go into details. As to Mr. Whitney's "card," he would neither pronounce it true nor false. He had, as he stated in conversation with the gentleman from Virginia the other day, read it but hastily, when it first appeared; and he had not taken the trouble to look at it since. But as he was up, he would say that, without going into particulars, the outlines of the transaction, as given by the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Virginia, were substantially correct.

He thought it due to himself to state what had been his own course in the matter. When the excitement took place, and the honorable chairman called "order," he (Mr. H.) rose and commenced making a speech, the object of which was to aid the chairman in producing order out of disorder. He had continued upon the floor, occasionally interrupted by other gentlemen, until he closed his remarks by submitting the resolution which was unanimously adopted by the committee. He thought the resolution due to the committee, due to the individual member involved, and due to the witness himself, who had in some measure provoked what followed.

His (Mr. H.'s) opinion was, that a witness called before a committee, having an interrogatory propounded to him, ought either to answer or to decline. If he declined answering a question, that was enough. He had no right to proceed further, and make remarks about the committee, or an individual member of it, which were of a personal character, or which reflected upon them in any manner disrespectfully. Such a practice could not be tolerated, and the committee were unanimously of that opinion.

After this sudden gust of passion, this momentary excitement, the gentleman from Tennessee expressed his regret, and apologized to the committee for what had taken place on his part. The witness was called back, and apologized to the committee for any thing he had done of a disrespectful character. He (Mr. H.) had hoped the whole matter would have remained there; but it seemed that by some means it had got out, and was travelling through the country in the newspapers. False and exaggerated statements, in regard to it, were no doubt circulated in public journals; and although he deprecated all discussions of this sort, yet he thought the gentleman from Tennessee perfectly justifiable in bringing the subject before the house, for the purpose of making a statement in his own defence.

Having said thus much, he would trouble the house no further.

Monday, Feb. 6. Mr. Thomas asked the general consent of the house, at this time, to take up and consider the report from the joint committee of the two houses on the mode and manner in which the votes of president and vice president should be counted.

The speaker said that the report had been sent to the official printer on Saturday, and had not yet been returned; but a messenger had been despatched for it.

Messrs. Peyton and Martin, members of the judiciary committee, and also of the select committee of investigation, of which the hon. J. Garland is chairman, were, on their several motions, released from further attendance on the former committee, with a view to attend on the latter, which has leave to sit during the sessions of the house.

A message was received from the senate, informing the house of its concurrence in the report of the joint committee appointed to consider and report upon the mode of counting out the votes for president and vice president of the United States.

Mr. Thomas moved that the house concur with the senate in the report and resolutions thereto appended, as reported by him to this house on Saturday evening, as follows:

The committee on the part of the house of representatives, "appointed to join such committee as might be appointed on the part of the senate, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for president and vice president of the United States, of notifying the persons elected of their election; and also to inquire into the expediency of ascertaining whether any votes were given at the recent election contrary to the prohibition contained in the second section of the second article of the constitution; and, if any such votes were given, what ought to be done with them; and whether any and what provision ought to be made for securing the faithful observance in future of that section of the constitution,"

REPORT: That the short period at which they were appointed before the day on which the votes for president and vice president of the United States have to be counted, has prevented them from investigating the facts submitted to their examination as fully as might have been done had more time been allowed. The correspondence which has taken place between the chairman of the committee and the heads of the different departments of the executive branch of the government, accompanies this report, from which it appears that Isaac Waldron, who was an elector in New Hampshire, was, at the time of his appointment as elector, president of a deposit bank at Portsmouth, and was appointed and acting as pension agent, without compensation, under the authority of the United States; that, in two cases, persons of the same names with the individuals who were appointed and voted as electors in the state of North Carolina, held the offices of deputy postmasters under the general government. It also appears that in New Hampshire there is one case; in Connecticut there is one case; in North Carolina there is one case, in which, from the report of the postmaster general, it is probable that, at the time of the appointment of electors in these states respectively, the electors or persons of the same names were deputy postmasters. The committee have not ascertained whether the electors are the same individuals who held, or are presumed to have held, the offices of deputy postmasters at the time when the appointment of electors was made; and this is the less to be regretted, as it is confidently believed that no change in the result of the election of either the president or vice president would be effected by the ascertainment of the fact in either way, as five or six votes only would in any event be abstracted from the whole number, for the committee cannot adopt the opinion entertained by some that a single illegal vote would vitiate the whole electoral vote of the college of electors in which it was given, particularly in cases where the vote of the whole college has been given for the same persons.

The committee are of opinion that the second section of the second article of the constitution, which declares that "no senator, or representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector," ought to be carried in its whole spirit into rigid execution, in order to prevent officers of the general government from bringing their official power to influence the elections of president and vice president of the United States. This provision of the constitution, it is believed, excludes and disqualifies deputy postmasters from the appointment of electors; and the disqualification relates to the time of the appointments, and that a resignation of the office of deputy postmaster after his appointment as elector would not entitle him to vote as elector under the constitution.

Should a case occur in which it became necessary to ascertain and determine upon the qualifications of electors of president and vice president of the United States, the important question would be presented—what tribunal would, under the constitution, be competent to decide? Whether the respective colleges of electors in the different states should decide upon the qualifications of their own members, or congress should exercise the power, is a question which the committee are of opinion ought to be settled by a permanent provision upon the subject.

The committee at present, and in part, report the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the two houses shall assemble in the chamber of the house of representatives on Wednesday next at twelve o'clock, and the president of the senate shall be the presiding officer; that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the senate, and two on the part of the house of representatives, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the president of the senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected president and vice president of the U. States; and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the journals of the two houses.

Resolved, That, in relation to the votes of Michigan, if the counting or omitting to count them shall not essentially change the result of the election, they shall be reported by the president of the senate in the following manner: were the votes of Michigan to be counted, the result would be, for A B for president of the United States, — votes; if not counted, for A B for president of the United States, — votes: but in either event, A B is elected president of the United States. And in the same manner for vice president.

In answer to an inquiry from Mr. Mercer, Mr. Thomas said that the joint committee had ascertained that there were five of the electors, namely, one from the state of New Hampshire, three from North Carolina and one from Connecticut, who bore the same names as individuals who held the offices of deputy postmasters under the general government. The committee had therefore concluded that they were the same persons, and, if so, five persons had voted who held offices under the general government. The committee had also unanimously concluded that, whether these votes be counted or not, the result of the presidential election could not be affected. The committee had not recommended to the house to reject these votes. It would be a delicate power for congress to assume, and the question arose whether the subject did not properly belong to the electoral college. The committee expressed their decided disapprobation of any interference of those officers in the election, and proposed, in a future report, to provide for similar cases hereafter, and to give either to congress or the electoral college power to reject these votes.

Mr. Cambreleng said there was one point to which he wished to call the attention of the house, and that was, that all these individuals had resigned their offices before they gave in their votes.

After some remarks from Mr. Thomas and Mr. Mercer, Mr. Cary called for a division of the question. Mr. C. contended that the votes of Michigan ought to be received in the same way as the votes of any other state in the union; for if it should turn out that there were no election by the electoral college, it must be seen that the vote of Michigan must be taken in this house for president, and in the other house for vice president. He could not conceive that it was the business of the house to decide on the character of these votes.

And, the question being taken, the first resolution was concurred in.

And, the question being taken, the second resolution was concurred in.

The house refused to suspend the rules to enable Mr. O. Allan to offer a resolution that the house will, on Thursday next take up, in committee of the whole, a bill extending the provisions of an act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the revolution.

The unfinished business was the petition presented on Monday last from certain citizens of the state of Kentucky, praying liberal pecuniary aid from congress in favor of the objects of the Colonization society.

The said petition had been referred to the committee on foreign affairs: and the question now pending was the motion heretofore submitted by Mr. Adams, to reconsider the vote by which the petition had been referred to the said committee. Considerable discussion now ensued, and finally the motion to reconsider, was, on motion of Mr. Patton, laid on the table. Ayes 121, noes not counted.

A similar petition, presented on Monday last, came up as the unfinished business, on the motion to refer the same to the committee on foreign affairs. On motion of Mr. Jarvis, the whole subject was laid on the table.

Mr. Briggs presented a preamble and resolutions from persons of various employments in the county of Berkshire, state of Massachusetts, assembled in public meeting at Pittsfield, remonstrating against the passage of the bill reported from the committee of ways and means, in relation to the tariff.

On motion of Mr. B. the preamble and resolutions were read, and Mr. B. intimating his intention to submit some remarks to the house, the preamble and resolutions lie over one day under the rule.

Mr. Pierce, of New Hampshire, was, on his motion, discharged from the further attendance on the judiciary committee, of which he is a member, in order to attend on the select committee of investigation, of which he is also a member, and which has leave to sit during the sittings of the house.

Petitions and memorials were called for in the order of states and territories, and were presented by Mr. Jarvis, of Maine, Messrs. Cushman and Bean, of New Hampshire, and Messrs. Phillips, Briggs, Lawrence, Cushing, Reed, Calhoun and Adams of Massachusetts. Mr. Adams having presented certain petitions from other states than that of which he is a representative,

Mr. Robertson raised the question of order, whether one member had a right to present petitions from other citizens than those of his own state.—The speaker said it had been the uniform practice of the house that a member might present petitions from any state in the union, provided those petitions were bona fide sent to him for presentation by the citizens interested in them. If one member were to transfer his petitions to another for presentation, the question would then come up in a different form. Mr. Robertson appealed from the decision, but withdrew the appeal. And Mr. Adams having proceeded to present a petition from certain inhabitants of New Hampshire, Mr. Boon renewed the point of order; and the speaker having repeated his decision, Mr. Boon took an appeal therefrom. The appeal was debated by Messrs. Boon, Hardin, Mercer, Vinton, Lane and Vanderpoel. When to save time, Mr. Boon withdrew the appeal. Mr. Chambers, of Kentucky, renewed it. Mr. Patterson demanded the previous question. Mr. Glascock asked the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw the motion, on a promise to renew it, so as to enable him (Mr. G.) to submit a remark. Mr. Patterson did not withdraw it; and the house seconded the demand for the previous question. Mr. Glascock called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question, which were refused; and the main question was ordered to be now taken. Mr. Davis called for the yeas and nays on the main question, which were ordered. And the main question "Shall the decision of the chair stand as the judgment of the house?" was taken and decided in the affirmative—yeas 139, nays 29. So the house affirmed the decision of the chair.

Mr. Adams said he wished the house to recollect that more time, thrice told, had been consumed in debating this appeal than he had taken up, or should take up, in presenting all his petitions. He hoped, therefore, the house would not hold him responsible for the consumption of time.

Mr. Adams thereupon presented sundry other petitions.

Mr. A. said he presented the petitions of nine ladies of Fredericksburg, in the state of Virginia. He would not name them, because, from the disposition which at present prevailed in the country, he did not know what might happen to them if he did name them. It was not a petition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, but it was a petition praying congress to put a stop to the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

This was one of those petitions which had seemed so strange to him when he received it, that he did not feel a perfect security that it was genuine, and to which he had alluded when he first began the presentation of his petitions. It was sent to him, purporting to be the petition of nine ladies, not one of whom should be named by him. Whether it was genuine or not, it was not for him to determine.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table under the resolution.

The remainder of this day was consumed in a series of unpleasant discussions and motions growing out of an announcement by Mr. Adams that he had a petition from twenty-two persons who declared themselves to be slaves. The particulars of all that transpired on this and subsequent days, are promised in the "Intelligencer," and shall be duly laid before our readers. The question pending at the time of adjournment was on a motion for censure of Mr. Adams (moved by Mr. Thompson, of S. C. being a modification of previous motions) for having "trifled with the house."

Tuesday, Feb. 7. The sitting of this day opened with the unfinished business of yesterday, being a proposed vote of censure on the hon. John Quincy Adams, a member of this house, for his course in reference to a certain petition; and the subject, in different shapes, occupied the whole of a very long day's session. No question having been taken, at six o'clock the house adjourned.

[As before stated we will in the next "REGISTER," publish a detailed statement of all that has transpired in relation to the above case.]

Wednesday, Feb. 8. Mr. E. Whittlesey proposed that, as the house, would proceed, at the hour of twelve, to the special order, (being the performance of a constitutional duty,) the question of privilege under consideration at the adjournment of the house on yesterday should be postponed, and that the house should proceed to the usual morning business.

Objections having been made, Mr. Whittlesey moved to suspend the rule, to enable him to submit a motion to the above effect.

And, the question being taken, the rule was suspended.

The question on the motion of Mr. E. Whittlesey, to postpone the further consideration of the question of privilege, was then taken, and decided in the affirmative.

So the house passed to the usual morning business.

The speaker, by general consent, laid before the house a communication from the secretary of war ad interim, transmitting, in compliance with one of the requirements of the 13th section of the act of June 30, 1834, organizing the Indian department, a list of persons engaged in that branch of the public service in the year 1836, their compensation, &c. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the secretary of war ad interim, transmitting abstracts of the general returns of the militia of the United States, and of their arms, accoutrements and ammunition, for the year 1836. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the secretary of the treasury, enclosing copies of correspondence with his office, in compliance with a resolution of the house of representatives, dated the 30th ultimo, as to the land office at Fort Wayne.

On motion of Mr. Lincoln, referred to the committee on public lands, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a message from the president of the United States, in compliance with the resolution of the house of representatives of the 3d instant, relative to the exploring expedition: and adding, that "he trusts all facilities will be given to this exploring expedition that congress can bestow, and the honor of the nation demands."

On motion of Mr. Phillips, of Mass. the message and accompanying documents were referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a message from the president of the United States, relative to the condition of affairs between the United States and Mexico. [The same as presented to the senate yesterday—see page 378.]

The message having been read,

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the message and accompanying documents were referred to the committee on foreign affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the secretary of war ad interim, enclosing copies of orders issued by that department respecting calls for "volunteers or militiamen," called for by a resolution of the house of representatives, dated 26th December. Referred to the committee on public lands and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the secretary of war transmitting copies of all such accounts as have been rendered by persons charged with disbursements of money, goods or effects, for the benefit of the Indians, for the year ending on the 30th September; which was referred to the committee on Indian affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Lincoln from the committee to investigate the condition of the various executive departments, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee of the house, appointed under the resolution of the 17th of January last, be authorized to direct the printing of as many copies of the journal of their proceedings as they may think proper, for the use of the members, to be laid on their tables with the report of the committee.

On motion of Mr. C. Johnson, the resolution was so modified as to read "not to exceed 1,030," (this being the usual number). And the resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. Ashley, from the committee on Indian affairs, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on Indian affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment of such portion of annuities to the Missouri band of the Sac and Fox nation of Indians as may appear due to them, under the several treaties of 1804, 1824 and 1832, and of granting to them such other relief as the circumstances attending their application for payment may appear just and proper.

The said resolution was read and agreed to by the house.

Several bills were read twice and committed, and some other business of minor importance transacted; when, the hour of twelve having arrived, and messages to that effect having been interchanged between the two houses, the senate, in a body, entered the hall preceded by their president and secretary, and were received by the members of the house standing, uncovered.

The president of the senate presided, the speaker of the house sitting on his right hand.

The tellers, Mr. Grundy, of the senate, and Mr. Thomas and Mr. Lincoln, of the house, having taken their seats, the return of electoral votes from each state was opened, read and recorded, the result of the whole number of votes being as follows:

Number of electors for each state.	STATES.	For president.					For vice president.

After the counting of the votes was completed, and the result declared—

The president of the senate proclaimed that MARTIN VAN BUREN was elected president of the United States for four years from the third day of March next; and that for vice president no person voted for had a majority of the whole number of votes, R. M. JOHNSON and FRANCIS GRANGER being the two highest on the list.

The announcement was received with perfect decorum by the house and galleries.

The senate then withdrew to their hall; and the house adjourned.

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In the senate. On motion of Mr. Grundy, from the committee on the election of president and vice president, it was Ordered, That the secretary of the senate inform the house of representatives, that the senate have elected RICHARD M. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, vice president of the United States, for four years from and after the 4th of March next.

After some other business had been disposed of, Mr. Calhoun offered a bill to cede the public lands to the new states on certain conditions, which bill was, after discussion, laid on the table.

Mr. Calhoun then rose in his place and stated that he had been honored with a communication from the chief magistrate in reference to his course with regard to the bill, which he should take occasion now to bring before the senate. He then sent to the secretary's table the following letter.

[We regret, (says the Intelligencer), that we are not able at present to give a copy of this letter. Referring to a report of his speech in the Globe, Mr. Calhoun is charged with having asserted that the president has been concerned in speculation in public lands; that the removal of the deposits was a preparatory measure, and the land bill its consummation. It contradicts the truth of the assertion, and calls on Mr. Calhoun to retract the charge in the senate; in case of his refusal to do so, the president threatens to publish his letter before leaving the city.]

The letter was accompanied by a certificate of a person present in the gallery during the delivery of the speech, and of Mr. Drake, a reporter for the Globe, that the report in the Globe states correctly what was said by Mr. Calhoun.]

Mr. C. said it was not his intention to comment on the extraordinary contents of this letter. It excited in his bosom no emotions but pity for its author, contempt for its menace, and humiliation that the chief magistrate of the United States should place himself in such an attitude. Nor was it his intention to ask protection there, as the representative of a sovereign state: he was competent to the defence of his own reputation, and so far from being intimidated by such a communication from the discharge of his duty, its only effect was to embolden him the more in denouncing corruption, whether in high or in low places. As to the privileges of that body, he should leave it to the body to defend its own rights. Much less was it his intention to comply with the demand of the president. Demand was a term which belonged to equals. In the public relation he sustained as a member of the senate, he felt himself at least equal to the president of the United States. As a senator, (said Mr. C.) I may judge him, he cannot judge me.

I rise to reiterate here in my place, and to the fullest extent, all I before said, and to afford to the friends of the administration an opportunity to correct the error, if there was one; in which case, I am ready at once, and on the spot, to retract the error. Mr. C. then went into a recapitulation at large of the substance of that part of his speech to which the president's letter had reference.

Mr. Grundy, Mr. Walker, and Mr. Clay successively occupied the floor in speeches which we shall present as soon as published.

The land bill was then read a third time, and the question being on its passage,

Mr. Davis spoke at length in opposition to it; Mr. Tipton, in explanation of the grounds of his vote in its favor; Mr. Ewing and Mr. Clay, in decided opposition to it on constitutional among other considerations;

When, the question being at length obtained, the bill was passed by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King, of Ala. Linn, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Kent, King, of Georgia, Knight, McKean, Morris, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—23.

The title was amended by adding the words, "and for other purposes."

[For a synopsis of the bill see page 369.]

The house of representatives was occupied the whole day in considering Mr. Adams' case, but did not come to any final action. Particulars hereafter.

DOMESTIC CHRONICLE.

To merchants. By a recent decision of the secretary of the treasury, the proof of the damage upon goods must be lodged in the custom house, within ten running, (not ten working) days after their landing, or it will not be allowed.

The Cincinnati Post of the 27th ultimo, says—"There are not less than one hundred thousand barrels of flour in the towns upon the Ohio river, from Pittsburgh to its mouth, waiting a clear river and a good stage of water to be sent to market."

A correspondent of the Boston Daily Advertiser, in an article on the subject of British and American steamboats, estimates the tonnage of the latter, at the present time, at 150,000 tons—being probably three times as many as are in all Great Britain, and twice as many as are in all the world, including Great Britain. The cost of the American boats is estimated to be about thirty-six millions of dollars.

New York banks. According to the bank commissioners' report, there are now in operation in the state of New York, 98 banks and two branches. Ninety of these together with the branches, are subject to their supervision. The resources of these banks on the first January, were $106,818,952, and their liabilities were $68,912,849. The banking capital within that state has nearly doubled since 1st January, 1832.

Contested election. The committee in the Virginia house of delegates, appointed to report on the contested election from Powhatan, between Mr. Hopkins and Mr. Scott, presented a report of one hundred pages, in favor of Mr. Hopkins. The sitting of one day disposed of only four pages of the report.

It would seem that all the principal cities on the Hudson, following the example of Poughkeepsie, are to have each daily lines of steamboats plying to New York. Hudson is to have not only a daily but a semi-weekly line to New York, and two daily lines to Albany.

Children in factories. The citizens of Pittsburgh have directed their attention to an amelioration of the condition of children in factories. The Mercury says, "a meeting on this subject was held on Monday evening. The committee reported 1,487 signatures to the memorials to the legislature; and about 40 papers not returned. A committee was appointed to transmit the memorials to the legislature, and one to receive additional signatures."

If there be cruelty practised in factories, to the children employed there, or if their labor is too great or protracted for the immature state of their powers, the evil should be investigated and corrected.

The number of patients treated under the direction of the Philadelphia northern dispensary during the year 1836 was 533, of whom 464 were cured, 16 died, and 22 remain under treatment. The receipts of the institution during the period above mentioned amounted to $1,186, including a balance from the previous year of $199; and the expenditures were about $675, leaving a balance in the treasury of about $515.

Letters from Valparaiso, via Rio Janeiro, dated 22d October, announce the loss of the ship William Byrnes, capt. Macoduck, during a violent gale in the harbor of Valparaiso. The principal part of the cargo had been landed previous to the gale. The captain, crew and passengers were saved, with the exception of one seaman.

The lower house of the Missouri legislature has passed the mammoth bank bill by a vote of 46 to 25. The mother bank is to be at St. Louis, and branches are to be established in other parts of the state.

The bill to expel all foreign bank agencies from the state, which had passed the house, was also passed by the senate in an amended form, so as to give it effect on the 15th instant in all cases. The amendment, it is supposed, would be concurred in by the house.

Land office frauds. The N. Y. Express says, a correspondent at Kalamazoo, Michigan, has sent us a letter dated Jan. 25th, from which we make the following extract:

"The persons employed in the land office at Gonia, have been detected in defrauding government to a large amount. They entered several hundred of the choicest lots, and employed agents to sell them at the east. The affair has produced a great excitement here, and will probably lead to an investigation of the transactions of this office."

An express mail lost. The express mail that left New York on Tuesday, the 26th ult. was lost overboard, or stolen from the boat between Perth and South Amboy.

An abolition convention assembled at Harrisburgh, Pa. on Tuesday last, about 150 delegates being in attendance. Dr. Le Moynes, of Washington county, was elected president. They formed a state anti-slavery society. Their sittings were held in Alter's tavern; the house of representatives, by a vote of 66 to 19 having rejected their application to hold their deliberations in the hall of that house.

High price of grain. In the city of New York, within a few days past, 5,000 bushels good white German wheat have been sold at 215 cents a bushel. A cargo of 15,000 bushels, very prime, of the crop of 1836, is held at 250 cents. 5,000 bushels rye on the spot sold at the high price of 170 cents per bushel for distillation.

In the legislature of Pennsylvania, there are farmers, 48; lawyers, 14; merchants, 10; cabinet makers, 4; physicians, 2; gentlemen, 2; carpenters, 2; hatters, 2; millwrights, 2; printers, 2; tanner, 1; miller, 1; grocer, 1; artist, 1; blacksmith, 1; accountant, 1; shoemaker, 1; inn keeper, 1; engineer, 1; surveyor, 1; geological surveyor, 1; silver plater, 1.

Birth places. Pennsylvania 91; Jersey 4; Vermont 1; Rhode Island 1; Ohio 1; Virginia 1; Connecticut 1.

In the legislature of Maryland, there are farmers, 40; lawyers, 12; doctors, 8; merchants, 3; teachers, 3; tanners, 2; inn keepers, 2; manufacturer, 1; blacksmith, 1; tailors, 2; fisherman, 1; clerk, 1; coach maker, 1; miller, 1; collector, 1; printer, 1—80.

The wheat crop. A letter to the editors of the National Intelligencer, dated Amherst county, (Va.) Jan. 25, says: "Never was there so gloomy a prospect for wheat in this section, as there is at present. In looking over our immense wheat fields, even the rich bottoms of James river, scarce a green spot is seen, to relieve the eye from its gaze on the cheerless waste of rocks and clods. Flour is now $12 a barrel, and unless a rapid improvement in the wheat crop takes place in a short time, it will not, in my opinion, be less than from 15 to $20. Many consider the crop as beyond recovery, believing that the almost unprecedented frosts of November and December destroyed the vitality of the seed."

Case of Harry White. We neglected to state that Harry White, who was tried as the accessory of Richard H. White in the destruction of the treasury buildings, has been sentenced to ten years imprisonment in the penitentiary of the District of Columbia.

In the legislature of Rhode Island, during its recent session, a member introduced resolutions instructing the representatives of that state in congress to endeavor to procure the passage of an act abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia.—They were rejected by a vote of 46 to 7.

Mortality in Boston. According to the bill of mortality the past year, the whole number of deaths in the city of Boston was 1,770, being less than the number during the preceding year, by 444. The greatest number in any one month was in October, being 201. The least number was in May, being 97. The deaths by lung fever, 82; typhus fever, 47; intemperance 42; accidental, 31; suicide, 13; consumption, 233. The number of deaths under one year, was 872, viz: 189 males and 183 females.

A public meeting was lately held at Mercer, Pennsylvania, of citizens friendly to the construction of a rail road from Beaver to Warren, Pennsylvania, by the way of Mercer and Franklin. This proposed route would intersect the Philadelphia and Erie rail road near Franklin, and would also have a connexion with the rail road constructing through the southern range of counties in the state of New York.

The convention at Rochester, on the subject of the enlargement of the Erie canal, adjourned on the 19th ult. having adopted a memorial to the legislature asking for a law authorising a loan to facilitate the enlargement, and pledging the canal tolls for the payment of the same. Committees of vigilance for the counties interested and a central committee were appointed to superintend the general matters relating to the objects of the convention.

The New York Journal of Commerce complains of the great rise in house rents in that city. It says: "Six or eight hundred dollars is the least for which a house can be obtained within two miles of Wall street, to afford comfortable accommodations for a moderate family, and a large proportion of such houses command ten and twelve hundred dollars.—We do not speak of mansions for the rich: they are two and three thousand dollars. The pressure of rents on the middling classes is severe, though, after all, they are generally in prosperous circumstances."

Distressing Shipwreck. The barque Suzana, belonging to Macao, (China), while on her passage to that place from Bombay, was cast away on the coast of Caulan, lat. 11 55, near the end of June last, in a gale, by which disaster eleven persons lost their lives, including senhor H. A. Leiria, of Macao.—The cargo consisted of 1,383 chests of opium, 200 bales of cotton, &c. and the loss of property is estimated at more than a million of dollars.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 25.—Vol. I.]

BALTIMORE, FEBRUARY 18, 1837.

[Vol. LI.—Whole No. 1,325.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

GEORGE PEABODY, esq. of Baltimore, has been appointed by the governor and council of Maryland, a commissioner to negotiate the eight million loan, in the place of Samuel Jones, jr. esq. who declined to accept.

RICHARD E. PARKER, at present one of the senators of the United States from the state of Virginia, has been elected by the legislature of the state one of the judges of the court of appeals, vice Dabney Carr, deceased. There were two ballots—on the 1st ballot the joint vote of the two houses was: for J. M. Patton 59—R. E. Parker 56—William Daniel 33—scattering 8. On the 2d the vote stood—R. E. Parker 82—J. M. Patton 69—scattering 3.

FIRE. A slip from the office of the Norfolk Beacon, states that the dwelling house of HENRY A. WISE, esq. of the Eastern Shore of Virginia was destroyed by fire during the past week. Mrs. W. was absent at the time, and on her return found the building in flames. The extent of the loss was not ascertained.

FROM MEXICO. A conducta has arrived at Vera Cruz with $700,000.

The liberation of Santa Ana caused great rejoicing. The papers are almost exclusively filled with fulsome adulations addressed to him.

The correspondence of ex-minister Gorroztizena with our government serves the Mexican papers for several severe philippics against the United States: these ebullitions are to be expected, and as they cannot change the actual state of affairs, they will fall harmless.

General Bustamante made his entry into the city of Mexico on the evening of the 19th or 20th of December.

By a decree of the Mexican congress, of the 14th of December, all consuls, but more particularly ours, are enjoined to furnish the citizens of the nations they represent with tickets of security, (protection) within the month after their arrival. The tickets are renewable once in each year, in the month of January. In default of complying with this requisition, a fine is to be imposed.

A letter from Vera Cruz dated 22d January, states that the supreme government had sent an order to Vera Cruz, directing that in the event of Santa Ana's arriving at Vera Cruz, the authorities should receive him with all the honors due to him as president of the republic. The writer adds that on his arrival he would be appointed immediately to the presidency. Bustamante now declines a nomination for president.

SOUTH AMERICA. New Grenada and Great Britain. The New Orleans True American states that in consequence of the incarceration of the British consul by the authorities of New Grenada, a British squadron was blockading some of the ports of South America.

The following is an extract of a letter, dated Kingston, Jan. 12th.

"We beg now to advise the blockade by a British squadron, of the coast of New Grenada, and the consul for the United States has received a communication that no American or other vessel, would be sanctioned in leaving this port, ostensibly with a view to trade with New Grenada, even to bring away British property."

PERU AND CHILI. War, says the New Orleans Bee, has been declared between Peru and Chili, and two vessels belonging to the latter nation were blockading the port of Guayaquil, where there were four Peruvian vessels and 300 troops under command of gen. Moran. A letter, however, dated Lima, Dec. 2, says that no war up to that period had been declared, but it will soon be done by Chili; that Peru had detained all the Chilean vessels in her ports, and prohibited the introduction of their products and manufactures into Peru. In expectation of war large quantities of wheat and flour were sent from Chili in October, and prices low.

FOREIGN NEWS. The news from England is not important. The report of the bankruptcy of the Northern and Central bank at Manchester appears to rest pretty much as it did before this arrival, and to have no other foundation than the arrangement with the bank of England for resuming its liabilities.

On the 24th, 25th and 26th December, a severe snow storm prevailed in England, and interrupted all communications from abroad, as well as the mails throughout the country. Where it drifted it was generally from 12 to 16 feet; by Chatham Lines the snow is from 30 to 40 feet deep.—Innumerable accidents occurred, several of the mail coaches were completely buried in the snow, and the disasters to the shipping were numerous, and many lives lost. In the port of Harwich alone 11 vessels were driven ashore. An avalanche of snow and ice fell on the 27th December, from Malting Cliff at Lewis, crushing 7 cottages, and burying the inmates; 11 persons were dug out, 6 of whom were dead.

A new attempt was made on the life of Louis Philippe on the 27th of December, by three assassins, each armed with pistols, while he was on his way to the legislative chambers, for the opening of the session. One only of the assassins fired, and the ball broke the glass of the royal carriage, and passed between the heads of the king's two sons, but the king was not hurt. The assassins were arrested.

The king proceeded to the chamber and opened the session by a speech. He congratulates the chambers on the prosperity of the country, on the pacific assurance which he receives from all foreign princes, and on the security of the peace of the world. He laments the fatal dissensions which prevail in the peninsula, and applauds himself for not having interfered in the internal affairs of those countries. He laments the losses which have been sustained in Africa, and intimates an intention to secure the preponderance of the French arms, as well as security to the French possessions there. He alludes to the renewed attempt on his life, and to the recent futile attempt at insurrection, both which passages of the speech were received with repeated acclamations. He announces that he has given orders for submitting to the deliberation of the chambers a great number of propositions, for the improvement of the navigation of rivers, the establishment of canals, ports and rail roads, and public institutions which will augment the greatness of France.

M. Dupin was elected president of the chamber of deputies, by 198 votes out of 307. M. Humann received 36 votes, and M. Lafitte 24. General Jaquemenot and M. Cunin Gridaine, the ministerial candidates, were chosen vice presidents.

The papers contain the tardy resolution of the cortes, recognized by a decree of the queen, and published in the Madrid Gazette, authorising the government to conclude treaties of peace and amity with the states of Spanish America, on the basis of the acknowledgment of those states, and the renunciation of all territorial rights and sovereignty on the part of the ancient government.

The English and American residents in Paris held a meeting on the 30th, for the purpose of voting a congratulatory address to the king on his providential escape from the attempt on his life. A committee was appointed of six English and six American gentlemen to draw up resolutions and an address, which after an interval of half an hour, were presented and unanimously agreed to.

The affairs in Spain were nearly in statu quo. Bilbao continued to hold out against the Carlists, but had not been relieved.

The road was lined on one side by the national guards, and on the other by troops of the line. On the Quai des Tuileries, a few paces beyond the iron gate leading into the garden, nearly opposite the Pont Royal, a pistol was fired at the carriage, just at the moment when his majesty was saluting the crowd assembled to witness his passage. The assassin, it appears, took advantage of a slight opening in the line of troops by whom the king was surrounded, to approach within a few paces of the royal carriage. The king was not struck. The ball broke the glass, passed between the heads of the dukes of Orleans and Nemours, and lodged in the upper part of the carriage. The pistol was fired by an individual who formed one of a group of three young men, placed immediately behind the national guards. One only fired. At the moment the report was heard, another of the party had his arm extended, and was on the point of pulling the trigger of a second pistol, when a by-stander struck down his arm. The third had also a pistol in his hand, but had not presented it. The report threw the procession into some disorder. The king's carriage stopped suddenly. His majesty put his head out of the window, spoke to several of the generals who formed his escort, and assured the people that he was not hurt. Some splinters of the glass, however, struck the faces of the dukes of Orleans and Nemours.—The prince royal was cut below the right ear, and the wound bled profusely. The duke de Nemours escaped with a few scratches on his right cheek.—Immediately after the horrible act, general Jaquemenot rode on at full gallop to prevent the queen, who had preceded his majesty to the palais Bourbon, from being alarmed by any erroneous statement that might have circulated immediately after the attempt. The news was soon spread through the chamber, but the statement of general Jaquemenot, who remained amongst his colleagues, soon dissipated all alarm, and opposed an effectual check to the exaggerations, which, but for his presence, would no doubt have created a panic amongst the assembled auditory. The three assassins were immediately arrested, and taken first to the post where the colors of the national guards are deposited, and thence to that of the commandant of the palace, where the prefect of police arrived shortly afterwards and interrogated them. They all assumed great firmness, and declared that they had acted of their own free will. They refused to disclose their names, and had even taken the precaution of obliterating the marks of their linen. It is said that no other avowal could be obtained from the perpetrator of the atrocious attempt except a declaration that he belonged to the societes des Familles. The principal and his accomplices were ill-dressed, and each of them appeared to be about 22 or 23 years old. The young man who fired the shot has light brown hair, is much marked with the small pox, and has rather a mean appearance.

The assassin's name is Meunier. He is the son of a carriage maker, residing at La Nilette, a suburb of Paris on the St. Denis road. His motive for attempting to take the life of the king, was, it seems, to rid the world of one of the Orleans branch of the Bourbons, for which he says he had, while still a boy, conceived an implacable hatred.

The pistol which he made use of contained either two balls, of which one was divided into two, or else one ball cut into three. After entering the side window of the carriage a fragment of the ball went through the front window, immediately behind the coachman. Another fragment entered the cushion, and was found there, not two inches from where the duke de Joinville was sitting. The lantern to the left of the coachman was also broken, whether by a third ball or a fragment, or whether by the one that traversed the front window, is not certain.

MR. ADAMS AND THE PETITION FROM SLAVES.

IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, Feb. 6. Mr. Adams said he held in his hand a paper on which, before it was presented, he desired to have the decision of the speaker.—It was a petition from twenty-two persons, declaring themselves to be slaves. He wished to know whether the speaker considered such a petition as coming within the order of the house?

The speaker said he could not tell until he had the contents of the petition in his possession.

Mr. Adams said that if the paper was sent to the clerk's table it would be in possession of the house, and if sent to the speaker he would see what were its contents. Now, he (Mr. A.) wished to do nothing except in submission to the rules of the house. This paper purported to come from slaves, and it was one of those petitions which had occurred to his mind as not being what it purported to be. It was signed partly by persons who could not write, by making their marks, and partly by persons whose hand writing would manifest that they had received the education of slaves. And the petition declared itself to be from slaves, and he was requested to present it. He would send it to the chair.

Mr. Lawler objected to its going to the chair. The speaker said that the circumstances of the case were so extraordinary, that he would take the sense of the house on the course to be pursued.

Mr. Lawler wished it to appear on the journal that he had objected to the paper going to the chair.

The speaker said the gentleman from Massachusetts had stated that the petition came from slaves; but it had not been sent to the clerk's table. It was the first time, in the recollection of the chair, that persons, not free, had presented a petition to this house. The chair wished to take the sense of the house, which he had a right to do.

Mr. Haynes said he felt astonished at the course which had been pursued by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, not only to-day, but every day for some time past, when ever petitions were presented; but his astonishment reached to a height which he felt it impossible to express, when he saw the gentleman rise in his place on this floor, and offer to present such a paper as this had been described to be. Mr. H. could not tell in what manner he would meet a proposition of this kind. It might be giving it more attention than it deserved, if he (Mr. H.) were to object to receiving it. He had risen mainly to express, so far as language could express, his unfeigned surprise that the gentleman from Massachusetts, or any other gentleman, should ever have made a question on a paper of this kind.

Mr. Adams called the gentleman from Georgia to order, on the ground that he was making personal reflections.

Mr. Pinckney said that he was opposed to a protracted discussion on the subject, which could only lead to useless excitement and confusion, the matter before the house being a subject for action, not for debate; and was going on to say that he hoped the house would act promptly and decisively, when the chair interposed, and

Mr. Haynes inquired of the chair if he did not still hold the floor?

The speaker said the gentleman from Georgia held the floor, but it was not in order to make personal allusions.

Mr. Haynes said, the speaker was aware that he was one of the last men to violate the rules adopted for the order and government of the house. It was well known that, from the commencement of these discussions at an early day in the last session of congress up to this moment, his lips had been closed on the subject in every form; because he had thought that the members from his section of the country should be among the last to seek or promote discussion upon it. But he would not trust his feelings to pursue the subject further under its present aspect, extraordinary as it was. The true motion, in his judgment, would be to move that the petition be rejected, subject, however, to its withdrawal, if the house should become further enlightened as to its contents.

Mr. Lewis hoped that no motion of that kind would come from any gentleman from a slaveholding section of the country.

Mr. Haynes said he would cheerfully withdraw his motion.

Mr. Lewis said he was glad the motion was withdrawn. He believed that the house should punish severely such an infraction of its decorum and its rules, and he called on the members from the slaveholding states to come forward now, and demand from the house the punishment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. Grantland, of Georgia, would second the motion, and go all lengths in support of it.

Mr. Lewis said that, if the house would inflict no punishment for such flagrant violations of its dignity as this, it would be better for the representatives from the slaveholding states to go home at once.

Mr. Alford inquired if the gentleman from Massachusetts had certainly proposed to introduce this petition?

The speaker said, the member from Massachusetts had risen, and stated that he had a petition coming from slaves, and had inquired of the chair whether it would come under the order adopted by the house in reference to all petitions and papers on the subject of slavery.

The clerk having been directed to read the minutes which he had taken at the time, read as follows:

"Mr. Adams presented the petition of twenty-two persons, declaring themselves to be slaves, and wished to know whether it came within the order of the house."

Mr. Alford said that, if the gentleman from Massachusetts intended to present this petition, he (Mr. Alford) the moment it was presented, should move, as an act of justice to the south, which he in part represented, and which he conceived had been treated with indignity, that it be taken from the house and burnt; and he hoped that every man who was a friend to the constitution would support him.

There must be an end to this constant attempt to raise excitement, or the union could not exist much longer. The moment any man should disgrace the government under which he lived, by presenting a petition from slaves praying for emancipation, he hoped that petition would, by order of the house, be committed to the flames.

Mr. Patton moved to suspend the rule to enable him to submit a motion to take from the table, to be hereafter disposed of as the house may decide, the paper already presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and which had been laid on the table under the resolution of the house; he alluded to the paper presented as a petition from nine ladies of Fredericksburg. He (Mr. P.) would state in his place, and on his responsibility, that the name of no lady was attached to that paper. He did not believe there was a single one of them of decent respectability. He believed the signatures to be genuine, and he recognised only one name which he had known before, and that was the name of a free mulatto woman of the worst fame and reputation. He had been raised in Fredericksburg, and believed he was acquainted with all persons of respectability residing there, and he could say there was not one respectable name attached to this paper.

Mr. W. Thompson asked that the petition might be read, so as to render the gentleman from Massachusetts amenable to the resolution which he (Mr. T.) proposed to offer.

The speaker said it was not in order at this time. Mr. Robertson called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend; which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 131, nays 50.

So the rule was suspended.

Mr. Patton said he was disposed to pursue as kind and respectful a course to the gentleman from Massachusetts, as the circumstances of the case would admit, so far as related to the particular question before the house.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, before presenting this petition, had stated that he did not know who these individuals were; he did not know their claims to the consideration of this house, or to his own agency in presenting the petition. Mr. P. thought it was to be regretted that the gentleman from Massachusetts had not thought proper, but, on the contrary, had refused to permit him (Mr. P.) coming from the town from which this paper purported to come, on a subject which the gentleman knew the people whom he (Mr. P.) represented, as well as himself, felt a deep and exciting interest, to see the paper before it had been presented. He (Mr. P.) could not permit himself to believe that, after stating to him as he (Mr. P.) would have stated privately, what he had since stated publicly, the gentleman from Massachusetts would have persisted in being the organ through whom such a petition should be presented. He (Mr. P.) would again state on his honor and veracity as a man, that he did not believe that there was the signature of any decently respectable individual in Fredericksburg attached to this paper; that the only name he recognised was that of a mulatto free woman of infamous character; and he believed that the names of others were the names of free negroes, all of whom he believed to be bad. He, therefore, moved that the paper which had been received and laid on the table should be taken from the table and returned to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. Bouldin said that, as he had just voted against suspending the rules, on the motion of his colleague, (Mr. Patton), and had found himself voting with those who, from their local situation, might be supposed not to feel with him on the very delicate and vital subject now before the house, and as his name had not been recorded with the names of those with whom he knew he did feel and act substantially in every important matter peculiar to the south, and especially in regard to the subject matter now before the house, it became him to give the reasons for his vote. It was this: He wished to dispose of the first branch of the subject, and then he would be willing to suspend the rules for his colleague, and would be willing to go with him in any vote to take from our files the paper he wished withdrawn, and which was well calculated to throw disgrace and contempt on the proceedings of the house. He was willing the resolution and wish of his colleague should prevail, and that the paper should be returned to the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, to make what mischief he could or he chose from it, in or out of this house.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts had offered in the house the memorial of those who, on the face of it, appeared to be slaves, and had announced to the chair and to the house that such was the paper.

Mr. B. said he did not care a rush whether the paper went to the chair or not. Nothing that that gentleman could say or do in relation to it could add to, or detract from, the impression that the statement of the proposition to the chair by him had made. He (Mr. B.) wished now, without interruption of any other business, to progress with this matter until he saw and understood what countenance the gentleman from Massachusetts should receive from the house.

Mr. B. said he had at the last session gone farther with and for the north on a matter nearly identical with this, than any other man from the south. He alluded to the admission of Michigan and Arkansas into the union. On that occasion, he had said, and said undoubtedly and from his heart, that there was no serious intention or wish in any considerable number of the members of this house to assail the interests, the rights, or the safety of the south, or to throw any obstacles in the way of Arkansas on account of negro slavery. On the vote he found it so. He believed it then, and believes it now. But the countenance and support that the gentleman from Massachusetts may receive from the house in propounding to the chair his question whether slaves can petition under the rule of the house, or in any way, will either confirm this belief, or weaken or entirely annihilate it.

Upon this issue would depend with him the question of concurrence in the feeling expressed (though not fully, owing to the rules of the house preventing him from proceeding at that time), by the gallant and experienced member from Louisiana, that the time had arrived when it was the business of southern members to go home.

Mr. Bouldin wished not to be kept in suspense upon this point. He wished to know whether he was right in believing that he was surrounded by brokers sitting in consultation upon the interest, the prosperity, happiness and glory of their common family and country, or whether a portion, a considerable portion, were willing to countenance a proposition of this kind—a proposition that could admit of no interpretation milder than that of a direct insult to the feelings of the south. The most natural import, a direct attack upon the interest, the property and the safety of the slaveholding portion of the union.

Mr. W. Thompson said he had risen to move as an amendment to the motion of the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Patton) the following resolution:

Resolved, That the honorable John Quincy Adams, by the attempt just made by him to introduce a petition purporting on its face to be from slaves, has been guilty of a gross disrespect to this house, and that he be instantly brought to the bar to receive the severe censure of the speaker.

Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, said he had always forborne, as far as he could control his feelings, from taking any part in the discussions on this subject. He now felt infinite pain in being forced, by an imperious sense of duty, to present the resolution which he had sent to the chair. He was aware of the advantages over him, which the gentleman's age and the stations which he had filled gave him. But, sir, there is a point at which forbearance ceases to be proper. The sanctuary of age is not lightly to be violated; but when that sanctuary is used to throw poisoned arrows, it ceases to be sacred. The gentleman from Massachusetts offered to present a petition from slaves, and so purporting to be on its face, in open and wilful violation of what he knew to be the rules of this house, and insulting to a large portion of its members. Does the gentleman, even in the latitude which he gives to the right of petition, think that it includes slaves? If he does not, he has wilfully violated the rules of the house and the feelings of its members. Does that gentleman know that there are laws in all the slave states, and here, for the punishment of those who excite insurrection? I can tell him that there are such things as grand juries; and if, sir, the juries of this District have, as I doubt not they have, proper intelligence and spirit, he may yet be made amenable to another tribunal, and we may yet see an incendiary brought to condign punishment. Mr. T. said that, when he first took his seat here, and heard daily denunciations of the people whom he represented, and every vile epithet heaped upon them—a people for whom he claimed, to say the very least, the proudest equality—he was excited almost to the point of frenzy. Now he found himself sitting quietly under these things, when he saw his new colleagues, not more excitable than he was, in the same state of feeling, in which he was at the last session. Sir, it is a most instructive commentary upon the gradual wear and tear of feeling, and the cooling of that just indignation which every southern man should feel. Sir, if I desired the breaking up of this government, I should thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for his course on this subject. All we desire, sir, is an issue, a fair and distinct issue. If gentlemen think slavery an abomination, and that they have a right to abolish it, why not come up to the point, and say so? I will forgive them for all the past if they will do it. We shall then, sir, soon, very soon, settle this question forever.

Mr. Haynes said that, believing the object of the gentleman from South Carolina might be more readily obtained by a resolution in a different form, he would send to the table the following amendment:—Strike out all after "Resolved," and insert—

That John Quincy Adams, a representative from the state of Massachusetts, has rendered himself justly liable to the severest censure of this house, and is censured accordingly, for having attempted to present to the house the petition of slaves.

Mr. Granger said this was a question of extreme delicacy, and one which he hoped would not be closed by the previous question. His honorable friend from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) knew that no man in this house had more sincerely stood by him on the right of petition than he (Mr. G.) had. But he (Mr. G.) must express his surprise that, with papers in his hand from sources of which he was ignorant, and of the genuineness of which he has expressed a doubt, he (Mr. A.) should have assumed the responsibility he had this day assumed. He (Mr. G.) was surprised that that gentleman, holding the right of petition as one of the most sacred rights granted to this people, should ever have cheapened the value of that right by presenting indiscriminately papers enclosed to him, (Mr. A.) when he was himself ignorant of the names, condition, or characters of those who forwarded them. He was the more surprised that a paper from this immediate vicinity, and purporting to bear the signatures of those who are represented by a gentleman (Mr. Patton) sitting on the left of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and with whom that gentleman was on intimate terms, should have been presented to this house without some inquiry having been made as to the character of those whose names were attached to the petition, or without the gentleman (Mr. A.) being possessed of, or having guarded himself by, the requisite information in relation to the petition he was about to present. It was well known that no man here deprecated more than he (Mr. G.) did the decision of the chair in tying down members of the house under the resolution of the last and the present year. It was due to the gentleman whom he had in his eye, (Mr. W. Thompson) to say that he believed he (Mr. T.) had invariably voted against it.

Mr. Thompson explained that he had voted against the resolution, because he thought that the petitions should not be received, but instantly rejected.

Mr. G. resumed. What was the position in which we are now placed by the adoption of that resolution? It was that all papers, in advance, having reference, immediately or remotely, to the subject of slavery, no matter how offensive in its object, or disreputable in its terms, or how respectful, were carried to the speaker's table. Instead of securing to the people of this country the sacred right of petition, with every paper to be passed upon, if not by the judgment of the person presenting it, at least by the judgment of the house, this stifling resolution had been the vehicle of carrying on to the records of the house documents that should never have been placed there, and of excluding those which were entitled to its consideration. It had probably placed on the table papers which never ought to have been admitted, and it had shut out from the people of this country the full and free right of having their petitions presented here, and of being heard upon them.

Mr. G. said he had regretted as much as the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Thompson), or the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Patton), that this paper should have been presented. As a member of this house, he (Mr. G.) considered the right of petition sacred, but he also considered himself bound, in the exercise of that right, to guaranty to the house that the paper he offered was one, the responsibility of which, so far as presenting it was concerned, rested on his shoulders. It did not follow that he approved or disapproved the object of the petition because he presented it; but it was due to the house, in presenting it, to say that he believed it to be such a paper as a member had a right, and was bound, to present to an American congress; and he could not think that the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts could strengthen the right of petition by presenting a paper in the manner in which this had been offered.

This question, as now presented, was one of deep interest. He felt bound to say that a certain class of the community were too ready to change their ground, and to hide their opinions on the abolition of slavery under the denial of the right of petition. He had in his mind men, not ordinary men, who, feeling that this right has been unjustly abridged, have enlisted themselves in a cause in which they would never otherwise have engaged; men who, only one year ago, were as much opposed to the abolition of slavery as any man in this house, but who are now found within its ranks. These, he had said, were not ordinary citizens, but those who stood forth to the community in that enviable relief which talent gives to virtue. It was not to be disguised, and he felt bound to declare, that, if the house wished to forward the cause of abolition, they would pass these hasty resolutions. No man in this nation held the right of petition under the constitution more sacred than he did; but it was due to himself to repeat, what he had heretofore stated, that so long as the states of Maryland and Virginia should continue their present policy, he did not believe that congress had any just power to interfere in this question, nor that either philanthropy or patriotism demanded it; that in his opinion, at the time of the session of this District, it was no more contemplated that slavery should be abolished here before it was in the surrounding country, than that this territory should continue in its present position after the adjoining states by which it had been ceded should have changed theirs. But he would say to the gentlemen from South Carolina, (Mr. Thompson), and from Georgia, (Mr. Haynes), that, if this resolution was pushed to a vote of censure, its effect on the community would be most serious.

What was the position of the gentleman from Massachusetts? He (Mr. A.) had requested instructions, had asked the decision of the chair as to his right to present the petition, and whether it came within the resolution of the house to which he had referred. Before the decision of the chair had been announced, and whilst the house remained in ignorance even of the gentleman's own opinions as to the propriety of presenting it, a resolution was introduced, which, in effect, went to censure him for asking the decision of the chair, and which decision had not yet been announced. If these proceedings must be carried on, for pity's sake, at least, let the opinion of the person presenting it be known; let him at least declare in his place that he claimed the right to present the petition. It will then be time enough to act upon these resolutions, and then be matter of sufficient doubt whether they should be passed, or whether any member should be censured for what he considered an honest discharge of his duty.

He could not conclude without expressing his regret at the occurrence of this morning, and his firm conviction that the course of the gentleman from Massachusetts, so far from rendering the right of petition more sacred, was calculated to render it a mere bauble, to be played with; and he objected to having the right of petition, inalienable in his constituents, tried by any such issue as could be made upon the papers which the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) had last presented.

Mr. D. H. Lewis offered the following amendment, which he suggested to his friend from South Carolina (Mr. Thompson) to accept as a modification: Resolved, That John Quincy Adams, a member from the state of Massachusetts, by his attempt to introduce into this house a petition from slaves, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, committed an outrage on the rights and feelings of a large portion of the people of this union; a flagrant contempt on the dignity of this house; and, by extending to slaves a privilege only belonging to freemen, directly invites the slave population to insurrection; and that the said member be forthwith called to the bar of the house, and be censured by the speaker.

Mr. W. Thompson accepted the modification.

Mr. Lewis said that, as a member from the south, he was not disposed to argue this question here. He wished to see whether there was the power or the will to discountenance such proceedings as these.—If not, the members from the south had better go home and prepare to protect themselves.

Mr. Patton said he thought the house was proceeding rather harshly in this matter. The resolution, in the form in which it now stood, asserted two facts, of which he would desire to be certified before he gave his vote upon it. He knew nothing of the character of the paper, for the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) had preserved towards him the same silence as on the other paper, purporting to come from Fredericksburg.

But the resolution asserted two facts—1st. That the paper was a petition by slaves for the abolition of slavery. Was that the fact? Was any gentleman here authorised to state that this was a paper for the abolition of slavery? It was essentially important, before the house was called on to act, that they should know whether this was the fact or not.

The resolution asserted also another fact—that the gentleman from Massachusetts attempted to offer this petition. He (Mr. P.) understood that this was not the fact. He thought he should be disposed to go as far as those who would go furthest in adopting any proper course for arresting these attempts to procure the action of the house in relation to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or any where else. He should be ready to go to the utmost extent of his constitutional powers to arrest that action either by the legislative intervention of the house in its ordinary course, or by refusing to receive the petitions, or by inflicting censure on members transgressing the bounds of their duty to keep up an excitement on the subject. But let us know (said Mr. P.) what we are doing. Suppose that this petition was a quiz, and that, so far from being a petition for the abolition of slavery, it was a petition for a very different thing. Mr. P. would object as much to the one proposition being presented here as the other. But let the house before it involved itself in this solemn proceeding, before it took this decided and hazardous step of bringing to the bar of the house a member of its body as having violated its rights, know on what grounds they were proceeding.

Were the facts as they were stated to be? Had any such petition been presented or offered by a member of the house? He regretted to be involved in this excitement on grounds which might turn out to be more of a farce than a tragedy. He expected it would be found that neither the one fact nor the other, assumed in the resolution, was true.

Mr. Adams then rose and said he did not know under what rule of the house the several resolutions which had been presented in relation to himself had taken the place of the resolution or motion submitted by his friend from Virginia (Mr. Patton), nor how it had happened that this matter had come under the consideration of the house, whilst a question was pending whether a paper previously presented by him (Mr. A.) should be taken from the speaker's table and returned to him. The speaker, he presumed, knew how this had come about.

The speaker explained that this had been effected under the operation of that well-established parliamentary law, which gave precedence to questions of privilege over all other business.

Mr. A. Well, sir, I am satisfied.

In regard to the resolutions now before the house, as they all concur in naming me, and in charging me with high crimes and misdemeanors, and in calling me to the bar of the house to answer for my crimes, I have thought it was my duty to remain silent until it should be the pleasure of the house to act either on one or other of these resolutions. I suppose that if I shall be brought to the bar of the house, I shall not be struck mute by the previous question, before I have an opportunity to say a word or two in my own defence.

But, sir, gentlemen are really consuming the time of the house in such a manner, that I think the obligation rests upon me to ask them to modify their resolution. It may be as severe as they propose; but I ask them to change the matter of fact a little, so that when I come to the bar, I may not, in one single word, put an end to their resolution.

The gentlemen, who have such a laudable zeal for the slaveholding portion of this confederacy, and I do not censure them for that zeal, charge upon me, first, that I attempted to present a petition from slaves; and, secondly, that that petition was for their emancipation from slavery. I did not present the petition, and I appeal to the speaker to say that I did not. I said I had a paper, purporting to be a petition from slaves; I did not say what the prayer of the petition was; I said it was a paper purporting to be a petition from slaves, signed partly by crosses for signatures, and partly by letters, scarcely legible, purporting to be names. I asked the speaker whether he considered such a paper as included within the general order of the house, that all petitions, memorials, resolutions and papers, relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery, should be laid on the table. I intended to take the decision of the speaker before I went one step towards presenting, or offering to present, that petition. I stated distinctly to the speaker that I should not send the paper to the table, until the question was decided, whether a paper from persons declaring themselves slaves was included within the order of the house. This is the fact.

Now, as to the fact what the petition was for. I simply state to the gentleman from Alabama, (Mr. Lewis), who has sent to the table a resolution, assuming that this petition was for the abolition of slavery; I state to him that he is mistaken. He must amend his resolution; for, if the house should choose to read this petition, I can state to them they would find it something very much the reverse of that which the resolution states it to be; and if the gentleman from Alabama still shall choose to bring me to the bar of the house, he must amend his resolution in a very important particular; for he probably may have to put into it, that my crime has been for attempting to introduce the petition of slaves that slavery should not be abolished. This is possible, sir. I say, then, the gentleman must amend his resolution; and I take it for granted that he and the house will be under the necessity of seeing what that petition is, and that they must not take it even from my representation. This representation I am perfectly willing to make, if the house shall think fit that the petition should be received and considered; and I shall be willing to do almost any thing, except to grant the prayer of the petition; for, the gentleman from Alabama may, perchance, find that the object of the petition is precisely that which he desires to accomplish; and that these slaves, who have sent this paper to me, are his auxiliaries, instead of being his opponents. I state these facts for the consideration of the house. I shall not present the petition until the decision of the house has been announced, and I am disposed to be perfectly submissive to that decision, whatever it may be.

Whilst I am up, Mr. Speaker, I feel it necessary to say one word in reply to the observations of a gentleman for whom I entertain a profound respect, and who, on this occasion, has not felt as those gentlemen who have entirely misunderstood the course I was pursuing, and the nature of the paper on which I asked the direction of the speaker. I allude to the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Granger), who has expressed his regret at the course I have this day adopted.

Sir, it is well known to all the members of this house; it is certainly well known to all petitioners for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, that from the day I entered this house down to the present moment, I have invariably here, and invariably elsewhere, declared my opinions to be adverse to the prayer of petitions which call for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.—But, sir, it is equally well known that, from the time I entered this house down to the present day, I have felt it a sacred duty to present any petition, couched in respectful language, from any citizen of the United States, be its object what it may; be the prayer of it that in which I could concur, or that to which I was utterly opposed. It is for the sacredness of the right of petition that I have adopted this course; and when my friend from New York (Mr. Granger) intimated his opinion—not directly expressed, but yet the necessary inference of his remarks—that, before presenting a paper purporting to be a petition from certain ladies of Fredericksburg, I ought to have shown it to my friend and neighbor here, (Mr. Patton), and to have followed the advice which he would have given, I reply to the gentleman (Mr. G.) that such is not my opinion in regard to the right of petition. I did avoid showing my friend the petition, because I had every reason to believe that, if I did, he would exercise his influence over my mind—and that influence is great in every thing in which my duty does not interpose a barrier against its exercise—and that his advice would have been that I should not present the petition. I did not choose to place myself in this position. I adhere to the right of petition; and let me say here that, let the petition be, as the gentleman from Virginia has stated, from free negroes—prostitutes, as he supposes, for he says there is one such on the paper, and he infers that the rest are of the same description—that had not altered my opinion at all.—Where is your law which says that the mean, and the low, and the degraded, shall be deprived of the right of petition, if their moral character is not good? Where, in the land of freemen, was the right of petition ever placed on the exclusive basis of morality and virtue? Petition is supplication—it is entreaty—it is prayer! and where is the degree of vice or immorality which shall deprive the citizen of the right to supplicate for a boon, or to pray for mercy? Where is such a law to be found? It does not belong to the most abject despotism.—There is no absolute monarch on earth, who is not compelled by the constitution of his country to receive the petitions of his people, whosoever they may be. The sultan of Constantinople cannot walk the streets and refuse to receive petitions from the meanest and the vilest in the land. This is the law even of despotism. And what does your law say? Does it say that, before presenting a petition, you shall look into it, and see whether it comes from the virtuous, and the great, and the mighty? No, sir, it says no such thing; the right of petition belongs to all. And, so far from refusing to present a petition because it might come from those low in the estimation of the world, it would be an additional incentive, if such incentive were wanting. This I say to my friend from Virginia, (Mr. Patton).

But I must admit that when color comes into the question, there may be other considerations. It is possible that this house, which seems to consider it so great a crime to attempt to offer a petition from slaves, may, for aught I know, say that freemen, if not of the carnation, shall be deprived of the right of petition, in the sense of the house. It is possible, sir, that had I known the petition from Fredericksburg to have been from colored people, I might have taken into my consideration the question, not whether I ought to present the petition to the house, but whether, in the temper of this house, it would be prudent for me to present it. Sir, I did not know that these were colored women. The petition was sent without any indication of the color or condition of those who sent it. At all events, it did not purport to come from slaves; and when the paper which I last held in my hand came to me as a petition from persons declaring themselves to be slaves, I did not present it, but I asked the speaker if it came within the general order of the house. I am still waiting for that decision, and if it should be the decision of the speaker that the petition cannot be received, because it comes from slaves, I shall submit to the determination of the house. If the house think proper to receive the petition, I shall present it.

Mr. Mann, of New York, obtained the floor, and said that the future historian, when arriving at the transactions of the twenty-fourth congress, would find it requisite to pause and contemplate the spectacle now before us and the American people. He will be at fault to discover the cause for the scenes now presented; and contemplating the nature of our political institutions, tracing their formation and establishment, he will find nothing which would necessarily produce or justify the course of proceedings which have occurred here for the last and present sitting of congress. Sir, (said Mr. M.) why is it then that we are weekly, and almost daily, drawn into the consideration of abstract, impractical, and Mr. M. said he must be permitted to say, improper, if not reprehensible subjects, by the course adopted by the venerable member from Massachusetts? (Mr. Adams). Is it from any defect in the forms or principles of our proceedings? Is it inherent in the compact upon which rests all that is valuable in our institutions? Is it to be found and justified in the condition and circumstances of our country? Can it be traced to a want of patriotic devotion in any considerable portion of our country to the union? Would it be charitable to attribute it to any disappointment of individual ambition, seeking revenge for such disappointment in attempting to win that which it could not rule?

On no one of these inquiries, Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. M.) can we find a satisfactory solution of the question why we are now presenting to the country the deplorable spectacle, shown off every petition day, by the honorable member from Massachusetts, in presenting the abolition petitions of his infatuated friends and constituents. The house has, with a unanimity almost unparalleled, prescribed a rule for its government in respect to these petitions, with which it is, upon experience, as well (Mr. M. ventured the opinion), as the considerate men of all parties, in every portion of the confederacy, well satisfied. Yet the honorable member has made himself to believe that it was his duty, against the sense of the whole house, (Mr. M. believed with but few exceptions), against the sense of the whole country, including his own political friends, (if any he has), to resist the execution of that rule with a degree of violence paralleled only by revolutionary madness of desperation. Sir, (said Mr. M.) it becomes me, the house, and the country, to remember that the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts has occupied the executive chair, and administered the duties of the highest office of the civilized world. And it becomes us also to respect his gray hairs, his old age, his long public services, and to seek out apologies and excuses in his behalf, if possible, for the obstinacy and ebullitions of temper which on these occasions he so often exhibits, and which is so much opposed to cool deliberation and the dignity of the proceedings of this house. Thus shielded and protected by his age and public character, it has been matter of surprise to those who are not spectators of our proceedings, that a member of his great learning and experience should so far forget his dignity as to presume upon that age and character as a license to him to annoy and trifle with the house and its most solemn and satisfactory regulations.

Sir, (said Mr. M.) while we contemplate the character and respect the age of the honorable member, charity claims that we should also remember the frailty of our nature, and that man is mortal.—It would be unjust to believe that, in the prime and vigor of manhood, the honorable member would have adopted the course of action which, at this late period of his life, seems to control him. The high noon-tide of that life has long since passed with him, and its wane is no doubt upon him, before he is either aware or sensible of it; for it cannot be believed that, in the days of his more acute perceptions, he could have yielded to influences which now seem to have the mastery.

In this, (Mr. M. said), by the aid of liberal charity, he found both the cause and apology for the course of proceedings adopted by the member, and for the consequent disorders and delays which occur in our proceedings. Sir, let me not be misunderstood, for although the honorable member is far advanced into the autumn of his career, yet (Mr. M. said) he entertained a veneration for his learning and experience which he should always cherish with pride.

But, Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. M.) the proceedings of this day should admonish us of the danger of being thrown into unusual excitements, and acting hastily under such influences. Mr. M. said he was aware of the nature of the petition which the honorable member had offered before he had, by innuendoes, explained it; but some gentlemen had supposed that it affected the constitutional rights of their states—their rights to their slave property; and, supposing this, it was very natural for them to be suddenly alarmed.

It now, however, appears probable, that some mischievous persons have trifled with the honorable member from Massachusetts, and he, in turn, seeks to trifle with the house and country, by treating with seriousness that which was probably, in its origin, levity. The resolution to censure the honorable member is not, it seems, framed upon the real facts of the case, and assumes too much; and, as it now stands, cannot be maintained. It should describe truly the matters to justify its adoption. Mr. M. would have no hesitation, when the honorable member shall be guilty of a violation of the rules and rights of the house, and that violation shall be apparent, to vote any censure merited by the offence; and this, too, notwithstanding his age and character, because he is not elevated above law by any age or any character.

Mr. M. said he had always viewed this question of abolition and its progress with the deepest solicitude, as affecting the political integrity of the confederacy. In the formation of this union it was, as we well know, one of the greatest obstacles to be overcome, and was only surmounted by a spirit of concession and compromise, which it is feared does not exist now. In that compromise, we of the free states agreed to the doctrine of non-interference in the domestic institutions and concerns of the others. Some few of our people, however, pretending to a holy zeal, worthy of a better and more lawful cause, influenced by what they claim to be paramount considerations to the obligations of the constitution, and the integrity of the republic, regardless of consequences, insidiously violate the spirit of the compact by interfering with the subject in this District. And we are now again called upon by our southern brethren to know whether we will live up to the agreement we have made; whether we will keep the faith and perform our bargain. This is the true question propounded to us in all these proceedings. And, Mr. Speaker (said Mr. M.) as for me and my household, my constituents and friends, I say, without reservation, we will. Is there a patriotic heart in this hall, in this nation; is there a friend to the welfare of the republic, who can answer that he will not? Mr. M. did not believe there was one; and he therefore asked that honorable members from the south should give themselves no uneasiness on account of these ill-advised proceedings. Mr. M. relied upon the patriotism and good faith of the people of the north to abide by the compact they have made. He knew that this reliance would not fail.

Mr. Thompson said he was sorry to see the air of levity which it is attempted to throw over this matter. He felt very differently. What, sir, is it a mere trifle to hoax, to trifle with the members from the south in this way, and on this subject? Is it a light thing, for the amusement of others, to irritate, almost to madness, the whole delegation from the slave states? Sir, it is an aggravation. It is intimated that the petition does not pray for the abolition of slavery, but a very different object. It makes not the slightest difference; it is the attempt to introduce a petition from slaves for any object; as insolent if it be for one purpose as for another. It is the naked fact of the presentation of a petition from slaves. But, sir, there is another view of this matter, which, in my judgment, makes the thing worse. The gentleman from Massachusetts had been presenting abolition petitions all the morning. It is his daily labor of love, and I appeal to every member on the floor if the conduct of the member was not such as to induce every one to believe that it was an abolition petition. He allowed resolutions to be presented on that supposition, and speeches to be made, without undeceiving the house. This trifling was an additional contempt of the house; how much befitting the age and standing of the gentleman, it is not for me to say.

Mr. T. then further modified his resolution by substituting the three following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the hon. John Q. Adams, by an effort to present a petition from slaves, has committed a gross contempt of this house.

2. Resolved, That the member from Massachusetts above named, by creating the impression, and showing the house, under that impression, that the said petition was for the abolition of slavery when he knew that it was not, has trifled with the house.

3. Resolved, That the hon. John Q. Adams receive the censure of the house for his conduct referred to in the preceding resolutions.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. Pickens, Cambreleng, D. H. Lewis, Glascock, Pinckney, Lawler and Jenifer.

When, without taking the question, the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Feb. 7. The journal having been read, Mr. Adams expressed his apprehension that there was an omission in it. He thought there were other members than those from South Carolina (Mr. W. Thompson) and Georgia (Mr. Haynes) who had moved resolutions of censure upon him.—Mr. A. thought that a resolution of that character had been offered by the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. Lewis).

The speaker said the entry on the journal was, that the gentleman from South Carolina, on the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama, (Mr. Lewis), modified his resolution, &c.

Mr. Adams said he understood that the gentleman from Alabama had presented his amendment as a distinct proposition.

The speaker said the resolution had been accepted as a modification by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. Adams said he wished that every member who had offered a proposition to pass a resolution of censure on him should appear on the journal as submitting the proposition.

After some desultory conversation, Mr. Adams moved so to amend the journal as that it should appear thereon that the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. Lewis) further moved to amend the resolution, and that the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. W. Thompson) accepted the amendment as a modification.

The amendment was agreed to.

The house resumed the consideration of the question of privilege, under consideration at the adjournment of the house last evening; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. Haynes to the three resolutions offered by Mr. W. Thompson, as a substitute for his original resolution, and which substitute reads as follows:

1. Resolved, That the hon. John Q. Adams, by an effort to present a petition from slaves, has committed a gross contempt of this house.

2. Resolved, That the member from Massachusetts, above named, by creating the impression, and leaving the house under the impression, that the said petition was for the abolition of slavery, when he knew that it was not, has trifled with the house.

3. Resolved, That the hon. John Q. Adams receive the censure of this house for his conduct referred to in the preceding resolutions.

The amendment of Mr. Haynes is in the following words:

Strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert—

"That John Quincy Adams, a representative from the state of Massachusetts, has rendered himself justly liable to the severest censure of this house, and is censured accordingly, for having attempted to present to the house the petition of slaves."

And the pending question was on this amendment.

The debate was resumed, and the house was addressed at very great length by Messrs. Jenifer, Adams and Dromgoole.

Mr. Dromgoole suggested to the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Thompson) to accept the following as a substitute for his three resolutions:

Resolved, That the hon. John Q. Adams, a member of the house, by stating in his place that he had in his possession a paper, purporting to be a petition from slaves, and inquiring if it was within the meaning of a resolution heretofore adopted, (as preliminary to its presentation), has given color to the idea that slaves have the right to petition, and of his readiness to be their organ; and that, for the same, he deserves the censure of this house.

Resolved, That the aforesaid J. Q. Adams receive a censure from the speaker, in the presence of the house of representatives.

Mr. W. Thompson accepted the modification.

And the question recurring on the amendment of Mr. Haynes—

Mr. H. with a view to aid in bringing the subject to speedier action, withdrew his amendment.

And the question recurring on the modified resolution of Mr. W. Thompson—

The debate was continued by Messrs. Elmore, Pickens, Cambreleng, (in explanation); Lawler, Graves, Robertson, Granger, (in explanation); Alford, Holsey, Lincoln and Bynum.

Mr. Bynum moved to amend the modified resolution by substituting the following:

Strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert:

That any attempt to present any petition or memorial from any slave or slaves, negro or free negroes, from any part of the union, is a contempt of the house, calculated to embroil it in strife and confusion, incompatible with the dignity of the body; and any member guilty of the same justly subjects himself to the censure of the house.

Resolved, further, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the fact whether any such attempt has been made by any member of the house, and report the same as soon as practicable.

The debate was continued by Mr. Graves, in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. Phillips inquired what was the question before the house?

The chair said the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. Bynum).

Mr. P. then raised the point of order, that that amendment was not in order; that the question, if this amendment were allowed, would cease to be a question of privilege, inasmuch as the two resolutions changed the nature of the inquiry, and, therefore, he contended they were not in order.

The speaker expressed his decided opinion that the resolutions were in order; and, after some desultory conversation, the point of order was withdrawn.

Mr. Patton moved the amendment by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting as follows:

That the right of petition does not belong to the slaves of this union, and that no petition from them can be presented to this house without derogating from the rights of the slaveholding states, and endangering the integrity of the union.

Resolved, That any member who shall hereafter present any such petition to the house ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of the house, the rights of the south, and an enemy to the union.

Resolved, That the hon. J. Q. Adams having solemnly disclaimed all design of doing any thing disrespectful to the house, in the inquiry he made of the speaker as to the petition purporting to be from slaves, and having avowed his intention not to offer to present the petition if the house was of opinion that it ought not to be presented; therefore all further proceedings in regard to his conduct now cease.

The debate was continued by Messrs. W. Thompson, Adams, (in explanation); Calhoun, of Kentucky, and Cushing.

Mr. French obtained the floor and intimated his desire to address the house; but not feeling himself capable, at this late hour, of submitting his remarks, he would, he said, be glad if the house would indulge him with an adjournment; and he made that motion.

Mr. Cambreleng called for the yeas and nays, which were refused.

And, the question being taken, the motion to adjourn was decided in the affirmative—ayes 101, noes 34.

So, at 6 o'clock, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Feb. 8. [As before stated, the further consideration of the subject was postponed until to-morrow.]

Thursday, Feb. 9. The unfinished business was the question of privilege under consideration at the hour of adjournment on Tuesday last.

The question before the house was on the following modified resolution of Mr. W. Thompson:

Resolved, That the hon. John Q. Adams, a member of the house, by stating in his place that he had in his possession a paper, purporting to be a petition from slaves, and inquiring if it was within the meaning of a resolution heretofore adopted, (as preliminary to its presentation), has given color to the idea that slaves have the right to petition, and of his readiness to be their organ; and that, for the same, he deserves the censure of this house.

Resolved, That the aforesaid J. Q. Adams receive a censure from the speaker, in the presence of the house of representatives.

To which the following amendment was heretofore offered by Mr. Bynum:

Strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert:

That any attempt to present any petition or memorial from any slave or slaves, negro or free negroes, from any part of the union, is a contempt of the house, calculated to embroil it in strife and confusion, incompatible with the dignity of the body; and any member guilty of the same justly subjects himself to the censure of the house.

Resolved, further, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the fact whether any such attempt has been made by any member of the house, and report the same as soon as practicable.

To which amendment Mr. Patton heretofore offered the following amendment:

That the right of petition does not belong to the slaves of this union, and that no petition from them can be presented to this house without derogating from the rights of the slaveholding states, and endangering the integrity of the union.

Resolved, That any member who shall hereafter present any such petition to the house ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of the house, the rights of the south, and an enemy to the union.

Resolved, That the hon. J. Q. Adams having solemnly disclaimed all design of doing any thing disrespectful to the house, in the inquiry he made of the speaker as to the petition purporting to be from slaves, and having avowed his intention not to offer to present the petition if the house was of opinion that it ought not to be presented, therefore all further proceedings in regard to his conduct now cease.

And the question immediately pending was on the amendment to the amendment last given.

Mr. French, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the house at length, in support of the resolution.

Mr. Milligan, after some prefatory remarks in opposition to all the propositions which had been submitted in relation to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and after expressing his conviction that no practical good could result from the discussion, moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. Gholson called for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. Adams asked the house to consider the situation in which he stood. He stood here in a double capacity; first as a member of the house, and, secondly, as a culprit at the bar.

Mr. Milligan said that, if the gentleman from Massachusetts felt aggrieved at the motion, he (Mr. M.) would cheerfully withdraw it.

Mr. Adams said, under the permission of the house, he would state that nothing could aggrieve him more than that such a motion should prevail.—He demanded justice at the hands of the house; he demanded to be heard.

Mr. Milligan withdrew his motion.

Mr. Adams said he did not wish to throw any obstacle in the way of the proceedings of the house.—All he asked was, that before the vote was taken whether censure should be cast on him, he should be heard in his own defence. If the vote of censure did not pass, he should then ask the house to consider the question under consideration.

Mr. Evans proceeded to address the house in opposition to the resolutions in every form in which they had been offered, on the ground that all of them were either false in their facts or wanting in definition. Mr. E. argued at great length, and proceeded to rebut the charge which had been brought, that the petitioners for the abolition of slavery had used disrespectful language towards the institutions of the south, for which they ought to be held responsible, by showing that the same doctrines had been advocated, and the same language used by the south itself. In support of this position Mr. E. was about to quote certain passages from the debates in the convention of Virginia which adopted the federal constitution; when

Mr. Patton rose to a point of order. He submitted that the debate would be interminable, if matter as irrelevant as this were to be admitted. He must therefore call on the speaker to enforce the rules of the house.

The speaker said he was aware the debate had taken an extremely wide range, and he had felt great delicacy in interfering. He hoped that, without any formal interposition, the gentleman from Maine would confine himself to the question immediately before the house.

Mr. Evans addressed the house in opposition to the resolution in any form.

A considerable space of time was consumed in debating questions of order.

Mr. Patton offered the following as a substitute for his amendment.

Resolved, That any member who shall hereafter present to the house any petition from the slaves of this union, ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of the house, the right of the southern states, and unfriendly to the union.

Resolved, That the hon. John Q. Adams having solemnly disclaimed all design of doing any thing disrespectful to the house in the inquiry he made of the speaker as to the petition purporting to be from slaves, and having avowed his intention not to offer to present the petition if the house was of opinion that it ought not to be presented; therefore, all further proceedings in regard to his conduct do now cease.

Mr. W. Thompson accepted this as a modification of his resolution; and

Mr. Bynum withdrew his amendment.

Mr. Vanderpoel then moved the previous question, which the house refused to second.

Mr. Adams addressed the house in his own defence.

After which, Mr. Hannegan moved the previous question, but withdrew the call on the promise of Mr. W. Thompson to renew it.

Mr. T. then made some explanations in reply to Mr. Adams, and, according to promise, renewed the demand for the previous question.

And the house seconded the call. Ayes 93, noes not counted.

Mr. Reed called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. Gholson asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. Underwood moved an adjournment. Rejected.

And the question being taken, the motion to lay the whole subject on the table was decided in the negative—yeas 56, nays 135.

So the motion to lay on the table was decided in the negative.

The previous question was then put, viz: "Shall the main question be now put?" and decided in the affirmative.

The main question was then divided.

And on the question that the house do agree to the first resolution, which is as follows:

1. Resolved, That any member who shall hereafter present any petition from the slaves of this union ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of the house, the rights of the southern states, and unfriendly to the union:

It was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Beale, Bell, Bouldin, Boyd, Bynum, John Calhoun, Gambreleng, Campbell, Carter, John Chambers, Chapman, Nath. H. Claiborne, John F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Dawson, Deberry, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Elmore, Forester, French, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gholson, Glascock, Graham, Grantland, Graves, Grayson, Griffin, Joseph Hall, Hamer, Hannegan, Hardin, A. Whittlesey—105.

The question was then put that the house do agree to the second resolution, which is as follows:

2. Resolved, That the hon. John Q. Adams having solemnly disclaimed all design of doing any thing disrespectful to the house in the inquiry he made of the speaker as to the petition purporting to be from slaves, and having avowed his intention not to offer to present the petition if the house was of opinion that it ought not to be presented; therefore, all further proceedings in regard to his conduct do now cease:

And passed in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Black, John Calhoun, Carter, N. H. Claiborne, John F. H. Claiborne, Craig, Deberry, Dunlap, Gholson, Huntsman, Jenifer, Lawler, A. Mann, Maury, Peyton, Robertson, Shields, Standefer, Wagener, S. Williams—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Alford, C. Allan, H. Allen, Anthony, Bailey, Barton, Beaumont, Bockee, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, W. B. TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS,

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

February 9. Mr. Grundy having, as stated in our last, offered a resolution directing the secretary of the senate to inform the house of representatives that the senate have elected Richard M. Johnson, of Ky. vice president of the United States for four years from the 4th of March next, &c.

Mr. Swift presented the petition of inhabitants of the town of Georgia, in the state of Vermont, praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Swift moved to refer that part of the petition which relates to the slave trade, to the committee for the District of Columbia, remarking that he believed the question on this subject had not been distinctly tried.

Mr. Brown moved to lay this motion on the table; which was accordingly ordered by yeas and nays; on the call of Mr. Swift, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Ala. King, of Georgia, Lyon, Moore, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Clayton, Hendricks, Knight, McKean, Niles, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Wall, Webster—12.

On motion of Mr. Davis, the committee on commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the legislature of Delaware, in relation to hospital money.

Also, from the further consideration of the petition of inhabitants of Beaufort, N. C. for a marine hospital: both these subjects having already been brought before the senate.

Mr. Davis, from the same committee, reported the house bill referred to them, to change the name of the Dayton collection district, in Massachusetts, to that of Fall River. Considered, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. Prentiss, the committee on pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Jonathan Nicholas, praying for arrears of pension.

Mr. Ruggles, on leave, introduced a bill granting a patent to James Smith; which was read twice, and referred.

Mr. Calhoun, on leave, introduced a bill to cede the public lands to the new states on certain conditions therein named. The bill was read twice by unanimous consent.

Mr. Walker moved to commit the bill to a select committee.

After a few remarks from Messrs. Brown, Walker and Niles, approving the bill,

Mr. Webster having remarked on the great importance of the subject, and the inexpediency of exciting undue expectations respecting it, moved to reconsider the vote on the second reading of the bill, and called for the yeas and nays on the question.

The chair decided that this was not a kind of motion which, according to the rules of the senate, could be received. Mr. Robinson withdrew his motion to commit the bill; and Mr. Webster then again made his motion to reconsider. A debate arose on this bill, in which Messrs. Webster, Calhoun, Brown, Clay, Benton and Hubbard participated.

The yeas and nays were ordered on Mr. Webster's motion to reconsider, and it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Georgia, Knight, Niles, Page, Parker, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Calhoun, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, King, of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, McKean, Moore, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Robinson, Sevier, Tipton, Walker, White—22.

The bill being thus reinstated on its first reading, and requiring the unanimous consent of the senate to be read a second time to-day, it of course lies on the table till to-morrow.

Mr. Calhoun then arose and said—I have received, within the last forty-eight hours, a communication from the chief magistrate, connected with the bill now before the senate, of such a nature that duty to myself, as well as to this body, renders it necessary that I should lay it before the senate.

[Here Mr. C. sent to the secretary the letter which was read as follows:]

Washington, February 7th, 1837.

SIR: In the Globe of the 6th inst. I find the report of a speech made by you on the 4th upon the land bill, which contains the following passages, viz:

"Was it not notorious that the president of the U. States himself had been connected with the purchase of the public lands? Yes, the 'experiment' (Mr. Calhoun delighted in the word), was the cause of speculation in public lands, and if this bill should not be passed, speculations could not go on, and the price of the public lands must consequently be reduced. He contended that every man could not but see that it would be utter ruin to those who had borrowed money to speculate in lands, if the system was not to go on." In a former part of your speech, as reported, you say: "The speculation which a particular state of things has given rise to, had been produced by those in power. They had profited by that state of things; and should this bill be passed, it would only consummate their wishes," &c. &c.

Knowing the liabilities of reporters to err in taking down and writing out the speeches of members of congress, I have made inquiry in relation to the accuracy of this report, and have been furnished with certificates of gentlemen who heard you, affirming that it is substantially correct.

You cannot but be aware, sir, that the imputations which your language convey are calculated, if believed, to destroy my character as a man, and that the charge is one which, if true, ought to produce my impeachment and punishment as a public officer. If I caused the removal of the deposites for the base purpose of enriching myself or my friends by any of the results which might grow out of that measure, there is no term of reproach which I do not deserve, and no punishment known to the laws which ought not to be inflicted upon me. On the contrary, if the whole imputation, both as to motive and fact, be a fabrication and a calumny, the punishment which belongs to me, if guilty, is too mild for him who wilfully makes it.

I am aware, sir, of the constitutional privilege under which this imputation is cast forth, and the immunity which it secures. That privilege it is in no degree my purpose to violate, however gross and wicked may have been the use of it. But I exercise only the common right of every citizen, when I inform you, that the imputations you have cast upon me are false in every particular, not having for the last ten years purchased any public land, or had any interest in such purchase. The whole charge, unless explained, must be considered the offspring of a morbid imagination, or of sleepless malice.

I ask you, sir, as an act due to justice, honor and truth, to retract this charge on the floor of the senate, in as public a manner as it has been uttered—it being the most appropriate mode by which you can repair the injury which might otherwise flow from it.

But in the event that you fail to do so, I then demand that you place your charge before the house of representatives, that they may institute the necessary proceeding to ascertain the truth or falsehood of your imputation, with a view to such further measures as justice may require.

If you will neither do justice to yourself, nor place the matter in a position where justice may be done me by the representatives of the people, I shall be compelled to resort to the only remedy left me, and before I leave the city, give publicity to this letter, by which you will stand stigmatized as one who, protected by his constitutional privilege, is ready to stab the reputation of others, without the magnanimity to do them justice, or the honor to place them in a situation to receive it from others.

Yours, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The hon. J. C. Calhoun, U. S. senate.

P. S. I herewith enclose you the copies of two notes, verifying the correctness of the report of your speech in the Globe of the 6th instant.

February 7, 1837.

A. J.

(No. 1.)

Washington city, February 6, 1837.

At the request of the president of the United States, I hereby certify that I was present in the gallery of the senate of the U. States on Saturday, the 4th instant, during a discussion upon the land bill, and heard some of the remarks of Mr. Calhoun upon that subject, in which the president was charged with being a speculator in public lands.

On coming out of the capitol the subject was mentioned to me by a friend of the president. And my recollection of the words used accorded with what he understood had been said, and which in substantially the same as reported in the Globe of the 6th instant.

Signed ARTHUR CAMPBELL.

(No. 2.)

Washington city, February 7th, 1837.

SIR: In answer to your inquiry of me whether Mr. Calhoun, in his remarks on the land bill, on Saturday last, used the words attributed to him by me in the report, which appeared in "the Globe" of yesterday, viz:

"Was it not notorious that the president of the United States himself had been connected with the purchase of public lands?" I would state that I have referred to my short hand notes, and find that such was the language he used according to the best of my knowledge and belief. Yours, very respectfully,

Signed W. E. DRAKE.

I certify that No. 1 and No. 2 are true copies of the originals. Test: A. JACKSON, jr.

I do not intend, (said Mr. Calhoun) in what I propose to say, to comment on the character or the language of this extraordinary letter. It has excited in my bosom but one feeling—that of pity for the weakness of the author, contempt for his meanness, and humiliation that one occupying the office which he does, should place himself in a situation so unworthy of his exalted station. Nor do I intend to invoke the interposition of the senate to protect the privilege attached to a senator from one of the sovereign states of this confederacy, which has been outraged in my person. I seek no aid to defend my own privileges, and, so far from being intimidated, I shall be emboldened to express myself with greater freedom, if possible to denounce the corruption of the administration, or the violation of the laws and of the constitution in consequence of this attempt to restrain the free exercise of the right of expressing my opinion upon all subjects concerning the public interests, secured to me by the constitution. I leave to the senate to determine what measures the preservation of their own privileges demands.

Much less do I intend to comply with the request, or demand made of me; demand has no place between equals, and I hold myself within my constitutional privilege at least equal to the chief magistrate himself. I, as a legislator, have a right to investigate and pronounce upon his conduct, and to condemn his acts freely, whenever I consider them to be in violation of the laws and of the constitution. I, as a senator may judge him; he can never judge me.

My object is to avail myself of the occasion to reiterate what I said, as broadly and fully as I uttered them on a former occasion, here in my place, where alone I am responsible, and where the friends of the president will have an opportunity to correct my statement, if erroneous, or to refute my conclusions, if not fairly drawn. I spoke without notes, and it may be that I may omit something which I said on the former occasion that may be deemed material, or to express myself less full and strongly than I then did. If so I will thank any senator to remind me, so that my statement now may be as strong and full as then.

If my memory serves me, I opened my remarks, when I spoke formerly, by stating that so many and so subtle were the devices by which those who were in power could, in these times, fleece the people, without their knowing it, that it was almost enough to make a lover of his country despair of its liberty. I then stated that I knew of no measure which could better illustrate the truth of this remark, than the one now before us. Its professed object is to restrict the sales of public land, in order, as is avowed, to prevent speculation; and, by consequence, the accumulation of a surplus revenue in the treasury. The measure is understood to be an administration measure. I then stated that, so far from preventing speculation, it would, in fact, but consummate the greatest speculation, which this country has ever witnessed—a speculation originating in a state of things of which those in power were the authors; by which they had profited; and which this measure, should it become a law, would but complete. I then asked what had caused such an extraordinary demand for public land, that the sales should have more than quintupled within the last three years—and said that, to answer this question, we must look to the state of the currency. That it was owing to the extraordinary increase of bank paper, which had filled to repletion all the channels of circulation. The secretary had estimated this increase, within that period, from six dollars and fifty cents per individual, to ten dollars. I believe the increase to be much greater—the effects of which have been to double the price of every article, which has not been kept down by some particular cause. In the mean time the price of public land has remained unaltered, at one dollar and twenty-five cents the acre; and the natural consequence was, that this excessive currency overflowed upon the public land, and has caused those extraordinary speculations which it is the professed object of this bill to prevent.

I then asked what had caused this inundation of paper? The answer was, the experiment. (I love to remind the gentlemen of the word), which had removed the only restrictions that had existed against the issue of bank paper. The consequence was predicted at the time—it was foretold that banks would multiply without number, and pour forth their issue without restriction or limitation. These predictions were at the time unheeded; their truth now begins to be realized.

The experiment commenced by a transfer of the public funds from where they were placed by law, and where they were under its safeguard and protection, to banks which were under the sole and unlimited control of the executive. The effect was a vast increase of executive patronage, and the opening of a field of speculation, in describing which, in anticipation, I pronounced it to be so ample, that Rothschild himself might envy the opportunity which it afforded. Such it has proved to be.

The administration has profited by this vast patronage, and the prejudice which it has excited against the bank as the means of sustaining themselves in power. It is unnecessary to repeat the remarks, in illustration of this. The truth of the statement is known to all the senators, who have daily witnessed the party topics which have been drawn from this fruitful source. I then remarked, that if rumor were to be trusted, it was not only in a political point of view that those in power had profited by the experiment—they had profited in a pecuniary, as well as in a political point of view. It has been frequently stated, and not contradicted, that many in high places, are among the speculators in public lands; and that even an individual connected with the president himself, one of his nephews, was an extensive adventurer in this field of speculation. I did not name him, but I now feel myself called upon to do so. I mean Mr. McLemore.

Having established these points, I next undertook to show that this bill would consummate those speculations, and establish the political ascendancy which the experiment had given to the administration. In proof of the former, I availed myself of the declaration of the chairman of the committee on public lands, who had stated that the speculators had already purchased and held a vast amount of public lands, not less, as I understood him, than twenty-five or thirty millions of acres, and that if this bill did not pass, the scenes of the last two years would be repeated in this and the coming year. I then undertook to show, from the showing of the chairman himself, that these speculations would prove ruinous without the aid of this bill. He had stated that the annual demand for public land, resulting from our increased population, could not exceed five millions of acres.

Now, assuming that the quantity on hand is thirty millions of acres, there would be six years' supply in the hands of speculators, even if the land offices of the United States be closed; and that if the bill did not pass, according to his showing, it would take double or treble the time to dispose of the lands, which, in that case, will be in the hands of speculators. All must see the certain ruin, in that event, of those who have borrowed money to speculate in the land; particularly, if the sales of public land should be free and open to every one, as it now is, to purchase to the extent of his means. I next showed that the contest was between the government, as a dealer in public land, and the speculators; that they held in market at least an equal quantity in value to that which the government now has offered for sale, and that every restriction imposed upon the sales of government land, must of necessity increase the advantages of its rival dealers.

I then showed that very onerous and oppressive restrictions, of an odious character, upon the sale of the public lands, would be imposed, if the bill should pass. No one thereafter could purchase land of the government without license—a license, in my opinion, as offensive and odious as would be a license on the press. To obtain this license, the oath of the applicant was required; and then it could only be obtained on payment of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, for which the citizen may now receive a grant in fee simple. After he had made his purchase, under authority of his license, the purchaser has to comply with the condition of settlement and cultivation, and must within the period of five years, prove to the satisfaction of the register and receiver, who are made high judicial officers, a compliance with these conditions, before he can receive his title: and if he failed to comply, by accident or otherwise, he forfeits both his money and the land. I stated that this was a virtual increase of the price of the public lands to the actual settlers; so much so, that any sober minded man would prefer to give the speculators two dollars per acre for land of the same quality, to giving the government one dollar and twenty-five cents for a license, with these oppressive conditions.

Having established this point, I then undertook to show that it would increase vastly the power of the government in the new states, if they chose to exercise this patronage for political purposes. That they would so use it, we have ample proof in the past conduct of the administration, and in the principles which have been openly avowed by its friends. A former senator from New York, high in the confidence of the party, and now chief magistrate of that state, had openly avowed, in his place on this floor, that to the victor belongs the spoils, for which he was reprimanded, at the time, by the senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster), in a manner worthy of his distinguished talents. Assuming, then, that the power would be exercised with a view to political influence, I showed that it would place a vast number of the citizens of the new states, probably not less than one hundred thousand, in a condition of complete dependence on the receivers, and of vassalage to the government.

These are the sentiments which I delivered on a former occasion and which I now reiterate to the full extent—omitting nothing that is material, as far as connected with the letter of the president; and for the delivery of which, my privileges as a senator, and those of this body have been grossly outraged.

Mr. Grundy and Mr. Walker rose and stated that they had been attentive listeners during the debate alluded to in the president's letter, and corroborated the correctness of Mr. Calhoun's statement of what he said on that occasion.

Mr. Clay also addressed the senate in a speech of deep interest, which shall have a place hereafter.

Mr. Calhoun then said that he was gratified at what had been said, and that all might now see, from their statement and the acquiescence of others, what little cause the president had for the outrage, upon his privilege, and that of the senate, and for applying language to him which is never used in intercourse between gentlemen, and better suited to the purview of Billingsgate than to the mansion of the chief magistrate.

[The land bill was then taken up, read a third time and passed—for particulars, yeas and nays, &c. see page 384.]

February 10. Mr. Grundy, from the committee appointed to inform Mr. VAN BUREN of his election as president of the United States, reported that they had performed that duty, and had received the expression of his grateful sense of the distinguished honor conferred on him by his fellow citizens, and his assurance to the two houses of congress that they might rely on his efforts to fulfil the responsible trust in a manner most conducive to the public interest.

After some minor business had been disposed of, Mr. Swift said that either the journal of yesterday's proceedings, as read by the secretary, was incorrect, or several senators had voted under a misappprehension of the question on the petition presented by him yesterday in relation to slavery and the slave trade in the District.

Mr. Clayton stated that he had understood the question to be on the motion of Mr. Swift to refer that portion of the petition which related to the regulation of the slave trade in the District (over which subject he thought congress had power) to the committee for the District; and he had therefore voted in the affirmative, because he regarded that trade as an infamous and inhuman traffic, which ought to be abolished.

The chair said the journal was correct, and that objection having been made to the petition, the question was simply and exclusively on its reception. Mr. Clayton's vote, by unanimous consent, was then altered from the affirmative to the negative.

The following resolution was offered by Mr. Clay, and, by consent, adopted:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to transmit to the senate a copy of a communication addressed to the commissioner of the general land office by John Pope, late governor of the territory of Arkansas, respecting the ten sections of land granted to the said territory for the erection of a public building at Little Rock.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1837, was considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. Davis, the bill authorising the appointment of a commission of three persons to make experiments on inventions to prevent the explosion of steam boilers, was considered; the blanks filled by appropriating $6,000 for the expense of the experiments, and $300 each for the pay of the commissioners. Amended on motion of Mr. Hendricks, by appropriating $5,000 additional for the trial of the "double self-acting safety valve," on the western waters; and, together with the amendments, ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. Webster, the vote laying on the table the bill anticipating the payment to claimants of the French indemnities was reconsidered, and the bill was recommitted to the committee on finance.

On motion of Mr. Black the senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to designate and limit the kinds of funds receivable for the public revenue.

Mr. Hubbard moved an amendment to the bill requiring the registers and receivers to receive the same scrip in payment for the public lands as heretofore.

Mr. Clay remarked that the bill in its present form left the treasury order unrescinded, the subject of that order being still wholly in the discretion of the secretary of the treasury. He had an amendment therefore to offer, which, if accepted by Mr. Hubbard as a part of his, and adopted by the senate, would reconcile him to the bill. This amendment declared that it was not lawful for the secretary of the treasury to make any discrimination in the funds so receivable as public revenue.

Mr. Hubbard accepted this addition to his amendment, which amendment so amended was adopted by unanimous consent.

Mr. Ewing called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, which were ordered.

Mr. Benton gave extracts from a letter which he had lately received from Missouri, stating that all parties there were now in favor of the treasury order, which he accompanied with some remarks; and afterwards spoke for some time in favor of specie and against paper money and the bank of the United States.

Mr. Black said that in Mississippi all parties were now united in condemnation of the treasury order; and he had just learned, by a respectable gazette, that resolutions condemning that order had just been introduced into the legislature of Mississippi, and had received the unanimous vote of the house of representatives in their favor.

Mr. Ewing remarked that the bill, as now amended, was nearly all he desired. He would therefore now give it his hearty concurrence.

Messrs. Niles, Benton and Walker participated for a while in a general financial discussion, having an especial reference to banks, paper money, and the treasury order.

Mr. Calhoun said he had been very anxious to express his opinions somewhat at large on this subject. He put no faith in this measure to arrest the downward course of the country. He believed the state of the currency was almost incurably bad, so that it was very doubtful whether the highest skill and wisdom could restore it to soundness; and it was destined, at no distant time, to undergo an entire revolution. An explosion he considered inevitable, and so much the greater the longer it should be delayed. Mr. C. would have been glad to go over the whole subject; but as he was now unprepared to assign his reasons for the vote which he might give, he was unwilling to vote at all.

The bill was then passed by the following vote: YEAS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis, Ewing, of Illinois, Ewing, of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Knight, McKean, Moore, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Webster, White—41.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Linn, Morris, Ruggles, Wright—5.

On motion of Mr. White, the senate held an executive session.

When the doors were opened—

The chair presented a message from the president of the United States with a copy of the treaty of commerce between the United States and the empire of Morocco. Laid on the table.

The senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to amend the judiciary system of the United States. An amendment reported from the committee altering the order of the several circuits was adopted.

Mr. Grundy offered several amendments, one of which made the districts of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Michigan the seventh circuit, and others made the number of terms in the new states and territories one instead of two in a year.

At the request of Mr. Grundy, who wished for further time to incorporate his amendments with the bill, having failed in a motion to reconsider the vote on the committee's amendment, with which his were designed to be connected, the action on the bill was suspended by unanimous consent.

The bill making appropriations for fortifications, &c. for the year 1837, coming up in its order, Mr. Calhoun moved to lay it on the table. Mr. Benton called for the yeas and nays on this motion; which were ordered, and the motion negatived—Yeas 8, noes 20. Mr. Benton remarked that the bill was precisely the same which had passed the senate at the last session. Mr. Southard remarked on the great importance of the bill, and wished that action upon it might not be hasty. Mr. Calhoun, also remarking on the impropriety of haste on such a measure, moved to lay the bill on the table till tomorrow.

Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, moved an adjournment; which was negatived by yeas 12, nays 21. Mr. Calhoun said that this bill was so unexpected, and the hour so late, that he should decline making the observations which he intended to make, unless further time should be allowed. He modified his motion so as simply to lay the bill on the table; which motion was negatived by yeas and nays, on the call of Mr. Benton, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Ewing, of Ohio, King, of Georgia, Moore, Prentiss, Robinson, Southard, Swift, White—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Dana, Davis, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Alabama, Linn, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, Wright—23.

The bill was then reported to the senate, and ordered to a third reading, without a division.

The senate then adjourned.

February 11. The chair presented a communication from the war department, in obedience to a senate resolution of the 7th instant, with a report and other documents from the commissioner on Indian affairs. Ordered to be printed.

After several memorials and petitions had been presented and several reports received from committees, Mr. Grundy from the committee appointed to inform RICHARD M. JOHNSON of his election as vice president of the United States, presented a communication from him, accepting the office; which was read and laid on the table.

Among the bills reported was one by Mr. Davis, from the committee on commerce, authorising the president of the United States to employ public vessels as relief vessels in winter, when not otherwise employed. Mr. D. gave notice that he should call it up at an early day. Read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Tomlinson, from the committee on pensions, reported a bill for the relief of David Gilmore; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. Tomlinson, the petition of the General Hospital society of Connecticut, on the files of the senate, was referred to the committee on commerce.

The bill (Mr. Calhoun's) to cede the public lands on certain conditions to the new states, came up in its order for a second reading. Mr. Hubbard, observing that Mr. Webster, who objected to the bill, was not now in his seat, expressed the hope that the senate would not now proceed to act upon it. Mr. Calhoun expressed the hope that the bill would take its due course. The discussion upon it he believed would continue four or five days, which would give Mr. Webster an opportunity of expressing his views on the subject. He desired that it might be referred to a select committee, and that Mr. Webster should be a member of that committee. Mr. Norvell made a few remarks in favor of the bill and of immediate action upon it. Mr. Hubbard, still advocating delay, said he regarded the long debate which was likely to arise on the bill as a sufficient reason why it should not be acted upon at all at this session. He also regarded the bill as likely to result in evil to the new states themselves. Mr. Webster, having come into the chamber, rose, and spoke at considerable length in opposition to the bill, and against acting upon it at all at the present time. Messrs. Sevier and Walker replied to Mr. Webster, and advocated the bill. Mr. Niles briefly opposed taking up the bill at this session, and Mr. Robinson spoke briefly in favor of it, and of immediate action upon it. Mr. Southard spoke at large in opposition to the bill, and Mr. Calhoun followed in general defence of the bill, and in reply to the gentlemen who had opposed it.

The debate was further continued by Mr. Hubbard against the bill, by Messrs. Tipton and Benton in its favor and by Mr. Buchanan in opposition to it.

Mr. Hubbard then moved to lay the motion for the second reading of the bill on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays; which, being taken, were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Crittenden, Dana, Ewing, of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, Knight, Niles, Page, Parker, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Calhoun, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, King, of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Robinson, Sevier, Tipton, Walker, White—20.

So the bill was laid on the table; but, on motion of Mr. Sevier, it was ordered to be printed.

The senate then proceeded to take up a bill making provision for the collection of materials and the purchase of sites for certain fortifications therein designated. [It appropriates about a million and a half of dollars to these objects.]

Mr. Crittenden demanded further information in reference to the necessity of these works, the estimates upon which the appropriations were founded and the total expense of completing the work for which this bill appropriating a million and a half of dollars proposed only to make preparation.

Mr. Benton, chairman of the military committee, who had reported the bill, stated in reply that it was identically the same bill which had passed the senate at the last session. The senator was, therefore, in possession of full information in regard to it.

Mr. Southard opposed the bill in most of its features. It was a carrying out of the plan which had been laid down by general Bernard. And though the scheme of defence by fortifications proposed by that celebrated engineer might have been wisely adapted to the state of the country at that period, its condition had since been so greatly changed, by the increase of its population, and the augmentation of its power, that many of the features of the plan were no longer necessary, and might advantageously be dispensed with. The improvements which had been made in the means for transportation of the munitions of war rendered it now a comparatively easy thing to concentrate large bodies of the militia at any point that might be threatened by a foe. And thus the necessity of many forts otherwise requisite was superseded. And forts, if not judiciously located, were not only of no valuable service, but owing to the train of consequences they drew after them, were a positive evil.

Mr. S. had carefully examined the report of the secretary of war on this subject, made to congress at a preceding session, and he had then become satisfied that many of the proposed works were of this description. He wished to have further time to examine the bill; and therefore moved to lay it upon the table till Monday, but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. Benton, who briefly replied; stating that the estimates upon which the bill was founded had all been submitted and explained at the last session; after which the bill had passed the senate. He admitted the facility with which large bodies of troops might be thrown into any city or town that was threatened by an enemy. But when they were there, though there should be half a million of them, of what avail would they be against a bombardment? A bomb charged with bushels of powder and balls could be discharged at the distance of 4,000 yards, and if it exploded in the midst of a squadron of horse or a column of troops, it would scatter or destroy them. A man-of-war would desire no better amusement, while its crew would remain in perfect safety from the force on shore.—Forts were also necessary for the protection of merchant vessels, and even of our ships of war when pursued by a greatly unequal force.

Mr. Southard now renewed his motion to lay the bill on the table. Mr. Buchanan demanded the yeas and nays, which being taken, were—yeas 12, nays 28. So the senate refused to lay the bill on the table.

The bill being at its third reading, and the question being on its passage,

Mr. Benton demanded the yeas and nays; which were taken and stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Dana, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Alabama, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Wright—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Moore, Prentiss, Robinson, Southard, Spence, Swift, Webster, White—12.

So the bill was passed.

Some time was occupied in considering the military appropriation bill, to which Mr. White proposed an appropriation to the Tennessee volunteers, who were ordered into service and discharged. As the bill was at its third reading, this motion could only be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. Southard said that he felt favorably disposed toward the amendment, but, wishing a little farther time to look at it, suggested that the bill be laid on the table until Monday. To which Mr. Wright assenting, the bill was laid on the table accordingly.

The chair presented a communication from the treasury department, in reply to senate resolutions of the 1st instant, with a report in relation to frauds on the public lands. Referred and ordered to be printed.

The senate then adjourned.

February 13. Mr. Parker presented a memorial from the District of Columbia, praying the immediate recognition of the independence of Texas, which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Davis reported a bill to establish a collection district and port of entry at Jersey City in the state of New Jersey; read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Davis also reported a bill authorizing Charles Dana and David R. Butts, of Georgia, to import two iron steamboats for river navigation, free of duty; read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Norvell moved resolutions inquiring into the expediency of granting to the state of Michigan five hundred thousand acres of land, for the purpose of improving the navigation of the rivers in that state; and as to the expediency of establishing a port of entry at the town of St. Joseph, on Lake Michigan, which were adopted.

On motion of Mr. Grundy the bill supplementary to the act to amend the judiciary system of the United States was considered, amended and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. Ruggles, the senate proceeded to consider the bill supplementary to the act for the improvement of the useful arts, (the patent office bill), amended and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The chair presented a communication from the state department relative to the claim of R. W. Meade, which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Walker moved to take up the resolution offered by him some time since, recognizing the independence of Texas.

Mr. Wright urged the taking up of the army appropriation bill.

Mr. Benton claimed as a right that the unfinished business should first be taken up. He had a bill for the increase of the army, which would regularly come up as the unfinished business. The vote to take it up now would, if rejected be decisive of its fate. It had been early reported but deferred to take up other bills, and he now claimed that it should now be considered.

Mr. Walker contended that the honor of the country demanded that the Texas resolution should now be taken up.

Mr. Benton objected, with warmth, to senators jumping up in this manner and interrupting the regular business of the senate, as reported from standing committees, by interposing the consideration of resolutions of their own. The army bills were of great importance, and if this resolution should be taken up before them, the prolonged debate to which it would lead, must effectually defeat all hope of having them considered in time for the action of the other house.

Mr. Preston admitted the importance of the army bills, and should not object to their being considered; but this resolution on the subject of Texas had been offered a month ago, and if longer delayed might be lost.

The question on considering Mr. Walker's resolution, was then taken and decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Fulton, Hendricks, King, of Georgia, Moore, Mouton, Parker, Preston, Walker, White—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis, Ewing, of Illinois, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Ala. Knight, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Wright—32.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the "bill to increase the present military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. Benton explained the objects of the bill by sections, and no opposition being made to it, it was ordered to a third reading.

The army appropriation bill was then read a third time and passed.

The senate took up the bill to establish a foundry, an armory in the west and southwest, arsenals in the states in which none have yet been established and depots for arms in certain states and territories.

Mr. Benton briefly explained its designs.

Mr. Crittenden doubted the propriety of establishing arsenals in all the states, though he admitted the propriety of establishing them in some. He reprobated such unnecessary expenditures of the public money, and spoke against the extension of federal power to which a measure of this kind must necessarily lead.

Mr. Benton maintained that it was a part of the theory of our government that the nation should be armed, and in order to this end, it was necessary both that the manufacture of arms should be extended and that depots should be established for keeping them in all the states.

Mr. Calhoun had looked at the provisions of the bill, and that nothing in this world could be more useless than the expenditures it proposed. The country already had on hand 800,000 stand of arms—an amount almost equal to that provided by Great Britain for her immense military establishment.—The mere interest upon such an investment was a heavy charge upon the treasury; besides which, there was a liability to have the whole superseded by the invention of a better species of arms. The government had already two large armories capable of furnishing arms much faster than they were needed; and there was a necessity rather for retrenching than extending the means of supply. The money was to be expended on something, and, perhaps it might as well be on this as on any things else. The government must get clear of it in some way: it must not go back to the states, and ways and means must be devised to expend it. The bill had no other object on the face of the earth. Mr. C. appealed to the senate and exhorted them to economise the public expenditure. He reminded them of the denunciations that had been heaped on a former administration on account of its extravagance, and that it was on the plea and promise of economy that the present party had come into power. Yet no sooner had they got control of the treasury, than they went on to expend beyond all previous example. The moral effect of this state of things had been most pernicious. It had led the nation to believe that the professions of no party could be believed.

Mr. Benton in reply read from the returns of the treasury department the sums paid for the manufacture of arms at private establishments, amounting to nearly a quarter of a million of dollars, and argued from the fact of government being compelled to purchase of private establishments, the necessity for another public armory. These private establishments existed from the District of Columbia to the north and east, while on the frontier, there was not a single factory. As to our having a full supply, it was what he could not understand. There was a continual consumption, and a continual increase of population, and therefore a necessity for constant manufacture. If the United States had to-day all they needed, and could keep every gun without rust or decay, twenty-five years hence we should have only half a supply for the population then increased to that proportion. Instead of keeping all the guns' one-half of them would be gone.

It would not do to quote the example of Great Britain—they only wanted arms to put in the hands of their standing army to shoot down her unarmed population the moment they resisted any measure of government.

He said that in behalf of Missouri, that the most acceptable form in which they could bestow on that state her portion of these accursed frogs which came up as from the river of Egypt, and spread themselves every where and over every thing, from the nuptial couch to the kneading trough, (he referred to the surplus balances in the treasury), was to establish amongst them an ample depot of arms.

Mr. Calhoun was very happy to hear so frank an avowal from the senator from Missouri of the truth of what he had observed when last up, that the object of the bill was to get rid of a part of the surplus revenue in the treasury. As to the argument derived from the fact that the government obtained a portion of its supply from private factories, all that was easily explained. These factories were old establishments, which had been gotten up by their proprietors expressly on the faith of the government, and they were in practice as really public establishments as the armories of the government. The government had been obliged to take enough from these individuals to keep their establishments from ruin, and that was the sole reason for the item quoted by the senator from the returns. The two armories we already possessed were capable of turning out 20,000 stand of arms a year; and now it was proposed to erect a third, while the actual consumption was but between one and two thousand stands annually.—There was one source of consumption which could not be avoided; but, instead of being an argument for the manufacturer, it was a strong argument against the unnecessary multiplication of arms, and that was, their decay while lying in boxes. The larger was the amount on hand, the greater was this source of decay. The country had already between 700,000 and 800,000, which had cost it ten millions of dollars, besides a large amount of capital invested in magazines; so that the total annual interest was little, if any thing, short of a million of dollars. As to the arming of our people, this bill did not propose to put a single gun into the hands of a single man. But for what purpose was so large an amount needed? It must be either to arm the government against the people, or to fight some foreign enemy. He trusted our people did not want them to cut each other's throats. He repeated that the expenditure was useless; that it was to produce an accumulation of what was already accumulated, and was merely a contrivance to keep the money from the states.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. Benton and Calhoun, each of them insisting on the ground already taken, and endeavoring further to strengthen their respective positions.

Mr. Knight then addressed the senate as follows: I shall vote against the bill; perhaps it may be necessary to suggest some of the reasons that govern me. I know the bill contains a proposition to build an arsenal in the state from whence I come, and so far as that goes I have no objection to that part of the bill, for the money it will cost would be very acceptable to have expended there. But the question is, are the arsenals and armories contained in the bill necessary? If more arms are needed, is it necessary to build more armories? We can readily contract for their manufacture without incurring the expense of all the outlays necessary for carrying on the making of arms; the private manufacturers will make them cheaper than the United States can. We get them, now, it is believed, at a less price by contract from the private armories than they cost at our armories, without taking into consideration the immense outlays of the establishments, and the interest and cost of keeping them in repair. Sir, who are we to arm? The militia of the states, your own citizens. Then let the arms be within their reach and under their own care.—The practice now is to deliver to the several states the arms when made, and the states take care of them without further cost or trouble on the part of the United States, and whenever needed they are at the command of the governor and legislature of the state, to be used at their discretion. But if we build arsenals we must have officers to take charge and care of them; and when the arms are required by any exigencies of the state, the governor or commander must go to your corporal or sergeant, who may have charge of your arsenal, and beg him to loan those arms for the purposes needed. Now, sir, I am opposed to that; I will not place the states in such a predicament; I will give the states the arms, and if they will not take care of them, why then I would not give them any more: therefore I am for letting things remain as they now are without farther legislation.

The question being at length taken on the engrossment of the bill, it was decided by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, King, of Georgia, Knight, Moore, Parker, Prentiss, Swift—11.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill respecting the duties on Belgian vessels and cargoes was then considered, and ordered to its third reading.

The senate then, on motion of Mr. Grundy, took up the bill to alter and amend the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the U. States, [This bill provides for the punishment of death against those found guilty of burning public buildings.]

Several amendments to change the nature of the punishment being rejected,

The bill was reported to the senate; and the question being on its engrossment,

Mr. Clayton objected to the insertion of any limitation of time in reference to a crime of this magnitude. As murder, and treason, and arson, were exempted from the operation of the statute of limitations, the burning of public buildings of the United States ought to take the same course. He moved to amend the bill by inserting a clause to that effect, but it was rejected; as was also a motion of Mr. Ruggles to strike out the second section, containing the limitation clauses; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Clayton, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, of Ala. King, of Ga. Linn, Nicholas, Page, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Crittenden, Moore, Niles, Parker, Prentiss, Robinson, Southard, Walker—10.

The senate then adjourned.

February 14. Mr. Robinson reported a bill authorizing the conveyance in the mail of certain documents free of postage and for other purposes— which was read and ordered to a second reading.

A message was received from the president of the United States.

On motion of Mr. Hendricks, the senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in Ohio, Indiana and Illinois.

Mr. Norvell moved to amend the bill by annexing a provision for the construction of certain roads in Michigan, which after debate was negatived; yeas 9, nays 27.

Mr. Clay, after a few remarks in favor of only grading the road, and against hastening its progress by the appointment of an extra number of agents and officers, moved to strike out the second and third sections of the bill which provide for such appointments. After debate by Messrs. Hendricks, Clay and Tipton, Mr. Tipton moved to amend the second section by requiring that the appointment of agents and officers by the president should be made by and with the consent of the senate; which amendment prevailed.

Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, moved to amend the second section by allowing each superintendent only two assistants, at a fixed compensation of three dollars per day for their services, instead of a salary in the discretion of the president or the department. The amendments were adopted.

The question recurring on striking out the second and third sections of the bill, it was discussed by Messrs. Preston, Hendricks and Clay, and carried in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Cuthbert, Kent, King, of Ala. King, of Georgia, Knight, Lyon, McKean, Moore, Norvell, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tomlinson, Walker, White—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Ewing, of Illinois, Ewing, of Ohio, Fulton, Hendricks, Hubbard, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, Wright—17.

Mr. Clay moved to amend the bill by requiring that the road in Illinois should not be stoned or gravelled, unless at a cost not exceeding the average expense of doing it in Ohio and Indiana; which amendment, after debate by Messrs. Ewing, of Illinois, and Clay, was adopted.

Mr. Preston moved to amend the first section of the bill by reducing the appropriation for Indiana from $100,000 to $50,000, on the ground that $80,000 remained unexpended.

After debate by Messrs. Hendricks, Preston, Tipton, Benton, Walker and Clay,

Mr. Norvell moved to lay the bill on the table, which motion was negatived: yeas 16, nays 25.

The question occurring on Mr. Preston's amendment, was decided in the affirmative: yeas 22, nays 17.

Mr. Preston then moved further to amend the bill, by reducing the appropriation for Ohio from $280 to $90, the balance in hand being $100,000, which motion after debate prevailed, yeas 26, nays 19.

Mr. Preston also moved to amend the bill by reducing the appropriation for Illinois, so that the whole amount to be expended would be $130,000; which motion prevailed, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Kent, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Lyon, Moore, Niles, Norvell, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Walker, Wall, White—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Illinois, Ewing, of Ohio, Fulton, Hendricks, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wright—18.

Mr. Walker moved to amend the bill by adding as a proviso to the first section, that no part of the money appropriated by the bill should be paid out of the treasury of the United States, but out of the fund heretofore granted to Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, for the purpose of the bill.

After debate the amendment was lost by the following vote: yeas 16, nays 27.

Mr. Norvell moved to amend the bill by striking out that portion of it which required the money to be repaid into the treasury of the United States from the fund granted to Ohio, Indiana and Illinois by the United States.

After a few remarks from Mr. Clay, disapproving the provision proposed to be stricken out as deceptive, the motion to strike out was carried in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Norvell, Parker, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Southard, Strange, Walker, White—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Ewing, of Illinois, Ewing, of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Robinson, Sevier, Swift, Tallmadge, Wright—15.

On motion of Mr. Hendricks, the provision in a former act requiring a continuous construction of the road was by this bill repealed.

The bill, with the amendments, was reported to the senate.

Mr. Ewing moved to amend the bill so as to appropriate $150,000 for Ohio, $125,000 for Indiana, and $100,000 for Illinois.

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, and by consent, the message of the president received to-day, in relation to the seizure of slaves by the authorities of Bermuda, was, with the documents, ordered to be printed.

After a few remarks on Mr. Ewing's amendment by Messrs. Bayard and Preston, on motion of Mr. Hendricks, the senate adjourned.

February 15. Petitions praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, were presented by Mr. Swift of Vermont; Mr. Morris, of Ohio, and Mr. Tomlinson of Connecticut, which on motion of Mr. Grundy were laid on the table.

Mr. Preston reported a bill additional to the act regulating the pay of officers of the army, which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Rives reported a substitute for the bill referred to the committee on naval affairs, regulating the pay of the marine corps—which was read.

Mr. Kent reported a bill to extend the time for completing the Washington city canal, and for other purposes—read and referred.

Mr. King, of Georgia, introduced a bill to compensate commodore James Barron for the use of his invention for ventilating ships—read and referred.

The following bills were read a third time and passed.

The bill supplementary to the "act to amend the judiciary system of the United States."

The bill in addition to the "act to promote the progress of science and the useful arts."

"The bill to establish a foundry and armory in the west and south west, and depots for arms in those states in which they are now wanting."

The bill to amend the act of 1790, for the punishment of crimes against the United States, was then taken up,

Mr. Prentiss opposed it on account of the severity of its principles: he thought it of too sanguinary a character, so much behind the spirit of the age, that he felt constrained to resist it, and record his name against it in every stage of its progress. The bill not only inflicts the punishment of death upon any person who shall maliciously burn, or procure, command, counsel, or advise any one to burn, any public building, but it contains no limitation upon the prosecution of the offence; so that a person may be arraigned and tried at any distance of time, however remote, when he may be wholly unable, by lapse of time, to avail himself of the testimony necessary for his defence. It was to be further observed that the bill was not confined to the burning of the public offices, containing the public records, but extended to the burning of any public building, such as an engine house, a wood house, or even a watch house.

The punishment, under the existing laws, was confinement to hard labor, and but one instance of the commission of the offence had occurred in half a century. We were now about to change the law, and substitute the punishment of death for confinement at hard labor; and we were doing this at a time when England and many other governments in Europe were engaged in reforming and ameliorating their criminal code. The bill put the offence on the same grade with murder and treason, the highest crimes known to the law.

The object of punishment was the prevention of crime; and all experience showed that the certainty of punishment was much more effectual than the severity of punishment in the prevention of crime. The burning of a public building was undoubtedly a very high offence, but it was well known that the difficulty of conviction was always increased in proportion as the punishment was aggravated. If there was absolute certainty in human testimony, the objection to the bill might not be so strong; but the reverse was true, for the history of criminal trials showed that many innocent persons had been convicted and executed. Mr. P. was opposed to the bill on the great principles of justice and humanity; he was opposed to it as destroying all just distinctions between crimes, as inflicting a punishment vastly disproportionate to the offence, and altogether inconsistent with the general spirit of our criminal code; and he felt compelled to ask for the yeas and nays.

The bill was then passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Clay, Clayton, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing, of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Page, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Davis, Ewing, of Illinois, Hendricks, Kent, McKean, Moore, Niles, Parker, Prentiss, Rives, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Walker, Wall, Webster—17.

The bill respecting the discriminating duties on Dutch and Belgian vessels was then considered, and after a short debate, passed.

The senate then proceeded to the further consideration of the bill to continue the Cumberland road, in the states of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois.

On motion of Mr. Clay, the appropriations were so amended as to allow Ohio $190,000, in addition to the unexpended balance; Indiana $100,000; and Illinois $100,000; making an aggregate of $390,000, besides unexpended balances.

The remaining amendments, made as in committee of the whole, were severally considered, and, after a renewal of the former discussions, were adopted in senate.

On motion of Mr. Clay, the bill was further amended by adding a proviso to the end of the first section, requiring that the construction of the road should be let out, in suitable sections, after due notice, to the lowest bidders.

Mr. Walker moved to amend the third section of the bill by inserting a disclaimer of the faith of government being pledged by this bill to do any thing further in the construction or repair of the Cumberland road.

After debate, the amendment was lost by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Calhoun, Hubbard, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Lyon, Moore, Norvell, Page, Parker, Preston, Rives, Strange, Walker, Wall, White—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Illinois, Ewing, of Ohio, Fulton, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Linn, Morris, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wright—23.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by yeas and nays, on the call of Mr. Norvell, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Illinois, Ewing, of Ohio, Fulton, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tip-ton, Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clayton, Hubbard, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Lyon, Moore, Norvell, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Strange, Walker, Wall, White—18.

On motion of Mr. Crittenden, the senate proceeded to consider the bill to make compensation to the Kentucky and Tennessee volunteers, who were discharged without being called into service.

Mr. Benton moved to amend the bill by allowing the above volunteers one month's pay.

Mr. White moved to amend this amendment by striking out one month, and inserting three months.

After debate, by Messrs. Preston, Crittenden, Grundy, White and Wright, Mr. White's amendment was tried and lost.

The amendment of Mr. Benton, allowing one month's pay, was then carried without a division.

On motions of Messrs. Moore and Walker, the names of Alabama and Mississippi were annexed to those of Kentucky and Tennessee in the bill.

Mr. Crittenden moved further to amend the bill by confining the compensation to those volunteers whose services were accepted. Carried: yeas 18, noes 10.

The bill, with the amendments, was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of the executrix of Richard W. Meade being under consideration, on motion of Mr. Clay, the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, Feb. 9. The case of privilege (Mr. Adams and the petition from slaves) having been disposed of, for the particulars of which, see page 385, a motion was made by Mr. Lane that the house do adjourn; which was decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 84.

A motion was made by Mr. McCarty that the vote of the house of yesterday be reconsidered, referring to the committee on public lands the letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting the papers called for by the house on the 30th of January, in relation to transactions at the land office at Fort Wayne, in the state of Indiana.

Mr. Wise, from the committee appointed on the 17th of January last, on so much of the message of the president of the U. States as relates to the "condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint from any quarter at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation," be referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said departments, or their bureaus or offices, or any of their officers or agents, of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured and impaired the public service and interest; and that said committee, in its inquiries, may refer to such periods of time as to them may seem expedient and proper, made a report in pursuance of the following proceeding of the select committee, which he handed in at the clerk's table:

"Reuben M. Whitney, who has been summoned as a witness before this committee, having, by letter, informed this committee of his peremptory refusal to attend, it becomes the duty of the committee to make the house acquainted with the fact; therefore, Resolved, That the chairman be directed to report the letter of Reuben M. Whitney to the house, that such order may be taken as the dignity and character of the house may require."

And then the house adjourned.

Friday, Feb. 10. The unfinished business was the report made last evening, from Mr. Wise, chairman of the select committee appointed to inquire into the administration of the executive departments, stating that Reuben M. Whitney had refused to appear before the said committee.

Mr. Wise asked that the communication of R. M. Whitney be now read, that the house might see what was its character, and take such steps as, in its judgment, might be necessary to defend its own dignity.

The letter and memorial having been read,

The speaker said it was proper he should state that, on Monday last, after the meeting of the house, a memorial of a similar character was laid on his table. It was not in order on that day for him to present it, nor had it been in order since. Mr. Lincoln inquired whether the memorial laid on the speaker's table was the same as that referred to in Mr. Whitney's letter to the committee.

The speaker said he had glanced his eye cursorily over it, and he was not prepared to say whether it was precisely the same, but, from its tenor, it appeared to be so. Mr. Lincoln said that, if it should be the pleasure of the house that the memorial should be now presented, he would give way. Mr. Williams, of N. Carolina, objected to the presentation of the memorial at this time, on the ground that it had reference to a collateral matter not now before the house. Some desultory conversation ensued, and the memorial finally was not presented. Mr. Lincoln then stated that, in the few remarks which he had to submit, he should make no reference to any proceedings which might have occurred in reference to the same individual before another select committee of this house.

He would offer the following series of resolutions for the consideration of the house:

Resolved, That Reuben M. Whitney, in refusing to appear as a witness before a select committee of this house, acting by the authority of the house, under a resolution of the 17th January last, after being duly summoned thereto, has been guilty of a contempt of the committee and of the house.

Resolved, That the letter addressed by the said Reuben M. Whitney to the committee, and by the committee referred to the notice of this house, declaring his determination peremptorily to decline to appear before any committee constituted in such manner and of such persons as the pleasure and judgment of the house shall designate, until the house, as a condition precedent, shall have redressed his supposed wrongs, both in the manner and style of communication, is contumacious, arrogant and offensive; alike disrespectful to the house, and utterly subversive of its rightful authority.

Resolved, That the speaker of the house issue his warrant, directing the sergeant-at-arms to take into custody the person of the said Reuben M. Whitney, that he may be brought to the bar of the house, to answer for the contempt aforesaid.

Mr. Lincoln said he had offered these resolutions on his own responsibility. Although the resolution which was appended to the report of the committee had been adopted unanimously, with the exception of the chairman, (Mr. Wise), who, from motives of delicacy, had not voted upon it, yet they had not thought it proper for them to indicate any course of action for the house to pursue. But, as the report itself presupposed the necessity of some action, he had thought right, as an individual member of the committee and of the house, to prepare these resolutions.

It was his intention to allude to Mr. Whitney only as a contumacious witness. In relation to other charges which had been brought against Mr. W. elsewhere, whether he was corrupt or whether he was oppressed, he (Mr. L.) had not a word to say. It seemed to him that, in the present stage of the business, the house had nothing to do with the memorial, at least until it was properly before the house.

The only question now was, whether he had been guilty of contempt in refusing to appear before the committee, and the question towards Mr. W. was precisely the same as it would be towards any other individual. The first inquiry which presented itself was, had the committee the authority to issue this summons? Mr. L. proceeded to argue that the power of the committee, as the representative of the house, under the resolution which authorized the said committee to call for persons and papers, was undeniable; that Mr. Whitney had been guilty of a legal, technical, constructive contempt, for which he was responsible; and that if he was not made responsible, it would be useless to attempt to investigate any subject by the intervention of witnesses.

Mr. Briggs suggested to the gentleman from Mass. (Mr. Lincoln), that the two first resolutions would belong more properly to a later stage of the business; and referred to the cases of Anderson and Houston, on the journal, when the proceeding simply was to call the individuals to the bar of the house, to give them an opportunity to be heard on the question of contempt.

Mr. Lincoln said he did not offer these resolutions without due reflection. The gentleman would find that there was a reason given in the resolutions for bringing the individual to the bar of the house. This was only a different mode of effecting the same object; more formal, more full, and as Mr. L. believed, more satisfactory. The two first resolutions were mere introductions to the third.

Mr. Briggs said the house was called on by these resolutions to say that this individual had been guilty of a contempt. That was a question in which the individual was deeply interested, and in which he ought to answer. The proper course would be to bring him here, and not to pronounce on his innocence or guilt, before he had had an opportunity of being heard.

Mr. Lincoln could not understand what justification there could be for bringing Mr. Whitney to the bar, unless some offence had been stated. He instanced the case of Mr. Adams, under consideration during the present week, where the offence was distinctly alleged. The two first resolutions assumed the fact of the offence as the basis of the third; but it did not follow that the individual must be condemned. The house must allege some cause as the foundation for its intervention.

Mr. Briggs alluded to the case of Anderson, where the letter in which the offence was alleged, and which was its evidence, had been made the basis of a resolution directing the speaker to issue his warrant for the arrest of the party. In the present case the authority on which the resolution directing the speaker to issue his warrant would be founded, was the report of the select committee setting forth the fact of the refusal of Mr. Whitney to attend. The next step was to bring him to the bar of the house, and not to pronounce a verdict against him, as the first resolution did, before he had been heard. The same course had been pursued in the case of Houston. The letter of the individual who stated himself to have been knocked down on the avenue, was made the basis for the issue of the speaker's warrant to bring the offending party to the bar.

He would therefore move to amend, by striking out the two first resolutions; and to amend the third resolution by striking out the words "said" and "aforesaid" and inserting before the word "contempt" the words "an alleged."

After a few remarks from Messrs. Lincoln, Parks and Mercer, Mr. Briggs modified his motion to amend as follows:

Whereas, a committee of this house have reported that Reuben M. Whitney, of the city of Washington, has peremptorily refused to appear before the said committee to give evidence in obedience to a summons issued by said committee: Therefore resolved, &c. [being the same as the third resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Lincoln.]

Strike out the two first resolutions, and insert the following preamble, &c. Mr. Gholson called for the reading of the report of the committee; which was read. Mr. D. J. Pearce contended that the house, in determining on this attachment, must enter into an explanation of the causes of the refusal; whether those causes were true or false; and whether, if true, they were sufficient to justify his refusal. Something, he thought, was necessary to be shown beyond the naked fact of refusal. Mr. Hardin contended that, inasmuch as the refusal of Mr. Whitney to attend before the committee had been unconditional and absolute, the house ought to direct the speaker to issue his warrant that the individual might be brought to the bar, and give his reasons here why he did not testify.

Mr. Lane suggested that the resolution should be so modified "as to give the sense of the house that Mr. Whitney ought to appear before the committee;" and if such should be declared to be the sense of the house, Mr. L. undertook to say that Mr. Whitney would appear and answer questions as he ought to answer them.

Mr. Parks moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "alleged contempt," and inserting "to answer for his conduct in so refusing to appear before the said committee."

Mr. Lincoln here modified his amendment to read as follows:

Resolved, That whereas the select committee of this house, acting by the authority of the house under a resolution of the 17th of January last, has reported that R. M. Whitney peremptorily refused to give evidence in obedience to a summons duly issued by said committee, and has addressed to the committee the letter reported by said committee to the house. Therefore,

Resolved, That the speaker of this house issue his warrant, directed to the sergeant-at-arms to take into custody the body of Reuben M. Whitney, that he may be brought to the bar of the house to answer for an alleged contempt of this house.

The subject was further debated by Messrs. Parks, Wise, D. J. Pearce, Robertson, Mercer, Lincoln and A. Mann.

Mr. Boon moved the previous question; but there was no second.

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. Parks; which amendment was rejected.

And the question recurring on the adoption of the modified resolution.

Mr. Thomson, of Ohio, moved to strike out all that portion of the resolution which directs "the speaker of the house to issue his warrant directing the sergeant-at-arms to take into custody the person of Reuben M. Whitney, that he may be brought to the bar of the house," and to insert "summons directly the sergeant-at-arms to summon the said Reuben M. Whitney to appear before this house, to answer," &c.; which amendment was rejected.

The debate was continued by Messrs. Graves, Lincoln, Chambers, of Penn. and Claiborne, of Mississippi.

Mr. Claiborne moved to amend the resolution, by adding at the end thereof "and that he be allowed counsel on that occasion, should he desire it."

Mr. Lincoln accepted this modification.

Mr. Boon said he did not rise to debate this question. The end of the session was fast approaching, and there was a mass of important business requiring the action of the house. What if this resolution were adopted, and a warrant should be issued to bring Mr. Whitney to answer at the bar of the house for his refusal? The house could not deny him the right to be heard either by himself or his counsel; a protracted discussion would grow out of it, and it would end like a similar farce on the arrest of general Houston had ended. He (Mr. B.) was one of the immortal friendly twenty who voted against that arrest; and the house went on with its proceeding until it became alarmed at finding they had no power of punishment. He (general Houston) was turned loose, just as surely as Reuben M. Whitney would be, if brought up. He (Mr. B.) knew nothing of Mr. Whitney, but he must confess that, if Mr. W. had defended himself as he (Mr. B.) would have done, he (Mr. B.) would have entertained more favorable opinions towards him. If, however, that individual's character were what it had been stated to be on this floor, he (Mr. B.) did not know what his testimony was worth any where, nor why it should be taken at all.

Mr. Thomson, of Ohio, called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution; which were ordered.

The house was further addressed by Messrs. Thomson, of Ohio, Garland, of Louisiana, Gholson, Hardin, Wise, Peyton, Ashley, Jenifer, McKeon, and Glascock.

Mr. Glascock moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting:

Resolved, That R. M. Whitney be required to show cause, on to-morrow morning, why an attachment should not issue against him for an alleged contempt in refusing to appear, under a legal summons, before the committee of investigation constituted by this house; and that a copy of this resolution be served on the said R. M. Whitney by the sergeant-at-arms.

The debate was continued by Mr. Calhoun, of Kentucky.

And the question being taken, the amendment of Mr. Glascock was rejected. Mr. Jarvis offered the following amendment:

Strike out all after "Resolved" and insert:

That the select committee appointed on the 3d of January to inquire whether any person had been employed by the deposit banks as their agent to transact their business with the treasury department, be instructed to report to this house the circumstances which occurred in the committee room on the 25th day of January last during the examination of Reuben M. Whitney.

After some remarks from Mr. Bell, urging the necessity of asserting the authority of the house on this occasion, the question on the amendment of Mr. Jarvis was taken, and the same was rejected.

Mr. Patton moved to lay the whole subject on the table. On that motion Mr. Lincoln called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered. On the name of Mr. Adams being called, Mr. A. rose and asked to be excused from voting, for reasons which he sent in writing to the chair, and which he requested might be entered on the journal. The speaker said this could only be done by the unanimous consent of the house. The reading of the resolutions having been called for—Mr. Mercer, said he could, under no circumstances, assent to the proposition of Mr. A. The speaker said the application could not then be entertained at this time. Mr. Adams submitted that, under the rules of the house, a member asking to be excused was entitled to give his reasons in writing. The chair said that, by a decision of the last session of congress, an application to be excused from voting could not be entertained pending the call of the yeas and nays, but must be made afterwards; an appeal had been taken, and the house had affirmed the decision of the chair.

And the question on the motion to lay the whole subject on the table was taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 88, nays 97. So the subject was not laid on the table.

Mr. Graham offered the following amendment:

Strike out all after "Resolved" and insert—

That the speaker of this house forthwith issue his official summons to the sergeant-at-arms, commanding him to summon R. M. Whitney to appear in this hall on to-morrow morning, at 11 o'clock, to show cause why an attachment should not issue against him for a contempt of the authority of the house, in refusing to attend the select committee appointed by this house on the 17th day of January, according to a summons duly served on him. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. Adams then asked to be excused from voting, for the following reasons, which were sent in writing to the chair.

Mr. Adams requested to be excused from voting upon this and every other question of privilege affecting Reuben M. Whitney—the personal relations between him and that individual having long been such as to make it the duty of Mr. Adams to decline acting as his judge upon any question affecting his personal rights.

Mr. Adams asked that this statement might be entered on the journal; to which the speaker replied that it would, as a matter of course, be entered on the journal.

And the question was then taken on the adoption of the modified resolution of Mr. Lincoln, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 85.

So the preamble and resolution were adopted.

Mr. Lane moved to reconsider the vote by which the first of the two resolutions in the case of Mr. Adams had been rejected on yesterday.

Mr. Boon moved to postpone the further consideration of the motion until to-morrow; which motion prevailed—ayes 91, noes not counted.

And, on motion of Mr. Rencher, the house adjourned.

Saturday, Feb. 11. On motion of Mr. Mercer, so much of the journal was stricken out as contained the reasons assigned by Mr. Adams yesterday for asking to be excused from voting on any resolution involving the personal rights of Mr. Reuben M. Whitney, and which reasons had been entered on the journal.

Mr. Thomas, from the joint committee appointed to wait on MARTIN VAN BUREN, of New York, and inform him that he has been duly elected president of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th of March, 1837, reported: That the committee, in conformity with the directions of the house, had, on yesterday, waited on the president elect, and informed him that the votes for president of the United States had been counted by the two houses of congress in the manner prescribed by the constitution; that he had received a majority of all the votes given, and was duly elected president of the United States for four years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1837.

Mr. VAN BUREN expressed, in reply, his grateful sense of the distinguished honor which his fellow citizens had conferred upon him, and requested us to assure our respective houses that they might rely on his unceasing efforts to execute the responsible trust about to devolve upon him, in a manner the most conducive to the public interest.

On motion of Mr. T. the report was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Taylor, of New York, asked the unanimous consent of the house to offer, at this time, the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas, the vote of this house, taken the 9th day of February, 1837, on the following resolution: "Resolved, That any member who shall hereafter present any petition from the slaves of this union, ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of the house, the rights of the southern states, and unfriendly to the union," may be construed into an expression of opinion upon the abstract question of the right of slaves to petition congress: therefore,

Resolved, That slaves do not possess the right of petition secured to the citizens of the United States by the constitution.

Mr. Ingersoll said that if the resolution was entertained, he proposed to offer the following amendment; and he asked that it might be read for the information of the house. In its practical effect, the resolution was the same as that of the gentleman from New York (Mr. Taylor). The resolution is as follows:

The hon. John Q. Adams having inquired of the speaker whether it would be in order for him to present a petition purporting to be from certain slaves, and the speaker having appealed to the house for instructions,

Resolved, That the house cannot receive the said petition without disregarding its own dignity, the rights of a large class of citizens of the south and west, and the constitution of the United States.

Mr. Taylor said he could not accept the amendment as a modification of his own resolution. Objections having been made to the reception of the resolution at this time—Mr. Cambreleng moved a suspension of the rule. Mr. A. Mann called for the yeas and nays on the motion. Mr. Chambers, of Kentucky, raised the point of order whether, since this resolution had direct reference to the resolution in relation to which a motion to reconsider was pending, the motion of the gentleman from New York could be entertained at this time.

The speaker said it would be competent for the house to suspend the rule.

Mr. Lewis hoped that the question on the reconsideration of that resolution would be brought immediately before the house.

And thereupon, Mr. Taylor moved to suspend the rule [which suspension would postpone the privileged question in the case of Mr. Whitney] to take up the motion submitted on yesterday by Mr. Lane, to reconsider the vote by which the following resolution had been rejected:

1. Resolved, That any member who shall hereafter present any petition from the slaves of this union ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of the house, the rights of the southern states, and unfriendly to the union.

Mr. Lane asked the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend; which were ordered.

After some remarks from Messrs. Ashley, Underwood and Mercer,

Mr. Gideon Lee said that, as it was his opinion that every member perfectly understood the simple question immediately before the house, and as he believed that this discussion could not enlighten a single mind; and as, if more discussion were necessary, it might follow on the propositions which had yet to follow, he begged leave respectfully to move the previous question; in which demand he hoped the house would sustain him.

Mr. Adams said he was desirous to present a few thoughts to the house, and he hoped the call for the previous question would not be pressed. The motion for reconsideration did not, it was true, extend to that resolution, which had been most ingeniously prepared for the purpose of—

The speaker said that the gentleman from Massachusetts could not proceed unless the demand for the previous question should be withdrawn.

Mr. G. Lee said he had made the motion under a conscientious sense of duty, and he must insist upon it.

And the house seconded the demand for the previous question—ayes 108, noes not counted.

So there was a second.

And the house determined that the main question should be now taken.

And the main question, "will the house reconsider the vote by which the resolution was rejected?" was then taken and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, C. Allan, Anthony Ash, Barton, Bean, Bell, Black, Bockee, Boon, Boul-din, Bovee, Boyd, Burns, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, John Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, John F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Cramer, Crane, Crary, Cushman, Dawson, Deberry, Droubleday, Dromgoole, Efner, Fairfield, Farlin, Forester, Fowler, French, Fry, Galbraith, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gholson, Gillett, Glascock, Graham, Grantland, Graves, Griffin, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hamer, Harlan, Samuel S. Harrison, Albert G. Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Howell, Hubley, Hunt, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingham, Jarvis, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Henry Johnson, John W. Jones, Kennon, Kilgore, Klengensmith, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Lawler, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Thomas Lee, Luke Lea, Lewis, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Lyon, Abijah Mann, Martin, William Mason, Moses Mason, Sampson Mason, Maury, McComas, McKay, McKeon, McKim, McLene, Mercer, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Parks, Patterson, Patton, Franklin Pierce, D. J. Pearce, James A. Pearce, Pearson, Pettigrew, Peyton, Phelps, Pinckney, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Richardson, Robertson, Rogers, Schenck, Seymour, Wm. B. Shepard, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Shinn, Spangler, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Taliaferro, Taylor, John Thomson, Waddy Thompson, Toucey, Turritt, Underwood, Vanderpool, Wagoner, Ward, Webster, Weeks, White, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Wise, Yell—159.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Bailey, Beaumont, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, George Chambers, Clark, Cushing, Darlington, Denny, Evans, Everett, Granger, Grennell, Hiland Hall, Hard, Harper, Hazeltine, Henderson, Hoar, Ingersoll, Wm. Jackson, James, Lawrence, Lay, Lincoln, Love, Job Mann, McCarty, McKennan, Milligan, Parker, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Russell, Slade, Sloane, Vinton, Elisha Whittlesey, Young—45.

So the house determined that the vote should be reconsidered.

Mr. Taylor then moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting:

"That slaves do not possess the right of petition secured to the people of the United States by the constitution."

After some remarks from Mr. Pickens,

Mr. Ingersoll moved to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "that," and inserting:

The hon. John Quincy Adams having inquired of the speaker whether it would be in order for him to present a petition purporting to be from slaves; and the speaker having appealed to the house for instructions,

Resolved, That this house cannot receive the said petition without disregarding its own dignity, the rights of a large class of citizens of the south and west, and the constitution of the United States.

Mr. Ingersoll warmly advocated his amendment which was opposed with a view of insuring tranquillity and peace. Mr. Vanderpoel hoped his colleague (Mr. Taylor) would accept the modification and addressed the house at some length in favor of it. Mr. Johnson of Lou. proposed the following amendment to the resolution; add to the end the words "and endangering the union."

The amendment not being in order at this time, (an amendment to an amendment being pending), Mr. J. asked Mr. Ingersoll to accept this modification, but he declined doing so.

Mr. Ingersoll modified his resolution as follows: "An inquiry having been made by an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts whether a paper which he held in his hand, purporting to be a petition from certain slaves, and declaring themselves to be slaves, came within the order of the house of the 18th January, and the said paper not having been received by the speaker, he stated that, in a case so extraordinary and novel he would take the advice and counsel of the house."

The subject was debated by Messrs. Patton, Sutherland, Bynum, Bouldin, and W. Thompson.

[Mr. Howard here gave notice (being entitled so to do, the question to which the notice referred being one of privilege), that he should move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Lincoln), directing Mr. R. M. Whitney to be brought to the bar of the house, had been adopted.]

The subject under discussion was further debated by Messrs. Lane, Wise, Harrison, Underwood, and Craig; and after some remarks from Mr. Anthony, appealing to the house to meet the question without further discussion, Mr. Taylor indicated his acceptance of Mr. Ingersoll's, modified resolution as a modification of his own.

Mr. Adams then moved to amend the resolution, first by inserting after the words "order of the 18th of January," the words "which order is in the following words."

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, propositions or papers, relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery, or the abolition of slavery, shall, without being either printed or referred, be laid upon the table, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon."

Mr. A. said, probably the gentleman from Pennsylvania would accept of this as a modification.—Mr. Ingersoll said he certainly could not do so; and, if the gentlemen wished, he would assign his reasons. Mr. Adams said he should be perfectly willing to hear the gentleman's reasons hereafter, but he could not now yield the floor. Mr. A. then stated his second amendment, which was to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert "that the said paper, as stated by the member from Massachusetts, is not within the said order of the house." Mr. A. then addressed the house at great length, in relation to the causes, progress and effects of the discussion of the past week.

Mr. Taylor modified his resolution by adding Resolved, That slaves do not possess the right of petition secured to the citizens of the United States by the constitution."

After some further remarks from Messrs. Granger, Alford, Taliaferro, Adams, and W. Thompson. Mr. W. Thompson accepted the whole modified resolution as a substitute for his original proposition.

Mr. C. Johnson demanded the previous question. And there was a second.

And the house determined that the main question should be now taken.

Mr. Vanderpoel called for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered. A division of the question was then called for; which was ordered. And the question was then taken on the first branch of the main question, which is in the following words:

"An inquiry having been made by an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts whether a paper which he held in his hand, purporting to be a petition from certain slaves, and declaring themselves to be slaves, came within the order of the house of the 18th of January, and the said paper not having been received by the speaker, he stated that, in a case, so extraordinary and novel, he would take the advice and counsel of the house."

Resolved, That this house cannot receive said petition without disregarding its own dignity, the rights of a large class of citizens of the south and west, and the constitution of the United States.

And the question was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Chilton Allan, Anthony, Ash, Ashley, Bean, Bell, Black, Bockee, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Bunch, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carter, Casey, John Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, N. H. Claiborne, John F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Cramer, Crary, Cushman, Dawson, Deberry, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Elmore, Fairfield, Farlin, Fowler, French, Fry, Galbraith, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gholson, Gillet, Glascock, Graham, Grantland, Graves, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hamer, Hannegan, Hardin, Harlan, Harper, Albert G. Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Howell, Hubley, Hunt, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingersoll, Ingham, Jarvis, Jenifer, Jos. Johnson, Richard M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, Henry Johnson, John W. Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Wise, Yell, Young—160.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Beaumont, Bond, Borden, William B. Calhoun, Carr, George Chambers, Childs, Clark, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Denny, Evans, Samuel S. Harrison, Hazeltine, Henderson, Herod, William Jackson, James, Lincoln, Love, McKennan, Morris, Parker, D. J. Pearce, Phillips, Potts, Russell, Slade, Sloane, Spangler, Sprague, Elisha Whittlesey—35.

So the first resolution was adopted.

And the question was then taken on the second branch of the main question, which is in the following words:

Resolved, That slaves do not possess the right of petition secured to the citizens of the United States by the constitution.

Mr. Haley moved to lay the whole subject on the table; which motion was rejected.

And the question on the second branch of the main question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, C. Allan, Ash, Ashley, Bean, Bell, Black, Bockee, Bond, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Bunch, Burns, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, J. Thompson, Turrill, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Ward, Webster, Weeks, White, Elisha Whittlesey, T. T. Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Yell, Young—162.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Beaumont, Borden, Darlington, Denny, Haley, Hazeltine, Ingersoll, William Jackson, James, Love, Parker, Phillips, Potts, Russell, Slade, Slone—18.

Henry A. Wise, excused.

So the resolution was adopted.

The speaker announced that the warrant issued for the arrest of R. M. Whitney had been served, and that that individual was now in the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, waiting the further pleasure of the house.

Mr. Howard, withdrew his motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution directing R. M. Whitney to be brought to the bar of the house had been adopted.

Mr. Calhoun, of Kentucky, offered the following resolution; which was agreed to.

Resolved, That Reuben M. Whitney, now in the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, be brought to the bar of this house to answer for an alleged contempt of the house, in peremptorily refusing to appear, and give evidence as a witness on a summons duly issued by a select committee, acting by the authority of this house under a resolution of the 17th of January last, and in the matter of a letter, expressing said refusal, addressed by the said Reuben M. Whitney to the committee, and by the committee referred to the house; and that he be forthwith furnished with a copy of the report of said committee, and of the letter aforesaid.

On motion of Mr. Hannegan, the house adjourned.

Monday, Feb. 13. The speaker announced that Reuben M. Whitney, now in custody for an alleged contempt of the authority of the house, was without the bar waiting the further pleasure of the house.

The chair also stated that the accused had been furnished with copies of the papers referred to in the resolution adopted on Saturday last.

Mr. Patton moved that the sergeant-at-arms be directed to bring the prisoner to the bar of the house: which motion prevailed.

The accused having been placed at the bar, the speaker addressed him as follows:

"Reuben M. Whitney: You have been brought before the house by its order to answer the charge of an alleged contempt of this house, in having peremptorily refused to give evidence in obedience to a summons duly issued by a committee of this house, which committee had, by an order of the house, power to send for persons and papers.

"Before you are called upon to answer in any manner to the subject matter of this charge, it is my duty as the presiding officer of this house to inform you that, by an order of the house, you will be allowed counsel, should you desire it. If you have any request to make in relation to this subject, your request will now be received and considered by the house. If, however, you are now ready to proceed, in the investigation of the charge, you will state it, and the house will take order accordingly."

To which the accused replied, that he held in his hand a paper in relation to the charge; which he respectfully requested might be received and read.

The following paper was then read:

The undersigned answers that his refusal to attend the committee upon the summons of its chairman, was not intended or believed by him to be disrespectful to the honorable the house of representatives, nor does he now believe that he thereby committed a contempt of the house.

His reasons for refusing to attend the committee are truly stated in his letter to that committee.

He did not consider himself bound to obey a summons issued by the chairman of the committee.

He had attended in obedience to such a summons before another committee, voluntarily, and without objections to the validity of the process; and would have attended in the same way before the present committee, but for the belief that he might thereby be exposed to insult and violence.

He denies, therefore, that he has committed a contempt of the house, because,

1st. The process upon him was illegal, and he was not bound to obey it. And secondly,

Because he could not attend without exposing himself thereby to outrage and violence.

If the house shall decide in favor of the authority of the process, and that the respondent is bound to obey it, then he respectfully asks in such case, that, in consideration of the peculiar circumstances in which he is placed, as known to the house, the committee may be instructed to receive his testimony upon interrogatories to be answered on oath before a magistrate, as has been done in other instances in relation to other witnesses. Or that the committee be instructed to prohibit the use or introduction of secret and deadly weapons in the committee room during the examination of the witnesses.

And in case he shall think it necessary, he prays to be heard by counsel, and to be allowed to offer testimony on the matters herein submitted.

Mr. Gholson offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That Reuben M. Whitney be now permitted to examine witnesses before this house in relation to his alleged contempt.

Mr. Haynes said he understood that the prisoner denied the power of the house; and that it seemed proper to dispose of this preliminary question first.

Mr. Patton said the proper course would be for the accused to withdraw whilst the house deliberated as to the course it would pursue. He merely made the suggestion. He did not make the motion, because he did not wish to place himself in the position of having any thing to do with this trial.

Mr. Bouldin said he wished only to make one suggestion. One proposition of the gentleman brought before the house was, that he was willing to go before the committee, if that committee would go into the committee room unarmed. He (Mr. B.) was sure the committee did not wish to go into the room armed. He wished to suggest to the committee and to the house that this would avoid all other trouble about the matter.

Mr. Lincoln said the committee towards which this contempt had been committed had satisfied themselves with reporting the fact of the contempt to the house, but that it was manifest that the report looked to some action on the part of the house; and that, if it did not—if witnesses could refuse to answer questions, and that refusal was passed over in silence, committees could no longer proceed in the discharge of the duties imposed on them. For the purpose of indicating the course which he thought the house should pursue, he would offer the following as an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi:

Strike out all after the word "Resolved" and insert,

"That a committee of privileges, consisting of — members, be appointed, and instructed to report a mode of proceeding in the case of R. M. Whitney, who is now in custody by virtue of an order of this house; and that said committee have leave to execute the duty assigned to them immediately."

Mr. Mercer hoped the house would adhere to what had been the invariable course in these cases, and that the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts would not prevail.

Mr. Patton again suggested that the accused should retire.

And, such being the sense of the house, the speaker directed the sergeant-at-arms to conduct Reuben M. Whitney from the bar of the house.

After some remarks by Messrs. McKay, Bouldin, Hoar, Huntsman, Cambreleng, A. Mann, Vanderpoel, Lane, Calhoun, of Kentucky, Gholson, Hardin, Lincoln and Bell,

Mr. A. Mann moved to amend the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia by adding to the end thereof the following:

"And that a committee of five be appointed by the speaker to examine such witnesses on the part of the house."

Mr. Gholson accepted the modification.

Mr. Ash asked for the yeas and nays on Mr. Lincoln's amendment; which were refused.

And the question on the amendment of Mr. L. was then taken, and decided in the negative.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question recurring on the modified resolution of Mr. Gholson,

Mr. Boon moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting—

"That Reuben M. Whitney, now at the bar of the house, be forthwith discharged from the custody of the sergeant-at-arms."

After some remarks from Messrs. Boon and Anthony,

Mr. Chapin moved to amend the modified resolution of Mr. Gholson, by adding to the end thereof the following:

"That the questions put shall be reduced to writing before proposed to the witness, and that the answers be also reduced to writing. Every question put by any other member of the committee shall be reduced to writing by such member, and be propounded to the witness by the speaker, if not objected to; but if any question shall be objected to, or any testimony offered shall be objected to, by any member, the member so objecting, and the accused or his counsel, shall be withdrawn, after which the question shall be decided without further debate. If parol evidence is offered, the witnesses shall be sworn by the speaker, and be examined at the bar, unless they are members of the house, in which case they may be examined in their places."

Mr. Gholson accepted the modification.

Mr. Parks said he was one of those who had opposed the resolution directing this individual to be brought to the bar of the house; but, since he had been brought, he (Mr. P.) was of opinion that it was due to the individual, to the committee, to the house and to the nation, that the whole facts of the case should be ascertained, and laid before the nation.

For the purpose of coming as early as possible to the business of the house, he moved the previous question.

And the house decided the demand—ayes 97, noes not counted.

And the house determined that the main question should now be taken.

And the main question, being on the adoption of the modified resolution of Mr. Gholson, was taken, and decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution was adopted.

The accused having again been placed at the bar of the house,

The speaker announced that he had appointed the committee directed by the resolution, to consist of the following named gentlemen: Messrs. Gholson, of Mississippi; Lincoln, of Massachusetts; Thomas, of Maryland; Hardin, of Kentucky; and Owens, of Georgia.

The resolution, just adopted, having been read for the information of the accused,

The speaker inquired whether he was now ready to proceed with his case?

The accused said he was not ready; and he asked that time might be allowed him until Wednesday next for the purpose of preparation; and, also, that the individuals whose names appeared on a paper which he sent to the chair might be summoned to appear at that time.

And the house granted the request of the accused for time.

The individuals whose names appeared on the paper sent to the chair were, Mr. Martin, Mr. Fairfield, Mr. Gillett and Mr. Hamer, of the house of representatives; Mr. W. D. Lewis, of Philadelphia, now in the city of Washington; and Mr. J. T. Sullivan, of the city of Washington.

Mr. Calhoun, of Kentucky, suggested that, as the members of the house were regularly in attendance, their names should be struck out.

A division of the question was ordered; and the question having been taken, subpoenas were ordered to be issued to W. D. Lewis and J. T. Sullivan.

Mr. Underwood rose to protest against the whole proceeding in this case from beginning to end. His idea was, that the only proper course would be this: The prisoner had refused to appear before the committee. He ought to be required to state on oath, orally or in writing, why he had refused. After that had been done, the house could decide whether the reasons he assigned were sufficient or not. If the house should determine they were sufficient, they would discharge the accused; if not sufficient, the correct course would be to keep him in custody, and require him to attend before the committee until he answered, and when all the questions which might be put to him should have been answered, he should be discharged. This would despatch the matter directly, and the house might proceed to the consideration of the public business.

Mr. Harrison, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution in the case of Reuben M. Whitney had been adopted.

On that motion Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. Hopkins demanded the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

And the house seconded the call—ayes 89, noes not counted.

And the house determined that the main question should now be taken.

And the main question "Will the house reconsider the vote?" was taken, and decided in the negative—ayes 92, nays 95.

So the house would not reconsider the vote.

And the question was then taken on the motion that summonses be issued to the members of the house before named.

The motion prevailed—ayes 100, noes 32. So the summonses were directed to be issued.

The accused then asked to be furnished with a copy of the resolution which had been adopted; and it was so ordered.

The accused was then removed from the bar.

On motion of Mr. Mercer, the house suspended the rule, for the purpose of calling for petitions in the reverse order of territories and states;

When several petitions were accordingly presented. Amongst these were one by the speaker from Jacob Grear, stating that he had in his possession a fifty dollar note, money of the continental congress, which amount he prayed might be paid him in gold and silver, which was referred to the committee on revolutionary claims.

The speaker also presented the petition of Reuben M. Whitney, stating that he had been summoned before a committee of the house, complaining of certain proceedings, and asking the house to grant him redress, which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. Thompson said he had the honor to present the memorial of sundry citizens of the District of Columbia, praying the recognition of the independence of Texas. And he proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the memorial be referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and that it be made the special order of the day for Tuesday week.

Mr. T. said, if in order, he would submit a few remarks.

The speaker said the memorial, if it gave rise to debate, must lie over by the rule.

Mr. Howard moved the reference of the memorial to the committee on foreign affairs.

And the memorial was ordered to lie over.

Mr. Garland, of Virginia, presented a similar memorial from the citizens of the District; and moved its reference to the committee on foreign affairs.

Mr. D. H. Lewis wished to inquire from the chairman of the committee on foreign affairs, (Mr. Howard), whether that gentleman expected shortly to bring this subject before the house.

Mr. Howard, (under leave of the house), in reply, said he would remind the gentleman from Alabama, (Mr. Lewis), and the house, that about a month ago the committee on foreign affairs had instructed him, (Mr. H.) to report a resolution calling on the president of the United States for information on the condition of our relations with Mexico. The information then called for was considered by the committee to have an important bearing on the aspect of our affairs with Texas. It was their opinion that that information was material to the investigation of this subject, and they desired to have it in their possession before they made up their opinion as to the recognition of the independence of Texas.

When these documents came before the house, a motion was made that they be referred to the committee on foreign affairs; and an honorable member from Kentucky, (Mr. Boyd), at the same time, offered a resolution sending instructions to the committee to report a resolution acknowledging the independence of Texas. From that moment to the present, the committee had never had it in their power to enter upon the consideration of these documents, the matter being tied up by the pending motion of reference; and, as they could not get access to these papers, it remained for the house to dispose of them. After that the committee could take some steps.

Mr. Robertson asked consent to submit the following resolution in reference to this subject.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house all correspondence and communications, (if any), which have passed between the executive of the United States and general Santa Ana during his recent visit to Washington, or since his capture by the Texian army, not heretofore communicated, in what character, whether as the recognized representative of the Mexican government or otherwise; such correspondence or communications as have been carried on with him; also, whether either of the vessels equipped or destined for the exploring expedition for the Pacific ocean and South sea, or any other public vessel has been put in requisition for his conveyance to Mexico or elsewhere, and, if so, the reasons which, in the opinion of the president, rendered such requisition necessary or proper, with all orders relative thereto; also, all communications and correspondence, if any, between the executive of the United States and general Samuel Houston, or other persons claiming to exercise the powers of government in Texas, relating to the civil war now or recently prevailing therein, or relating to any proposed interference or negotiation on the part of the United States, on behalf of Texas.

Objections having been made,

Mr. Robertson moved to suspend the rule to enable him to offer the same, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, were, yeas 65, nays 87.

So the rule was not suspended.

Mr. Ingersoll presented a petition praying aid to the Colonization society, which, he moved be referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

Mr. Adams objected, and contended that the memorial should be laid on the table, under the order of the 18th January.

The speaker said the memorial would not come under the resolution. Similar memorials had been presented, which, in some instances, had been referred, and in others, had been laid on the table.—In the latter instance, the disposition was the effect of a motion made for such purpose.

Mr. Adams called for the reading of the memorial.

[And the memorial giving rise to debate, was then ordered to lie over.]

Mr. Beaumont, by consent, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of bringing in a bill defining the offence of a contempt of this house, and to provide for the punishment thereof.

After some remarks from Messrs. Beaumont and Adams,

Mr. Cambreleng moved the previous question, and the house seconded the call.

And the main question was ordered to be now taken.

And the main question being on the adoption of the resolution, was taken, and decided in the negative.

Mr. Cambreleng presented the memorial of various authors of Great Britain, praying congress to pass a copy-right law, which was referred to the committee on the judiciary.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the first comptroller of the treasury, transmitting a list of the balances standing on the books of the treasury against the receivers of public moneys.

A message was received from the president of the United States communicating a treaty made with the empire of Morocco.

Mr. Pinckney presented a resolution, which was referred to the committee on foreign affairs, calling upon the president to instruct the minister of the United States at Denmark to open a negotiation with that court for the purpose of obtaining indemnification for three prizes sent by John Paul Jones into the ports of that kingdom during the revolutionary war, and which were delivered up by the government thereof to Great Britain.

On motion of Mr. Denny, the committee of commerce was directed to inquire into the expediency of making appropriations for erecting a national hospital at Pittsburgh, Pa.

On motion of Mr. Leonard, the committee of commerce was directed to inquire into the expediency of making a survey of the valley of the Susquehanna river, from the northern termination of the North Branch canal, of Pennsylvania, to the southern termination of the Chenango canal, in the state of New York; and, also, from the northern termination of the first mentioned canal to the southern termination of the Chenango canal, in New York aforesaid.

On motion of Mr. Storer, inquiry was authorised as to the expediency of providing for the library of congress, a full length statue in marble of chief justice Marshall.

A vast number of petitions on the subject of the abolition of slavery was presented,—and

On motion of Mr. C. Johnson, the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Feb. 14. On motion of Mr. Jarvis, the committee on naval affairs, were discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Boston chamber of commerce, for vessels stationed on the Atlantic coast, and that the same be referred to the secretary of the navy.

Mr. Hard reported a bill to provide for the construction of the Niagara ship canal.

Mr. Cambreleng reported a bill making appropriations for the suppression of Indian hostilities for the year 1837.

Mr. Garland reported a bill supplementary to the acts entitled "an act for the reorganization of the department of Indian affairs," and "an act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontier," both approved June 30, 1834, and for other purposes.

Mr. McKim reported a bill for the relief of the president and directors of the Baltimore and Susquehanna rail road company, and against the petition of Richard Clay and James Lowell.

Mr. Connor reported a bill providing for additional clerks in the post office department and the auditor's office connected with it.

Mr. Ward reported a bill making appropriations for the public buildings, &c.

The speaker laid before the house a message from the president of the United States, transmitting a letter from the governor of New Hampshire, communicating several resolutions of the legislature of that state, and claiming the reimbursement of certain expenses incurred by that state in maintaining jurisdiction over that portion of its territory north of the 45th degree of north latitude, known by the name of Indian Stream.

Also, a message from the president of the United States, transmitting a copy of the instructions prepared, under his direction, by the war department, for the commissioners appointed in pursuance of the request contained in the resolution adopted by the house of representatives on the 1st of July last, to investigate the causes of the hostilities then existing with the Creek Indians.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house suspended the rule, and went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Patton in the chair), on certain appropriation bills.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the committee took up the bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1837, which had been returned from the senate with certain amendments.

The amendment providing for the payment of the Tennessee volunteers, called out under the requisition of gen. Gaines and gov. Cannon, excited some discussion, in which Messrs. Carter, E. Whitteley, Cambreleng, Underwood and Graves participated.

Mr. Graves moved to amend the amendment of the senate by adding thereto a section appropriating seventy-five thousand dollars for pay, equipment and clothing of the Kentucky volunteers called into service under the requisition of gen. Gaines; [embracing only such as after they were accepted equipped themselves at their own expense].

Various other amendments were moved by gentlemen from the several states whose militia have been called into service during the present Indian wars, to cover their respective claims, which amendments were ordered to be printed, and the bill laid aside.

The naval appropriation bill was then taken up.

The pending question was on the motion of Mr. Jarvis to amend the following paragraph.

"For pay of commissioned, warrant and petty officers, and of seamen, two million four hundred and thirty-four thousand eight hundred and eighty-six dollars, [and which item includes the appropriation for the exploring expedition], by reducing the amount to two million two hundred and eighty-four thousand dollars."

Mr. J. now moved to modify his pending motion for reduction, by reducing the original amount only $51,118, [this being the difference in the amount required for fitting out a frigate].

As a further modification of his amendment, Mr. J. moved to add the following proviso, to be inserted at the end of the 8th line:

"Provided that nothing in this or any other appropriation bill shall be considered as authorising or approving of any increase of the surveying or exploring expedition, authorised by the act of June, 1836."

After some remarks from Mr. Jarvis, to show that a frigate was not the proper class of vessel to be sent on this expedition, and in vindication of his course on this subject, Mr. D. J. Pearce said, as there was no quorum present, he would move the committee rise. Mr. P. withdrew the motion, and Mr. Cambreleng appealed to the committee not to waste further time in debating this subject, as there were only a few days remaining of the session. Mr. P. then renewed his motion. The committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. Vanderpoel moved that the house adjourn.

Mr. Cambreleng called for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. Mercer hoped the motion to adjourn would be so amended as to state the hour at which it was made. [It being then fifteen minutes before five o'clock].

Mr. Granger asked the gentleman from New York (Mr. Vanderpoel) to withdraw his motion to adjourn, to enable him (Mr. G.) to submit a motion to reconsider a vote taken on yesterday. Mr. V. declined to do so.

The yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn were then ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 33, nays 68—[no quorum voting].

So the majority of the members present refused to adjourn.

Mr. Granger then rose to submit his motion.

Mr. Cambreleng objected, on the ground that no quorum was present. He moved an adjournment.

The speaker decided that the motion of the gentleman from New York (Mr. Granger) could not be entertained in the absence of a quorum.

And, at ten minutes past five, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Feb. 15. By general consent, Mr. Howard submitted a motion that the honorable Mr. Jackson, a representative from Georgia, and a member of the committee on foreign affairs, who is detained from his official duties by indisposition, be excused from further service on said committee, and that another member be appointed in his place. Agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Gholson, Reuben M. Whitney was brought to the bar of the house.

The accused was accordingly brought to the bar of the house, in custody of the sergeant-at-arms, accompanied by his counsel, F. S. Key and Walter Jones, esqs.

The speaker addressed the accused as follows:

"Reuben M. Whitney: You stand charged before this house with an alleged contempt of this house, in having peremptorily refused to give evidence in obedience to a summons duly issued by a committee of this house, which committee had, by an order of the house, power to send for persons and papers.

"You will say whether you are ready to proceed to trial in the mode prescribed by the order of the house, of which you have been informed; or whether you have any request to make of the house before you are put upon your trial. If you have, it will now be received and considered by the house."

In reply to which, Mr. Whitney said he was now ready to proceed.

The following is the manner of proceeding in this case, agreed upon by the adoption of the modified resolution of Mr. Gholson, and which is in the following terms:

Resolved, That Reuben M. Whitney be now permitted to examine witnesses before this house in relation to his alleged contempt; and that a committee of five be appointed by the speaker to examine such witnesses on the part of the house.—That the questions put shall be reduced to writing before proposed to the witness, and that the answers be also reduced to writing. Every question put by any other than a member of the committee shall be reduced to writing by such member, and be propounded to the witness by the speaker, if not objected to; but if any question shall be objected to, or any testimony offered shall be objected to, by any member, the member so objecting, and the accused or his counsel, shall be heard, after which the question shall be decided without further debate. If parol evidence is offered, the witness shall be sworn by the speaker, and be examined at the bar, unless they are members of the house, in which case they may be examined in their places."

Mr. Briggs then raised the preliminary question that the accused had not been guilty of the alleged contempt, because the process by which he had been summoned to appear before the said committee was informal; inasmuch as it had been signed by the chairman of the select committee only, and not by the speaker of the house, certified by the clerk, as required by the 11th rule of the house; and which is as follows:

"11. All acts, addresses and joint resolutions, shall be signed by the speaker; and all writs, warrants and subpoenas, issued by order of the house, shall be under his hand and seal, attested by the clerk."

After a few remarks in support of his objection, Mr. B. offered the following preamble and resolutions:

"Whereas, by the 11th rule of this house, all acts, addresses and joint resolutions, shall be signed by the speaker, and all writs, warrants and subpoenas, issued by order of the house, shall be under his hand and seal, attested by the clerk:

"And whereas the subpoena, by virtue of which Reuben M. Whitney is now in the custody of the sergeant-at-arms of the house, by order of the house, for an alleged contempt for refusing to appear and give testimony before one of the select committees of the house, was not under the hand and seal of the speaker, and attested by the clerk, but signed by the chairman of the select committee: therefore,

Resolved, That the refusal of said Whitney to appear and testify before said committee was not a contempt of this house.

Resolved, That said Whitney be forthwith discharged from the custody of this house."

Mr. Gholson raised the point of order, whether it was competent to go into this objection.

The speaker said the whole case was before the house as a judicial tribunal, and it was competent for the house to quash all proceedings, if they should think proper.

Mr. Claiborne, of Mississippi, was understood to say that the accused would waive all considerations of this kind.

The speaker said the accused was now at the bar of the house by its own order, but that order would not preclude the house from taking any other order which the majority might determine. The chair did not know, however, of any rule by which he was authorized to refuse to receive the motion of the member from Massachusetts.

Mr. Briggs said it was due in justice to himself to say that he had raised this question without consultation with any other member. He had merely submitted this as a preliminary question, for the house to take such action upon it as they pleased.

Mr. Yell said that he hoped the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Briggs) would not be adopted, after the action of this house on a preceding day. By bringing the accused before the house, it was made imperious or proper that this house should afford him that investigation which its importance demanded. The object of the resolution now under consideration was to prescribe the particular mode by which the accused should be tried, and deprive him of the benefit of the usual mode in like cases. Mr. Whitney had, in his memorial to this house, denied its jurisdiction to bring him before the committee or the house, and that, if they had the power, he was justified in refusing to go before the committee for the reasons set forth in his memorial. If the resolution was adopted, the accused would be discharged without further investigation as to the facts of the contempt. He hoped, therefore, the accused would be permitted to select his own course whether he would plead to the jurisdiction first, or be tried upon the facts. If Mr. Whitney was justified from the facts, then it would supersede the necessity of investigating the power of jurisdiction. If, however, he should fail in satisfying this house, from the facts and circumstances of the case, then he would be entitled to the benefit of the question of jurisdiction in purging himself from the alleged contempt. Mr. Y. hoped that, under all the circumstances, the accused might be permitted to proceed in such order as he might choose, under the rules adopted in this and similar cases, and concluded by hoping that the resolution would be rejected.

Mr. A. Mann contended that the objection could not be sustained, inasmuch as the uniform construction of the rule, so far as his observation went, as a member of committees, (and it was extensive), had been that, under a power to send for persons and papers, the process signed in this way was regular and formal. But even if it were not so, it lay with the accused to take exception to the legality of the proceeding.

Mr. Vanderpoel concurred in the opinion of the member from New York, (Mr. Mann), that there was no validity in the objection, and that, if there were, it was the place of the accused to make the objection. He therefore moved to lay the preamble and resolutions on the table.

On which motion Mr. V. called for the yeas and nays and they were ordered.

Mr. Patton inquired whether this motion to lay on the table, if it prevailed, would not carry the whole subject there.

The speaker said, not so. The matter if laid on the table, might be taken up again at any stage of the proceedings.

And the question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 157, nays 35.

So the preamble and resolutions were laid on the table.

Mr. Hardin then submitted a motion that the accused be sworn to answer certain questions which he, (Mr. H.) indicated. The point of order was raised whether, under the resolution adopted for the government of these proceedings, these questions could be put.

Some conversation ensued, and the resolution having, on motion of Mr. Vanderpoel, being read,

The speaker finally decided that, under the phraseology of this resolution, the course proposed by the member from Kentucky, (Mr. Hardin) would not be regular.

The house thereupon proceeded to the execution of its order.

The speaker announced to the accused that the individuals whose names had been handed in to the chair had been summoned, and that the accused might now proceed to their examination.

Mr. F. S. Key, of counsel for the accused, asked that the witnesses be now sworn, which having been done,

The hon. Mr. Fairfield, of the house, was first called to answer in his place.

[Here began the examination of witnesses, &c. which occupied the house to a late hour.]

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In the senate. The chair presented a report from the secretary of state, of the number of passengers which have arrived from certain countries named therein. Referred to the committee on commerce.

Mr. Hendricks, made a report, accompanied by a bill, on the petition of the citizens of Alexandria, on the subject of the Alexandria and Fredericksburg rail road, which report was read, and ordered to be printed, and the bill referred to the committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. Clay, from the select committee to whom were referred the address and memorial of certain foreign authors, praying the security of copy right in this country to their productions, made a report; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. Preston, 1,000 extra copies of the report were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Clay, from the same committee, also reported a bill extending to foreign authors the benefits of the copy right law of 1831. Read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. White, from the committee on Indian affairs, reported a bill to authorise the sale of Creek Indian reservations, and for other purposes. Read, and ordered to a second reading, and the documents were ordered to be printed.

The bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, and the bill to make compensation to the Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama and Mississippi volunteers, discharged without entering active service, were severally read a third time, passed, and sent to the house of representatives for concurrence.

The senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to increase the military establishment of the U. States.

Mr. Calhoun spoke at some length in opposition to the bill.

A debate followed, in which Messrs. Benton, Calhoun, Crittenden, Linn, Southard, Sevier, Tipton and Preston participated.

On motion of Mr. Moore, and by consent, the 19th section of the bill, requiring repayment by students dismissed for bad conduct from the West Point academy, was stricken out.

The bill was then passed by the following vote: YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Ewing, of Ohio, Kent, King, of Ga. Knight, Moore, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson—13.

After an executive session, the senate adjourned.

In the house of representatives. After reports from committees had been received, and several petitions were presented, on motion of Mr. E. Whittlesey, a number of senate bills, on the speaker's table, were read twice by their titles, and committed, (excluding such as would create debate).

Mr. E. Whittlesey, on his own motion, was excused from voting on any questions which might arise during the further progress of the trial of Reuben M. Whitney.

Mr. W. gave, as a reason, that he was unable, in consequence of the pressing business before his committee, to attend to the evidence on the trial, and he did not wish to vote on any question involving personal liberty, without the fullest knowledge of the facts of the case.

The hour of twelve having arrived, the house, in pursuance of its order of yesterday, resumed the consideration of the case of Reuben M. Whitney, for an alleged contempt of the authority of the house, in refusing to appear, as a witness, before the select committee, of which the hon. H. A. Wise is chairman.

The accused was again placed at the bar of the house; and the examination of witnesses was resumed.

DOMESTIC CHRONICLE.

We learn from the Centreville Chronicle, published in Indiana, that Platt, the magistrate, who was connected with the gang of land pirates, on the Atlantic shore of New Jersey, and who fled from justice, forfeiting his recognizance by flight, was apprehended on the 26th ult. somewhere near Centreville, and safely lodged in Eaton jail, to be returned to the marshal of New Jersey, who had offered a reward of $1,000 for his apprehension.

Ohio river. The Wheeling Times of the 11th instant, says—"It will be seen by our advertising columns that the river is open and navigation expected daily to commence. We presume boats will leave to-day."

Mob in New York. A most disgraceful mob occurred in the city of New York, on the evening of Monday last. A public notice was given for a meeting in the Park on the afternoon of that day. The notice itself was couched in language of a highly injudicious character, and calculated to inflame the minds of the unthinking and lead them to the commission of the excesses which they subsequently committed.

The following is a copy of the notice, which was not only published in some of the papers, but placarded through the city:

BREAD, MEAT, RENT, FUEL!
THEIR PRICES MUST COME DOWN!
The voice of the people shall be heard, and will prevail!

The people will meet in the PARK, rain or shine, at 4 o'clock, on MONDAY AFTERNOON, to inquire into the course of the present unexampled distress, and to devise a suitable remedy. All friends of humanity, determined to resist monopolists and extortioners, are invited to attend.

Moses Jaques, Daniel Gorham,
Paulus Hedl, John Windl,
Daniel A. Robertson, Alexander Ming, jr.
Warden Huyward, Elijah F. Crane:
New York, Feb. 10, 1837.

Under the above call about 5,000 or 6,000 persons collected together in front of the City Hall, and were harangued by several persons in a style well suited to lead to outrage. After which a large body of the meeting proceeded to Mr. Hart's store in Washington, between Dey and Cortland streets, and destroyed about a thousand bushels of wheat, and four or five hundred barrels of flour.

The mob also attacked the flour stores of Messrs. Meech & Co. and S. H. Herrick & Co. doing more or less injury in the destruction of flour and other property. The loss of Mr. Hart is said to be about ten thousand dollars.

The citizens, police officers and military, turned out with alacrity.

Statistics of Ohio. The Western Reserve Chronicle, published at Warren, Ohio, gives from the state auditor's report the following statistical facts. There are in Ohio 15,771,060 acres of land, valued at (including town lots and buildings) $3,821,134 dollars. The number of horses is 268,662, valued at $10,746,480; cattle 372,866, value $2,982,928; merchants' capital and money at interest, $3,459,902; number of pleasure carriages 2,808, value $241,054; total amount of taxable property $85,812,382; from which taxes have been raised the past year, for state, county and township purposes, &c. to the amount of $965,310, including the physicians' and lawyers' tax, which amounted to $3,078.

The largest county is Trumbull, which is said to contain 558,593 acres. Hamilton, Columbia and Richmond counties contain the largest number of horses; Trumbull the largest number of cattle (24,496). We see where the beef comes from, but are a little surprised there should yet be necessity of so much horse flesh in a state that has such ample facilities of transportation by canals and rivers.

Wilmington (Del.) every way richly merits to be the metropolis of that state. She has but 8,000 inhabitants, yet by her favorable location near the water power of the Brandywine, and by her enterprise for trade and internal improvements, has a great rail road begun to the Susquehanna, 3 foundries, a manufactory for rail road cars, 1 cotton factory, and 6 or 8 grist mills (capable of making about 400 bbls. flour daily), four whale ships, city supplied by fine water works, a Lancasterian school of 200 pupils, numerous churches, newspapers, literary societies, a capital market, chalybeate springs a mile distant, a most salubrious elevated position on the Delaware, &c. &c. All this and more says the State Journal.

Rice. We intimated some time back (says the Georgetown (S. C.) Intelligencer, of the 31st ult.) a belief that the crop of rice in this part of the state would fall short; we feel authorised now to speak positively on the subject. The deficiency will be considerable, probably from 6 to 10,000 barrels.

General Clinch, late of the United States army, arrived at Augusta, Georgia, on the 8th instant, and was invited to a public dinner by the citizens.

Another minister from Texas. The honorable M. Hunt, minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary from the republic of Texas to the U. States, arrived at S. W. Pass, Sunday, the 15th ult. in the armed schooner Terrible, on his way to Washington. The hon. Mr. Green, member of congress, Mr. Falcl and Dr. De Shields, are passengers.

[New Orleans American.]
Mr. Hunt, probably, will be associated with the present commissioner col. Wharton, now at Washington. We cannot imagine that the latter has been superseded.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 26.—VOL. I.]

BALTIMORE, FEBRUARY 25, 1837.

[VOL. LI.—WHOLE No. 1,326.]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

— In the warehouse of the Messrs. Meeteer, destroyed by fire on the morning of the 4th inst. there was a large supply of paper manufactured expressly for this publication, which was entirely consumed. Since that calamity we have, in consequence of the navigation being closed, been prevented from receiving a further supply, and are compelled to print the present number on paper of inferior quality.

— THE TARIFF AND LAND BILL. The Intelligencer of Wednesday says, that the ultimate fate of the tariff bill, (which is now before the senate), in any form, and that of the land bill, which has passed the senate and is now before the house of representatives, is altogether doubtful.

— THE HON. SAMUEL MCKEAN'S letter to the house of representatives of Pennsylvania, stating the reasons why he would not have voted for the expunging resolution, if he had been in his seat in the senate, is published in the present sheet. It created a considerable sensation in the body to which it was addressed; but at the last advices no final disposition had been made of it.

— THE SUPREME COURT of the United States adjourned on Thursday the 16th inst. The great case of the old and new bridge companies of Boston, which was before it, was decided in favor of the new company.

— MR. R. M. WHITNEY was on Monday night discharged from the custody of the sergeant-at-arms by a vote of 102 yeas to 70 nays—the vote having been effected through the agency of the "previous question." The proceedings during the seven days which were consumed in the examination of witnesses in this case, &c. were of the highest interest and most novel character, and will be inserted at length, as soon as published—as we presume they will be, in the "Intelligencer."

— RELATIONS WITH MEXICO. In our abstract of the proceedings of the senate, will be found the report of the committee of foreign affairs upon the message of the president relating to our affairs with Mexico. It is averse to an immediate resort to reprisals, and recommends that one more opportunity be afforded to Mexico to atone for the past, in the form required by the 34th article of the treaty with that republic, which provides that "if any of the articles contained in the present treaty shall be violated or infringed in any manner whatever, it is stipulated that neither of the contracting parties will order or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor declare war against the other, on complaint of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended shall first have presented to the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proofs, and demanded justice and satisfaction, and the same shall have been either refused or unreasonably delayed."

— GEN. SCOTT AND THE COURT OF INQUIRY. It will be seen by the opinion of the president on the proceedings of the court of inquiry at Frederick in the case of gen. Scott, that he does not consider those proceedings in accordance with the orders issued to the court, and that he has remitted them to that tribunal to the end that it may resume the consideration of the evidence, and from the same, and from such further evidence as shall be taken, (in case the court shall deem it necessary to take further evidence), may ascertain and report, with distinctness and precision—especially as to time, place, distances, and other circumstances—all the facts touching the opening and prosecuting of the campaign in Georgia and Alabama against the hostile Creek Indians, in the year 1836, and the military operations in the said campaign; and touching the delay, if any there was, in the opening or prosecuting of said campaign, and the causes of such delay; and to the end, also, that the court, whilst confining its opinion to the subject matters submitted to it, may fully and distinctly express its opinion on those matters for the information of the president.

On publishing this opinion of the president, the "Globe" says—The proceedings of the court, in respect to the failure of the campaign under generals

Gaines and Scott, against the Seminoles, so far as regards the case of major general Scott, have also been submitted to the president; but we understand that, in consequence of the necessary connexion between the cases of the two commanders, the president has suspended his examination of the proceedings in respect to major general Scott, until he shall have received the proceedings in the case of major general Gaines, when the whole subject will be taken up and disposed of.

— GEN. GAINES has completed his defence, which has been laid before the public through the "Baltimore Patriot," for which paper it was reported. We will, on the first opportunity, present it to our readers.

— FLOUR RIOT We have given the particulars of of the late disgraceful riot in New York. Several of the rioters have been indicted—but we hope the individuals who incited the mob to the brutal doings will not be permitted to escape. If the mob was, as stated, composed chiefly of foreigners, debased by intemperance and crime, and ignorant of our laws, the same plea cannot be urged for the incendiary orators, and they should be visited with a double share of punishment.

— One effect has resulted from the doings of the political economists! which will add to the distress of that class they affected a desire to relieve; the stock of flour having been reduced, the price has naturally risen, and fifty cents per barrel more is now asked than was demanded previous to the mob!

— U. S. SENATOR. On the 7th inst. the hon. Silas Wright, jr. was rechosen by the legislature of N. York, a senator in the congress of the United States from that state for six years, from the 4th of March next. In the senate, the vote stood 23 to 3, and in the house 86 to 27.

— PRESIDENT JACKSON. The following extracts are from the answer of the president to a letter of certain members of the legislature inviting him to Harrisburgh, Pennsylvania:

"Washington, February 11th, 1837.

"Gentlemen: I had fondly hoped, until recently, that the restoration of my health would have put it in my power to comply with the kind wishes expressed in your letter of the 17th December last, inviting me to Harrisburgh.

"I am now made sensible, by the tardy pace of my recovery—age—conspiring with a weight of business to press down a broken constitution, that I shall not be able to muster more than sufficient strength, if so much, as will enable me to sustain the journey directly to my home, with every precaution against extraordinary fatigue."

"That the people of Pennsylvania may always maintain the commanding attitude conferred by their independence and virtue, and which has contributed so much to the blessings of our common country, is my most fervent prayer—that they will always maintain it, I doubt not, unless they resign their own controlling authority, and become betrayed by their agents, and then submit to the treachery, under the mistake that they are bound by the acts of faithless agents—gaming away their rights, and seeking to make the grant inviolable, by chartering away at the same time the rights of their successors. With great respect, I remain your friend and fellow citizen,

ANDREW JACKSON."

— CONGRESS. The "Intelligencer" of Thursday says—The senate yesterday transacted business from 11 to half-past 1 o'clock, and then adjourned, to enable those senators who were so disposed to pay their respects at the president's house, opened for an hour or two, according to previous public notice, for the reception of visitors. The house of representatives, entrapped by the absurd usage which requires a suspension of its rules of proceeding to enable it to receive almost any motion, (which suspension requires the votes of two-thirds of the house to affect it), was unable to take a recess from half-past 1 to 4 o'clock, though a majority desired it. The consequence was, that, soon after 2 o'clock, the house found itself without a quorum, and, after endeavoring for an hour in vain to obtain a quorum for business, was fain to adjourn for want of one.

There are on the docket of the house of representatives something like eight hundred bills to be acted upon; and the committees go on adding daily to the number. Meanwhile, time runs. Seven business days only of the session now remain.

— FOREIGN NEWS. There have been several arrivals from France and England since our last; but the news received by them is of little importance. The usual felicitations were made to Louis Philippe, on the commencement of a new year, but they contain no remarkable feature; even those of the diplomatic corps, which are generally looked to with some interest, are vague and unmeaning.

It now appears, contrary to the last accounts by the way of England, that the assassin who made the last attempt on the life of the king, had no accomplices. The individuals who had been arrested on suspicion of being connected with him, have been set at liberty.

The political complexion of the French chamber of deputies has not been distinctly expressed by any further action on their part. The conduct of Louis Philippe, in declining to interfere in the affairs of Spain, in opposition to the opinion of M. Thiers, his late minister, seems to meet general approbation.

The troops of the queen of Spain have apparently succeeded in relieving Bilbao, and causing the Carlists to raise the siege of that place; but this does not appear to be a very important advantage.

— FROM FLORIDA. The latest news from Florida is contained in a letter to the editors of the "National Intelligencer," dated Fort Armstrong (E. F.) February 6, which says—General Jesup has just arrived from near the Everglades with the intelligence that Jumper and Alligator, two of the principal chiefs, were in his encampment at that place, and passports were given them to the 20th instant, for the purpose of bringing in their respective tribes at that time. They sent in the white flag by Abraham, the prophet and adviser of Micanopy, who states that his chief Micanopy (who is now the most powerful of the hostile chiefs) was also willing to give up. They say they are tired of fighting; that "Powell" (Oceola) is a bad man; and that he has not more than five or six men with him. All the negroes that have been taken concur in this latter statement.

It was expected that general Jesup would in a few days march from Fort Armstrong to Fort Foster, at which place the Indians were to come in on the 20th inst.

Previous to gen. Jesup's arrival at Fort Armstrong he had made an excursion into the heart of the Indian country, having, in the course of the expedition, effected the surprise, on the 24th ult. of the chief COOPER, in his strong hold. COOPER, his son, and an inferior chief called EUCU CHARLEY, and another Indian were killed. COOPER's family, with some 15 or 20 women and children, were captured on the 27th ult. A detachment fell in with a party of Indians and negroes, who fled into the Big Cypress Swamp, an impenetrable morass. They were pursued by a party of marines under col. HENDERSON, and a number of Creek Indians; a skirmish ensued, which resulted in our losing 2 marines killed and 3 wounded, the enemy lost 2 killed. They were pursued until dark, when the party returned to head quarters, having captured from 30 to 40 Indians and negroes, men, women and children. About 100 ponies, 50 of which were laden with packs, and 1,400 head of cattle, were taken on the 27th and 28th ult.

John Pleasants, of the Washington city volunteers, a brave soldier, was killed near Tampa Bay not long since by a party of Indians who were concealed behind a log—eleven balls entered his body, four of which penetrated to his heart.

The Indians are scattered in small parties throughout the country and frequently commit depredations and murders.

The Tallahassee Intelligencer of the 4th instant says—

The house of Mr. Sikes, on the Suwannee, was attacked last week by thirty Indians, in the day time. Mr. Sikes had seven guns in his house.

His wife reloaded them as they were discharged by him. The savages were at length forced to retire, having lost four of their number killed and several wounded.

The house of Mr. Sheffield on the Aucilla, was attacked three days ago. Mr. Sheffield was severely wounded. Fortunately, he, together with his family, escaped.

On Thursday, a party consisting of thirty men from St. Marks and Shell Point, went in pursuit of a party of Indians lately seen about the Waculla. They appear to be dispersed every where in small plundering parties.

THE CREEKS. Captain Page of 4th infantry U. S. army, is a letter from Fort Mitchell, Ala. (3d inst.) to gov. Schley, details the recent hostilities of the Indians in Alabama. Captain P. then proceeds to state that "general Wellborn who commanded a volunteer company, mustered into the U. S. service, trailed them up, and the Indians got into his rear and opened a fire on him, and disabled three men. The battle commenced, and lasted about a half an hour, and one man killed and five wounded. Among the wounded was gen. Wellborn, slightly, having the end of his finger shot off. At the commencement of the battle he had but 21 officers and men in the action; eleven of his command were killed. I have sent to his relief a company of volunteers from Franklin county, Georgia, and another from Tallapoosa county, Alabama. The three companies united, are in full pursuit of the hostiles.

Gen. Wellborn thinks the number of Indians he had to contend with was about sixty.

By the latest intelligence from the seat of war about sixty Indians had surrendered, and it was supposed that the excitement would now speedily subside.

The Indians attacked the dwelling of Mr. Pugh on the 26th ult. and murdered that gentleman and a negro man and child.

MR. ADAMS AND THE GLOBE. The following note was addressed by Mr. Adams to the editors of the Globe:

House of representatives of U. S. Feb. 13, 1837.

To the editors of the Globe:

Sirs: In the report, published in this morning's Globe, of the debate in the house of representatives, on the resolution directing the speaker to issue his warrant for the arrest of R. M. Whitney, my name is inserted in the list of yeas and nays, as voting upon the motion to lay that resolution on the table.

The journal of the house will show, on that question, I did not vote at all. I was excused from voting on that and every other question affecting the personal rights of Reuben M. Whitney, for reasons expressly assigned by me, conformably to the rule of the house.

I take this occasion to remark that, in the report of the debate, on the same day, upon the resolution offered by Mr. Taylor, there are considerable errors in the statement of what was said by me. I did not say that I believed the paper, purporting to be a petition from slaves, to be a forgery, designed as a hoax upon me; nor did I say that I should not again attempt to present the petition. What I said was, that I now believed the paper to be a forgery by a slaveholding master, for the purpose of daring me to present a petition purporting to be from slaves. That having thus reason to believe it a forgery, I should not present it as a petition, whatever might be the decision of the house on the question before them. If I should present it at all, it would be to invoke the authority of the house to cause the author of the forgery to be prosecuted for the forgery; which I certainly would do, if there were a competent judicial authority to try the offender, and I could require and obtain evidence to prove the fact.

I am not in the habit of considering a forgery, committed to deter a member of congress from the discharge of his duty, as a hoax.

I am, with due respect, sirs, your obedient servant,
J. Q. ADAMS.

THE JACKSON CHEESE. The president's mansion was, in pursuance of a notice in the "Globe," opened to visitors on Wednesday the 22d instant. The following paragraph accompanied the notice.

The Jackson cheese. The great cheese which was made an offering to Mr. Jefferson, as the most appropriate present which the farming class could tender the president—the first who brought their influence to bear with its full and proper weight in the public administration—is outdone by the cheese which a patriotic citizen of New York, (colonel Meecham), sent more than a year ago to president Jackson. The Jefferson cheese presented by the citizens of Cheshire, Massachusetts, weighed seven hundred and fifty pounds. The New York present is nearly four feet in diameter, two feet thick, and weighs fourteen hundred pounds. It was transported through the state of New York with great parade to the place where it was shipped. It reached Washington accompanied with a splendidly painted emblematic envelope. We understand the president designs to offer this great cheese, which is finely flavored and in fine preservation, to his fellow citizens who visit him on Wednesday next. Mr. Jefferson's cheese was the banquet of the east room in its unfinished state. The New York present will be served up in the hall of the president's mansion.

OPINION OF THE PRESIDENT

On the proceedings of the court of inquiry ordered to investigate the causes of the delay in the campaign against the Creek Indians.

The president has carefully examined the proceedings of the court of inquiry recently held at the city of Frederick, by virtue of orders No. 65 and 68, so far as the same relate to the causes of the delay in opening and prosecuting the campaign in Georgia and Alabama, against the hostile Creek Indians, in the year 1836; and has maturely considered the opinion of the court on this part of the subject referred to it.

The order constituting the court directs it, among other things, "to inquire and examine into the causes of the delay in opening and prosecuting the campaign in Georgia and Alabama, against the hostile Creek Indians, in the year 1836, and into every subject connected with the military operations in the campaign aforesaid; and after fully investigating the same, to report the facts, together with its opinion on the whole subject, for the information of the president."

It appears, from the proceedings, that after the testimony of nine witnesses had been received by the court, and after more than one hundred documents, bearing on the subject, had also been produced in evidence, and after major general Scott had addressed the court on the subject, the court proceeded to pronounce its opinion, as follows:

"Upon a careful examination of the abundant testimony taken in the foregoing case, the court is of opinion that no delay, which it was practicable to have avoided, was made by major general Scott in opening the campaign against the Creek Indians. On the contrary, it appears that he took the earliest measures to provide arms, munitions and provisions for his forces, who were found almost wholly destitute; and as soon as arms could be put into the hands of the volunteers, they were, in succession, detached and placed in position, to prevent the enemy from retiring upon Florida, and whence they could move against the main body of the enemy, as soon as equipped for offensive operations.

"From the testimony of the governor of Georgia, of major general Sanford, commander of the Georgia volunteers, and many other witnesses of high rank and standing, who were acquainted with the topography of the country, and the position and strength of the enemy, the court is of opinion that the plan of campaign adopted by major general Scott, was well calculated to lead to successful results, and that it was prosecuted by him, as far as practicable, with zeal and ability, until recalled from the command, upon representations made by major general Jesup, his second in command, from Fort Mitchell, in a letter bearing date the 20th of June, 1836, addressed to F. P. Blair, esq. at Washington, marked "private," containing a request that it be shown to the president, which letter was exposed and brought to light by the dignified and magnanimous act of the president, in causing it to be placed on file in the department of war, as an official document, and which forms part of these proceedings, (see document No. 214). Conduct so extraordinary and inexplicable on the part of major general Jesup, in reference to the character of said letter, should, in the opinion of the court, be investigated."

The foregoing opinion is not accompanied by any report of the facts in the case, as required by the order constituting the court; on the contrary, the facts are left to be gathered from the mass of oral and documentary evidence contained in the proceedings; and thus a most important part of the duty assigned to the court remains unexecuted. Had the court stated the facts of the case, as established to its satisfaction by the evidence before it, the president, on comparing such state of facts found by the court, with its opinion, would have distinctly understood the views entertained by the court in respect to the degree of promptitude and energy which ought to be displayed in a campaign against Indians—a point manifestly indispensable to a correct appreciation of the opinion, and one which the president's examination of the evidence has not supplied, inasmuch as he has no means of knowing whether the conclusions drawn by him from the evidence agree with those of the court.

The opinion of the court is also argumentative, and wanting in requisite precision; inasmuch as it states that "no delay, which it was practicable to have avoided, was made by major general Scott, in opening the campaign against the Creek Indians, &c. &c.," thus leaving it to be inferred, but not distinctly finding, that there was some delay, and that it was made by some person other than major general Scott; without specifying in what such delay consisted, when it occurred, how long it continued, nor by whom it was occasioned. Had the court found a state of facts as required by the order constituting it, the uncertainty now existing in this part of the opinion would have been obviated, and the justice of the opinion itself readily determined.

That part of the opinion of the court which animadverts on the letter addressed by major general Jesup to F. P. Blair, esq. bearing date the 20th of June, 1836, and which presents the same as a subject demanding investigation, appears to the president to be wholly unauthorized by the order constituting the court, and by which its jurisdiction was confined to an inquiry into the causes of the delay in opening and prosecuting the campaign against the hostile Creeks, and into such subjects as were connected with the military operations in that campaign. The causes of the recall of major general Scott from the command, and the propriety or impropriety of the conduct of general Jesup in writing the letter referred to, were not submitted to the court as subjects of inquiry. The court itself appears to have been of this opinion, inasmuch as no notice was given to gen. Jesup of the pendency of the proceedings, nor had he any opportunity to cross-examine and interrogate the witnesses; nor to be heard in respect to his conduct in the matter remarked on by the court.

For the several reasons above assigned, the president disapproves the opinion of the court, and remits to it the proceedings in question, to the end that the court may resume the consideration of the evidence; and from the same, and from such further evidence as shall be taken, (in case the court shall deem it necessary to take further evidence), may ascertain and report, with distinctness and precision—especially as to time, place, distances and other circumstances—all the facts touching the opening and prosecuting of the campaign in Georgia and Alabama against the hostile Creek Indians, in the year 1836, and the military operations in the said campaign; and touching the delay, if any there was, in the opening or prosecuting of said campaign, and the causes of such delay; and to the end, also, that the court, whilst confining its opinion to the subject matters submitted to it, may fully and distinctly express its opinion on those matters for the information of the president.

The secretary of war ad interim will cause the proceedings of the court on the subject of the campaign against the Creek Indians, with the documentary evidence referred to therein, and a copy of the foregoing opinion, to be transmitted to major general Macomb, president of the court, for the proper action thereon.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Washington, Feb. 14, 1837.

THE NAVY—OFFICIAL.

Navy department, Feb. 18, 1837.

In consequence of the subjoined letter from lieutenant Samuel W. Downing, of the United States navy, declaring his conviction of the impropriety of his charges and publications against captain Thomas ap Catesby Jones, president of the court martial convened in the city of Baltimore, in the month of July, 1835, for the trial of purser William P. Zantzinger, and against the members of the said court and their proceedings—his regret that said charges and publications were so made and published by him, and his retraction of them—the president of the United States has been pleased to remit the sentence of the general naval court martial convened in the city of Washington on the 27th of December last, for his trial, and lieutenant Samuel W. Downing has been restored to duty.

Washington city, Feb. 13, 1837.

Sir: It having been intimated to me that a retraction is required of my communication published in the Army and Navy Chronicle, in which it is alleged or implied that captain Thomas ap Catesby Jones violated his oath as a member of the court martial, &c. and that he drew up the sentence of the court, and procured a vote by which the offensive remarks applied to me were made a part of their finding, and inserted in their proceeding; the same having been adjudged by the late court martial, upon an examination of the evidence laid before them to be a libel; and being convinced of the impropriety of those publications, I have no hesitation in saying that I submit cheerfully to the opinion of the court, and regret that the charges were made and published, and now retract them, and request that they may be considered as not having been made, and hoping that the frankness of my declaration may be satisfactory to the department, to captain Jones and the other members of the court upon whose conduct these publications reflect. Most respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. W. DOWNING.

The hon. Mahlon Dickerson, secretary of the navy.

THE ARMY—OFFICIAL.

GENERAL ORDER, No. 2.

Adjutant general's office, Washington, Feb. 3, 1837.

I—The secretary of war, ad interim, has received the following resolution from the senate of the U. States:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be requested to cause an examination to be made by a board of officers, into the improvements in fire-arms made by Hall, Cochran, Colt and the baron Hackett; and that the general results be presented to the senate in tabular statements, showing the advantages of each in all important military points of view, and especially as to—

1. The celerity of fire.
2. The extent of the recoil.
3. The efficiency of the fire.
4. The inconvenience from heated barrel in rapid firing.
5. The capacity of being used as a rifle.
6. The simplicity and cheapness of construction.
7. Durability.
8. Saving of ammunition and appendages.
9. The number of charges which may be carried by an infantry soldier.
10. The advantages when used against a charge of cavalry.
11. The advantages when used by cavalry.

II—In conformity with the provisions of the foregoing resolution, the secretary directs that a board, to be composed of the following officers, to wit:

Brev. brig. general J. R. Fenwick, colonel of the 4th artillery;
Brevet brig. general N. Towson, paymaster general;

Col. G. Croghan, inspector general;
Brev. lieu. col. Worth, ordnance;
Lieut. col. Wainwright, marine corps;
Lieut. col. Talcott, ordnance;
Capt. B. Huger, ordnance; be assembled at the Washington arsenal on Monday, the 20th of February instant, at 11 o'clock, for the purpose of making a thorough examination of the improvements in fire arms made by Hall, Colt, Cochran and the baron Hackett, in the manner and mode specified in the resolution.

III—The board will report the general results, for the information of the secretary of war, in tabular form, showing the utility of each fire-arm in all important military points of view, as required by the resolution; and will also report such further information on the subject as they may be able to communicate, with their opinion on the relative advantages of the several improvements submitted to their examination.

First lieu. J. N. Maccomb, of the artillery, and aid-de-camp, will record the proceedings of the board. By order: ROGER JONES,

Adjutant general of the army.

GENERAL ORDER, No. 3.

Adjutant general's office, Washington, Feb. 7, 1837.

I. A general court martial will assemble at the new barracks, in Savannah, Georgia, on the 9th of March, 1837, or as soon thereafter as practicable, for the trial of major William Gates, of the second regiment of artillery, and such prisoners as may be brought before it. The following named officers are hereby detailed to constitute the court, being of the highest rank, and the greatest number that can be convened without manifest injury to the service.

Brevet brigadier general H. Brady, col. 2d infantry; col. W. Lindsay, 2d artillery; brevet col. J. B. Walbach, 1st artillery; col. D. E. Twiggs, 2d dragons; lieu. col. J. Bankhead, 3d artillery; lieu. col. R. Cummings, 2d infantry; brevet major M. P. Lomax, 3d artillery; brevet major J. Irving, 4th artillery; brevet major T. F. Hunt, 5th infantry; captain G. S. Drane, 2d artillery; captain P. H. Galt, 4th artillery; first lieu. W. C. De Hart, 2d regiment of artillery, judge advocate.

II. In case of the non-attendance of any of the members of the court at the time and place mentioned, in consequence of sickness or other unavoidable cause, the court will be organized with any number not less than seven, and, so constituted, proceed with the trial.

By order of major general Maccomb:

R. JONES, adjutant general.

GENERAL ORDER, No. 4.

Adjutant general's office, Washington, Feb. 22, 1837.

In consequence of the duties in which several of the officers detailed as members of the general court martial, ordered to assemble at Savannah, Georgia, on the 9th of March, pursuant to "general order" No. 3, are now engaged, the said court will not be able to convene sooner than the 31st of March; when the officers concerned will severally appear in person accordingly. By order,

R. JONES, adjutant general.

THE FLOUR-RIOT IN NEW YORK.

The following particulars of the late riot in New York are from the New York Commercial Advertiser of the 14th inst. and are placed on record to enable the future historian to trace the downward course of this republic: for we are fully convinced, that unless such disgraceful acts are promptly punished by the arm of public justice, the spirit which dictated them will openly reveal itself against other interests, also deemed sacred, and substitute the law of force, for the statute and moral law, and ultimately overthrow every thing deemed valuable in our political and civil institutions.

Whoever will turn to the history of the French revolution of 1789, will find that the "death dance" was commenced by mobs clamoring for bread, marching in procession, and committing outrages against the bakers. In view of this fact, we have watched the signs of the times in this city, and other parts of the country, with the greater apprehension. A meeting was held at the Broadway Tabernacle, some two or three weeks since to consider and act upon the subject of the high price of provisions. True, an attempt was made to ingraft its proceedings upon the temperance cause, by attributing the high prices of flour and grain to the distilleries.—But we liked it not—seeing nothing but evil from its inevitable tendency.

With still greater dislike did we view the notice for a public meeting in the Park, yesterday afternoon, arranged under the auspices of those precious Jackson-jacobins, Moses Jacques and Alexander Ming, jr. The following is a copy of the notice which was not only published in the agrarian papers, but placarded through the city:

[Here follows the notice calling the meeting, inserted in the last "REGISTER," page 400.]

Such, however, was not the case. At 4 o'clock, a concourse of several thousands had convened in front of the City Hall—composed, as we are assured, of the very canaille of the city—and combining within itself all the elements of outrage, riot and revolution. Moses Jacques was elected as the fitting chairman, of such a meeting. But order was not the presiding genius on the occasion, and the meeting was divided into various groups, each of which was harangued by some chosen demagogue, after his own fashion, and on his own account.

Conspicuous among the orators was Alexander Ming, jr. a patriot who has several times been honored as one of the candidates for the office of register of this city.—His discourse, on the present occasion, is represented as having been less exciting and inflammatory than were those of his fellow orators, as he confined himself to the currency question—enforcing the doctrines of his great colleague of reform colonel Benton—and advising people to discard bank notes, and receive nothing but the precious metals. At the close of his harangue, Ming introduced a set of resolutions, of the character of which we are no further informed than that one of them proposed a memorial to the legislature, praying the prohibition of all bank notes under the denomination of one hundred dollars. The illustrious Bentonian patriot was then uplifted upon the shoulders of the sovereign mob, and borne proudly aloft over to Tammany Hall.

There were other speakers, however, who came directly to the business of the meeting, and, in the most exciting manner, denounced the landlords, and the holders of flour, for the prices of rents and provisions. One of these orators, in the course of his address, after working upon the passions of his audience until they were fitted for the work of spoil and outrage, is reported to have expressly directed the popular vengeance against Mr. Eli Hart, who is one of our most extensive flour dealers on commission. "Fellow-citizens!" he exclaimed, "Mr. Hart has now 53,000 barrels of flour in his store; let us go and offer him eight dollars a barrel, and if he does not take it"—here some person touched the orator on the shoulder, and he suddenly lowered his voice, and finished his sentence by saying, "we shall depart from him in peace."

The hint was sufficient; and a large body of the meeting moved off in the direction of Mr. Hart's store, in Washington, between Dey and Courtlandt streets. The store is a very large brick building, having three wide but strong iron doors upon the street. Being apprised of the approach of the mob, the clerks secured the doors and windows; but not until the middle door had been forced, and some twenty or thirty barrels of flour or more, rolled into the street, and the heads staved in. At this point of time Mr. Hart himself arrived on the ground, with a posse of officers from the police. The officers were assailed by a portion of the mob in Dey street, their staves wrested from them, and shivered to pieces. The number of the mob not being large at this time, the officers succeeded in entering the store, and for a short time interrupted the work of destruction.

The mayor next arrived at the scene of waste and riot, and attempted to remonstrate with the infuriated multitude on the folly of their conduct—but to no purpose; their numbers were rapidly increasing, and his honor was assailed with missiles of all sorts at hand, and with such fury that he was compelled to retire. Large reinforcements of the rioters having arrived, the officers were driven from the field, and the store carried by assault—the first iron door torn from its hinges, being used as a battering ram against the others. The destructives at once rushed in, and the windows and doors of the lofts were broken open. And now again commenced the work of destruction.

Barrels of flour, by dozens, fifties and hundreds were tumbled into the street from the doors, and thrown in rapid succession from the windows, and the heads of those which did not break in falling, were instantly staved in. Intermingled with the flour, were sacks of wheat by the hundred, which were cast into the street, and their contents thrown upon the pavement. About one thousand bushels of wheat, and four or five hundred barrels of flour, were thus wantonly and foolishly as well as wickedly destroyed. The most active of the destructionists were foreigners—indeed the greater part of the assemblage was of exotic origin; but there were probably five hundred or a thousand others, standing by and abetting their incendiary labors.

Amidst the falling and bursting of the barrels and sacks of wheat, numbers of women were engaged, like the crones who strip the dead in battle, filling the boxes and baskets with which they were provided, and their aprons, with flour, and making off with it. One of the destructives, a boy, named James Roach, was seen upon one of the upper window sills, throwing barrel after barrel into the street, and crying out with every throw—"here goes flour at eight dollars a barrel!" Early in the assault, Mr. Hart's counting room was entered, his books and papers seized and scattered to the winds. And herein, probably, consists his greatest loss.

Night had now closed upon the scene, but the work of destruction did not cease until strong bodies of police arrived, followed, soon afterward, by detachments of troops. The store was then cleared by justices Lownds and Bloodgood, and several of the rioters were arrested, and despatched to Bridge-well, under charge of Bowyer, of the police. On his way to the prison, he and his assistants were assailed, his coat torn from his back, and several of the prisoners were rescued. Several more, however, were afterwards captured and secured.

Before the close of the proceedings at Hart's store, however, the cry of "Meech" was raised—whereupon a detachment of the rioters crossed over to Centies slip, for the purpose of attacking the establishment of Meech & Co. but the store of S. H. Herrick & Co. coming first in their way, they commenced an attack upon that. The windows were first smashed in with a shower of brick-bats, and the doors immediately afterwards broken. Some twenty or thirty barrels of flour were then rolled into the street, and the heads of ten or a dozen knocked in.

The number of the rioters engaged in this work was comparatively small and they soon desisted from their labors—probably from an intimation that a strong body of the police were on the way thither. Another account is that they were induced to desist from the work of mischief, by an assurance from the owner, that if they would spare the flour, he would give it all to the poor to-day. Be this, however, as it may, the officers were promptly on the spot, and by the aid of the citizens who collected rapidly, the wretched rabble was dispersed—some thirty or forty of them having been taken and secured, at the two points of action. Unfortunately, however, the ringleaders escaped almost if not quite to a man.

It would probably be unjust to say, that these riots, and the plunder of Mr. Hart were part and parcel of the original design of the meeting; or that all the signers to the call anticipated such a termination of their proceedings. But there is strong circumstantial evidence that all are not innocent. Efforts have been making, in a portion of the penny press—that last and most efficient invention of Satan—for some time past, to arouse the popular indignation against Messrs. Hart and Herrick, and, as the event has proved—with but too much success. Another circumstance indicative of a preconcerted design to plunder those warehouses, is mentioned by one of our morning cotemporaries.

A letter was recently found in the park, with an anonymous signature, and addressed to a Mr. W. Lennox, informing him that the store of Hart & Co. was to be plundered one of these nights by a large party of persons, and that in order to enable them to carry their designs into execution, two alarms of fire were to be given, one near the Battery, and another higher up the city, and that whilst the watchmen and police were assembled at those two points, the conspirators were to break open the store and carry off as much flour as they could. This letter was brought to the high constable, Jacob Hays, who showed it to Hart & Co. Besides this, other anonymous letters of a similar import came to the hands of the mayor, who caused their contents to be made known to Hart & Co.

If these things are so, the city authorities are greatly to blame that efficient measures for the preservation of the peace of the city, were not concerted in anticipation of the meeting. The evening was the regular time of the meeting of both boards of the common council. They assembled as usual; but such was the condition of the city, that they immediately adjourned, and the members at once placed themselves upon the peace establishment. At 8 o'clock all was quiet. We took a stroll over the scene of the principal riot, wading, for a considerable distance, half leg-deep in flour and wheat. Several hundreds of people were yet lingering about, but the police were strong and patrols of troops frequent. We saw several women stealing away with small sacks of flour; but the weather was too intensely cold for people long to remain abroad—and before nine all was deserted and still. Thus has ended the first attempt of the sovereign wisdom of this country to reduce the price of provisions, by reducing the quantity in market.

The troops on duty were detachments from the national guards, under col. Smith, and from col. Helas' regiment. The night was bright moonlight, and the glittering of the burnished armor made quite a striking appearance. Unfortunately, the spirit of insubordination to the restraints of law, is so widely diffusing itself, that it is necessary to keep this armour in a state of effective preparation.

Since the above was in type we have received the following card.

A CARD.

Q. An erroneous impression seems to prevail that the subscriber has purchased up and monopolized the flour in market, which he holds at an exorbitant price. He assures the public, that there is no flour in the city to any extent, but what is the property of millers in the country, and is held by the agents here, and under the control of the owners; the agents having no farther interest in the price than the commissions they receive.

The great scarcity of grain throughout the country may be quoted as the cause of the advance in the price of flour, which at twelve dollars yields but a bare profit, and that the stock now on hand may be estimated at not more than half of last year.

It is needless to say that the destruction of the article cannot have a tendency to reduce the price, nor can there be any disposition to injure the real owners of the article, by assailing the stores of the agents.

ELI HART & CO.

RICHARD M. JOHNSON'S LETTER.

To the senate of the United States:

GENTLEMEN—I have received, with no ordinary emotions, the notice through your committee, of my election to the office of vice president of the United States by the senate. I accept the station assigned me. This token of regard from the representatives of the states, will ever be held in grateful recollection. Permit me to tender you my sincere thanks.

Observing that your decision is in harmony with a majority of the states, and a moiety of all the electors in the primary colleges, my gratification is heightened, from the conviction that the senate, in the exercise of their constitutional prerogative, concurred with, and confirmed the wishes both of the states and of the people. Called, in virtue, of this preferment, to preside in the deliberations of your enlightened body, from and after the 8d of March next, permit me to make use of this opportunity to say, that I cannot feel insensible to difficulties which I must anticipate, and the frequent occasion I may have for your forbearance. Though for thirty years a member of one or the other of the two houses of congress, yet I have never been accustomed to preside, even temporarily, over either, or in any deliberative assembly. My attention has generally been engrossed by the more immediate acts of legislation, without special regard to the minuteness of rules and orders, so necessary to the progress of business, and so important to the observance of the presiding officer.

Contemplating the character of my distinguished predecessor, and considering my deficiency in point of talent, and the want of experience for the appropriate duties of the station, it is impossible for me to overcome entirely the diffidence with which I meet this call of my fellow citizens. But this reflection will always console me, that any errors on my part will effect me personally rather than the public; the intelligence of the senate will guard the country from any injury that might result from the imperfections of its presiding officer, and its magnanimity will cover those imperfections with the veil of charity. In this conclusion, I find a warrant in contemplating among the members of your body many friends to whom I have been associated in public life. It is only in the event of an equal division of the senate that the presiding officer is called upon to give his vote. My hope is, that there may be always a sufficient unanimity to prevent such a contingency. If, however, it should happen, this will be familiar to me, and I shall perform it without embarrassment. In exercising this power, I shall expect the same indulgence that I have ever extended to others, where differences of opinion existed.

To the senate the most important trusts are committed. Its duties are legislative, executive, and, in certain contingencies, judicial. As citizens, every branch of our government is dear to us; but, from my more immediate relation to this, by your choice, I shall regard it with special interest. It stands pre-eminent in talent and character. In presiding over its deliberations, it shall be my effort to act with perfect respect and impartiality towards every member, and endeavor by this course of conduct, to merit the approbation of all. R. M. JOHNSON.

City of Washington, Feb. 10, 1837.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE AND THE NATIONAL INTELLIGENCER.

From the Intelligencer of Saturday, Feb. 11.

The publishers of this paper had the honor yesterday to receive from the department of state the following letter:

Department of state, Washington, Feb. 9, 1837.

Messrs. Gales & Seaton,

Publishers of the National Intelligencer:

GENTLEMEN: The subscription, on the part of this department, for sixteen copies of your semi-weekly, and one copy of your daily paper, for the legations abroad, will cease on the expiration of the period for which that subscription has been paid. I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

EDWARD STUBBS, Agent.

To this letter we have done ourselves the pleasure to return the following reply:

Office of the National Intelligencer, Feb. 10, 1837.

SIR: We have received your letter directing a discontinuance of certain papers ordered from this office by the department of state, after the time to which they are paid for. In conformity to our usage in such cases, not to send the National Intelligencer to any subscriber one moment longer than he desires to continue to receive it, we have directed the papers in question to be discontinued from this day, that is to say, sixteen copies of the National Intelligencer and one copy of the Daily National Intelligencer.

As the subscription to those papers is paid for up to the 26th day of August next, the total amount so overpaid being $57 42, we have, also in accordance with what we have heretofore done in such cases, refunded the amount paid in advance, by this day placing to your credit in the bank of the Metropolis the above sum of $57 42. We are, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

GALES & SEATON.

Edward Stubbs, esq. agent, department of state.

We may, we presume, without any violence of construction, place this measure on the part of the honorable secretary of state to political account. We regret that so veteran a politician has not learnt to look on occasional differences of opinion on public questions (for we have not always differed) with more philosophy; and that he should have been impelled by his feelings thus suddenly to cut off from the legations of his government in foreign countries a source of information with which they have been supplied from the department of state under every change of administration, and every phase of party, now for nearly forty years. But though it is the misfortune of the Intelligencer to have thus suffered proscription at the hands of the honorable secretary, we know that our ministers abroad continue to place on it a juster value; and determined that the public interest shall not, as far as we can prevent it, suffer by keeping them in ignorance (except as officially advised) of what is going on at home, or, what is as bad, giving them one-sided views of public affairs, we shall regularly forward files of the National Intelligencer from this office, beginning this day, to each of our ministers, charge d'affaires and consuls-general abroad, for which they will individually pay the publishers if they think proper, but which, if they do not, they are still welcome to. If their government acts upon such contracted or penurious principles as to refuse them light, it shall not be our fault if they are kept in benighted ignorance of the affairs of their own country.

LEGISLATURE OF DELAWARE.

Resolutions of the Legislature of Delaware, in relation to expunging a certain resolution on the journal of the senate.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, FEB. 7, 1837.

Whereas the president of the United States, in the month of September, 1833, by an abuse of the power of appointment to office, did cause the public money of the United States to be removed from the custody of the bank of the U. States, where it had been deposited by law, subject only to be removed by the secretary of the treasury, upon good and sufficient reasons, to be exhibited to congress, and did declare that he assumed the responsibility of that act; an act which this general assembly believes was pernicious in its consequences, and derogatory to the public faith, as well as subversive of the constitution; and whereas the senate of the United States, on the 28th day of March thereafter, upon full consideration of said act of the president of the United States, and in the exercise, as this general assembly solemnly believes, of its constitutional power, did declare its opinion of the said act, and caused that opinion to be recorded in its journal, in the words following, viz:

"Resolved, That the president, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

And whereas a resolution was adopted by the senate of the U. States, on the 16th day of January inst. in the words following, viz:

"Resolved, That the said resolve [meaning the preceding resolution] be expunged from the journal; and for that purpose, that the secretary of the senate, at such time and place as the senate may appoint, shall bring the manuscript journal of the session of 1833-'84 into the senate, and, in the presence of the senate, draw black lines round the said resolve, and write across the face thereof, in strong letters, the following words: 'Expunged by order of the senate, this sixteenth day of January, in the year of our Lord 1837.'"

And the said secretary did, thereupon, produce the said journal, and, according to the direction of the said resolution, did draw black lines around the resolution of the 28th March, 1834, as it was recorded in the said journal, and wrote across the face thereof, the words "expunged by order of the senate, this 16th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1837," thereby altering, defacing, and mutilating a public record:

And this general assembly, solemnly believing in the truth and justice of the resolution of the 28th of March, 1834, and in the full and perfect right of the senate, under the constitution, to adopt the same, cannot but view, with the strongest feelings of condemnation, an act which, in their judgment, contravenes a solemn truth, violates the constitution, by destroying that which the constitution enjoins shall be kept, and directly invades the rights of the several states of this confederacy, each of which has a property in the journal of the senate, as that is the only record from which it can derive a knowledge of the votes and acts of its representatives in that body; and for the purpose, as well of vindicating the rights of this state in the premises, as of sooner or later reestablishing the constitutional power of the senate of the United States, and of vindicating the constitution itself, by the restoration of the journal of the senate, so that it shall remain a true and faithful record of the acts and proceedings of the senate, and in all time hereafter be kept as the constitution enjoins:

Be it therefore resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the state of Delaware in general assembly met, That the senators of this state in the congress of the United States be, and they are hereby instructed to introduce in the senate, and give their earnest support to, a resolution for restoring the journal of its proceedings of the 28th day of March, 1834, and for rescinding and solemnly disavowing the principles of the resolution of the 16th day of January, 1837, and to give notice in the senate that the motion will be persisted in until the journal of the senate of the 28th day of March, 1834, shall be restored, the constitutional powers of the senate vindicated, and the right and property of this state in the journal of the senate firmly re-established.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing proceedings, signed by the speakers of both houses, be transmitted by the governor to the senators of this state in congress, with a request that they be laid before the senate.

WILLIAM D. WAPLES,
Speaker of the house of representatives.
P. SPRUANCE, Jr.
Speaker of the senate.

Adopted this 31st day of January, 1837.

MR. MCKEAN'S LETTER TO THE LEGISLATURE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Hon. Lewis Dewart, speaker of the house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

SIR: Please to lay before the honorable house of representatives, over which you preside, the accompanying letter from me, addressed to that body; and oblige your obedient servant,

SAMUEL MCKEAN.

Washington city, Feb. 10, 1837.

A communication from Samuel McKean, senator in congress, expressing his sentiments that the resolution adopted by the senate of the United States for expunging any part of their journal is unconstitutional.

Gentlemen of the house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania:

During a late period of extreme bodily suffering, from which I am but partially recovered, I received a letter from your presiding officer, covering a copy of a resolution passed by your body, affirming "that the passage of a resolution by the senate of the United States, censuring the president of the United States for a removal of the deposits, was unwise, inexpedient and unjust, and that the expurgation from the journals of the senate of the aforesaid resolution is, in the opinion of the house, a most salutary and constitutional redress for an unconstitutional attack on the character of the president of the United States; and that the speaker of the house of representatives be directed to forward a copy of the foregoing resolution to the president of the United States, and also one copy to each of the senators from Pennsylvania in the senate of the United States."

As I was providentially prevented from any participation in the recent deliberations and decision of the senate in reference to the subject matter of your resolution, it would now seem to be due to myself, and respectful to the house of representatives, that I should state freely and frankly my true position in relation to that exciting subject; trusting that those charitable feelings which pervade my own breast, in ascribing opposite views to honest motives, will be reciprocated by the house of representatives; for though I may have been sometimes charged with temerity, I am not conscious of having often been suspected of political timidity.

I am well aware that, by those who try to keep pace with the changes of the times, I am classed with those monotonous politicians who are regarded by them merely as the monuments of times past and things which have existed. But, even in this obsolete character, I trust I may, without appearing arrogant, claim for myself one small merit, and, though it may have been denied to me in the composition of my nature the power to change with the facility and frequency of some, nevertheless I may run no great risk in promising, when once well changed, I will probably stay changed as long as any gentleman.—It has been an especial object of my life, the observance of which I have found salutary and profitable, to observe and shun the errors of men, even great men, rather than labor to ape their imaginary excellence or supposed virtues, and have found it to be not less in accordance with inclination than the dictates of duty, to employ the best lights within my power to ascertain my true relation to the great mass of social intelligence which surrounds me. It is but superfluous to say that my humble origin and limited means denied to me those shining embellishments which decorate externally him who descends learnedly on what he is pleased to call the abstruse science of government and diplomacy. Mine have been but the unaided cogitations of native reflection, and have long since convinced me that human governments are but necessary to minor evils, tolerated only because they are designed to correct unnecessary and greater evils, and become intolerable when the exercise of power is carried beyond its legitimate end.

If men in the aggregate were what they might be, or ought to be, I conclude the institution of governments would never have been found necessary.

But men, seeing the defects and foibles of others, and conscious of their own, have relinquished a portion of primary and individual rights to secure more permanently the interest and happiness of all.—Hence government can only derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and the sound maxim, that all political power is inherent in the people, is not more sound and true than that the people also possess the inherent right, and power to delegate, under prescribed fundamental rules, their inherent political powers for general beneficial purposes. Ours is justly called a government of the people, yet in ours the people have, for great and wise purposes, delegated and consented to a system, which, if the public interest required it, has power over all that is valuable and dear in life, and even over life itself; and if it be attempted by a fraction or portion of the people to resume as a primary right the exercise of powers thus delegated, it is subversive of the public peace and safety, an offence against society, disorganizing and revolutionary.—Hence I adopt for myself the best and plainest definition of the term "government," as applicable to our own uncontrollable exercise of appropriate powers, for the time being, or delegated period.

I understand the resolution of the house of representatives to aver, unqualifiedly, that the expurgation from the journals of the senate of the resolution of the 28th of March, 1834, censuring the conduct of the president of the United States in relation to the deposits, is constitutional.

Gentlemen, after the most intense investigation and painful anxiety to know the truth, could I have arrived at the same conclusion that you have, it would have greatly relieved my mind, and then I might have voted, without the appearance of inconsistency, to expunge and blot it out, for the senate journals of those times ought to show that I was opposed to the resolution of the 28th of March, 1834, and in favor of admitting on the journals of the senate the president's protest against it. I was confident at the time that the passage of that resolution was imprudent, calculated to do no good, and might do much harm. I declared so then, and have never for a moment held a contrary opinion since, and have always been ready to vote for a proposition reversing that resolution, and had prepared a proposition to "repeal, rescind, reverse and annul" it, which, if health had permitted, I would have offered as a substitute for the expunging resolution which passed the senate on the 16th of January last.

But with due deference to the opinion of others, and not questioning the motives of any, it is my deliberate and most solemn conviction that the senate cannot expunge any portion of its previous journals, without a clear violation of that clause of the constitution which expressly directs that "each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same."

True, it has been said, by way of extenuation, that the expunging resolutions prescribed by the Virginia legislature do not propose to actually destroy journals, but only to draw black lines around and write certain opprobrious words across the offensive resolution, "but the word must be expunge." This, to my mind, presented the subject in its most exceptionable form, for at the same time the constitutional power to blot out and destroy the journals was evasively given up. Senators were asked to play off fantastical pranks by drawing black lines, which seemed to be more becoming the amusement of volatile boys than the grave deliberations of a senate.

I would infinitely rather have met the question manfully, and vote at once to blot out, expunge and literally destroy the journal. For long as I have been accustomed to venerate and respect the "ancient dominion," (Virginia), her men and her principles, I am not quite ready to adopt, implicitly, her adroit and refined notions how to infringe, and not to violate the fundamental law of the country.

This anti-expunging doctrine is by no means new to me; it is an old and very familiar acquaintance, and received my especial attention and embraces more than twenty years ago, and has not been expunged from my memory, or diminished in my affections from that day to the present.

The constitution of our own state (Pennsylvania) has the same provision as that contained in the constitution of the United States, and reads thus: "Each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and publish the same weekly." This I have always held to be intentionally mandatory and directory, as strongly and clearly so as the import of language could make it, admitting of no construction, no cavil, no doubt; too clear to be illustrated by the power of argument, and too plain to be obscured by the refinement of sophistry. And so it has been held, and so decided by the proper and competent tribunals of Pennsylvania. My opinion has been long settled, and my actions governed accordingly, that, under the constitutions of the United States and the state of Pennsylvania, the journal of each preceding day is made the exclusive and absolute property of the people, over which the legislature has no further control, more than it has over the constitution itself, and possesses no more power to deface, efface, erase, blot out, expunge, add to, or diminish from one sentence, line, or syllable, than it has to alter the constitution, or to burn, or otherwise destroy, the entire journal from the commencement of the government to the present time. The reasons for this constitutional injunction are to my mind as clear and forcible as the language in which it is expressed. The great and good men who penned that sacred instrument seem to have purposely guarded this point with peculiar language and care. "Each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and publish the same." And here the duties and power of the legislature in reference to the journal cease; and this record shall thence remain sacred and inviolate, a perpetual and abiding evidence of the wisdom or folly, pure or impure motives, of the representatives of the people. How is it possible to prove the validity or genuineness of the results of legislation, such as laws, resolutions, and the other numerous duties incidental to legislative authority, except by referring to the written or original journal? Fundamental laws are designed as well to check, circumscribe, control, and govern majorities, as to protect and defend the rights of minorities; and had I not a right under the constitution to claim and expect that protection against the arbitrary exercise of power to destroy the evidence on which I might hereafter wish to rely, to prove as well the principle as the fact, that I did oppose, and was right in opposing, the censorious resolution of the 28th of March, 1834?—It is matter of complaint that a political party majority of the senate at that time acted harshly.—Would it not be wisdom in the adverse majority now to eschew and profit by, rather than imitate, their incautious example?

But it is said that the resolution of the 28th of March, 1834, is unconstitutional, and therefore ought to be expunged. That is a question about which great and good men may honestly differ, and upon which it is not necessary to my present purpose to volunteer an opinion. Admitting it, however, for the sake of argument, to be unconstitutional, can it be amended by doing another unconstitutional act, by way of retaliation? Or where do we find the power to correct one unconstitutional act by another unconstitutional act? The object of the constitution in directing that a journal shall be kept, could not be only to preserve the wise and virtuous acts of legislators; it also intended that their unwise and vicious transactions should be alike accessible to public scrutiny and investigation: then, if the condemnatory resolution be unconstitutional, let its effects be blunted and annulled by an adverse expression of the senate, placed on the journal, and let the objectionable resolution remain as the constitution intended, an abiding testimony against its authors and supporters.

We need apprehend no positive evils in legislation, resulting from political minorities. Those only can abuse power, who are in the possession of power.

And we ought to be exceedingly cautious how we establish doubtful precedents in times of high party excitement, for though we may have numerical power now to expunge, blot out and destroy, we ought not to forget that those who come after us may have a majority differing from us in sentiment, and, with our fatal example before them, may expunge us, and blot out our proceedings. Indeed, the first fluctuation which may give an adverse senatorial majority to the present, I anticipate an effort will be made to restore the journal which was mutilated on the 16th day of January, 1837; and thus the fatal error commenced, where is it to end?

We exhibit, at the present time, an exquisite refinement upon party rancor, which, to my mind, reflects no credit on our country, and the causes of which, at this particular period, may well occupy the serious thoughts of the statesman and patriot.

What have our eyes seen and our ears heard in the short space of three years? The highest functionaries of our government, mutually charging upon each other, in official form, the corrupt violation of the sacred charter of our liberties. I claim for myself no superiority over, nor plead exemption from, the common imperfections of our nature, and am as much disposed as ever to listen kindly to the suggestions of experienced friends, and will go proper and reasonable lengths to support party; but for no pretended expediency can I consent to lay violent hands on the constitution.

The resolution of the house of representatives, I presume, was originally designed as instructions for me to vote for the expunging resolution, and as such it would be entitled to and would have received my most respectful consideration; for I trust no gentleman holds in higher estimation the opinions of his legislature than I do the opinions of mine, and I shall always be happy to find my opinions accord with theirs; but it is due to candor for me to state here that I recognise the force and obligation of legislative instructions, with some exceptions and qualifications, which it is not necessary for me at present to go into.

The doctrine of instruction means something or it means nothing; we must adopt it as paramount or indispensable, or we must give it a place among other occurrences, to be estimated according to time and circumstances. It will not satisfy an honest and intelligent public for us to hold instructions to be sacred and binding only when they answer our purpose, and reject instructions as useless when they operate against our views and interest. The legislature of Pennsylvania, in choosing her senators in congress, do not act in separate bodies as senate and house of representatives, but meet in convention and vote conjointly, and a bare majority of the members voting is sufficient to elect.

How, then, does this matter stand, as regards the Pennsylvania senators in congress?

In 1835, two years ago, resolutions were proposed in the legislature of Pennsylvania, instructing her senators to vote to expunge from the journals of the senate the resolution of the 28th of March, 1834, which were under consideration at different times, but never passed, and were finally permitted to sleep quietly.

About the same time expunging resolutions from the state of Georgia, transmitted to the legislature of Pennsylvania, were indefinitely postponed; and this, too, at a time when both branches of the legislature of Pennsylvania were decidedly friendly to the present chief magistrate of the union. Now, if this proves any thing, it proves that the legislature of Pennsylvania, at that time strongly Jacksonian, were at least disinclined to countenance or sanction the expunging doctrine: and what next? Why, during the session of 1836, about one year ago, the house of representatives of Pennsylvania passed a resolution through all the parliamentary forms, instructing her senators in congress, by name, to vote against the Virginia, or any similar, expunging resolution, by a vote of sixty-four to twenty-five, majority, thirty-nine; it was not acted on by the senate; but from the well known sentiments of that body, then and now, it is reasonable to suppose it would have added to the majority of the house of representatives. But be that as it may, you will observe that the majority in the house, who voted to instruct their senators in congress to vote against expunging, is decidedly greater than the whole number of senators, and as large, if not a larger majority of both houses, than either of the present Pennsylvania senators in congress had received in joint ballot. Such is the true relation in which the Pennsylvania senate stood in reference to legislative instructions on the 16th of January last. Now, if I am correct, and a reference to your journals will test it, it clearly follows that, for all practical purposes, the Pennsylvania senators stood essentially instructed to vote against expunging, at the time it passed the senate of the United States.

I state these facts at this time only to show that, in the plainest supposable case, we meet many difficulties at every step, in carrying out consistently the practical operations of the doctrine of implicit and unconditional obedience to legislative instructions.

But I must not forget that I have said that the anti-expunging doctrine has been long since asserted, and settled by the proper and competent tribunal of Pennsylvania; and as it devolves on me, I will now produce the proof. The origin of the case is not to be found of record, because it was informal, and grew out of a desultory and incidental debate on the 19th of February, 1816, upon the suggestion of a member to expunge from the journals of a previous day certain matters which he thought were irrelevant and unimportant. The speaker gave it as his opinion that a majority of the house might order to be expunged from the journal proceedings on which the yeas and nays had not been called. This opinion was controverted and repelled by the most talented and experienced members of the house; and declared to be clearly unconstitutional, and of dangerous precedence and tendency. It was contended that if the house asserted the right to judge in one case what it might expunge from the journal, it followed that it had the same right to judge in all cases, and the journal would no longer be safe and inviolable, as was designed by the constitution, but would be subjected to the political caprice of the majorities of each succeeding session, and the fluctuating and occasional majorities of each succeeding day.

The constitutional power to expunge any portion of the journal on any pretext whatever, even by the unanimous consent of the house, was utterly repudiated and denied, and the matter rested for that day. Being a new member of the house at that time, and anxious to understand my duties, the subject made a deep impression on my mind, which has never been forgotten or effaced.

On the next day, precisely twenty-one years ago this very day, see journal of the house of representatives of Pennsylvania, page 359, "February 10, 1816, the speaker informed the house that a constitutional question being involved in a decision by him yesterday, on a motion to expunge certain proceedings from the journals, he was desirous of having the opinion of the house on that decision," viz: "That a majority can expunge any proceedings from the journals on which the yeas and nays have not been called."

Whereupon,

Mr. Holgate and Mr. Smith appealed from said decision.

And on the question, "Is the speaker right in his decision?"

The members present voted as follows, viz:

YEAS—Messrs J. Anderson, J. Bucher and Dechert—3.

NAYS—Messrs. Allshouse, Alter, S. Anderson, Baird, Black, Boyd, Brodhead, Buchanan, C. Bucher, Clarke, Cochran, Conyngham, Coon, Denison, Dysart, Edwards, Eichelberger, Goodhart, Haldeman, Halliwell, Hamilton, Hart, Herrington, Hibshman, Hiestler, Hillard, Holgate, Hottenstein, Humphrey, Hutchison, Jenks, Kelley, King, Kittera, Kryder, Lewis, Lightner, Livingston, Maclay, Marlin, Martin, McClure, McEuen, McKean, McKibbin, Menough, Middleswarth, Miller, Morgan, Morton, Mosher, Norbury, Plumer, Powell, Ralston, Read, Rhoads, Rinker, Roberts, Robinette, Rowland, Sawyer, Scott, T. Sellers, Shaffer, Smith, Stewart, Stroman, Sutherland, Tryon, Vance, J. Wallace, P. Wallace, J. J. Wallis, Weston, White, Wind and Wynkoop—78.

I am aware that my humble name, recorded above with the majority against the opinion of the speaker, who was my personal and political friend, adds but little to the weight of authority; but it will also be seen that many of the distinguished men of our state of that and the present day voted on the same side. How many of them have since changed, I know not; but one thing I know—the constitution is yet the same. Such was, at that time, the almost unanimous opinion of the house of representatives of Pennsylvania, on the simple and abstract question of constitutional power, unincumbered, and unconnected with any party consideration or extraneous excitement to swerve the mind from its honest purpose, and the house recorded its solemn decision, 78 to 3, that a majority had no power, under the constitution, to expunge any portion of its journals; and their decision, made in 1816, is diametrically opposed to the doctrine asserted by the house in 1837, viz: that it is constitutional to expunge the journals. And does not the Pennsylvania house of representatives of 1837 possess as much power over the journals of their predecessors of 1816 as the senate of the United States in 1837 possesses over the journals of their predecessors of 1834? Now I respectfully ask the house of representatives, whether they claim the constitutional right and power to take from the archives the manuscript journal of 1816, and expunge the proceedings to which I refer, and thereby deprive me of the only evidence I have to prove that I am now stating correctly what then occurred, and that my present opinions are consistent with the sentiments which I then avowed.

But this is not all. There will be found on the journal of the same day, February 10th, 1816, page 361, the following, viz:

"A motion was made by Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Kelley, and read as follows: 'Resolved, That, in the opinion of this house, no part of the journals can be expunged, even by unanimous consent.'"

The resolution covers the whole ground. The remedy is as broad as the malady, and "the word was expunge." There was no diversity of opinion as to its proper meaning; and if the word expunge had five hundred different applications, they are all met by the resolution and proceedings of the house just referred to, as both assert that the journal cannot be expunged.

Time passes away and men change; but principles and truth are eternal. And I still hope that those good old Pennsylvania doctrines, asserted and acted on in the days when the venerable Madison commanded the constitution, and the patriot Snyder stood at the helm of the ship Pennsylvania, may yet survive, and, like the coat of Hunks, again become fashionable and valuable.

I wholly repudiate the sickly idea harped on by those who assume to be the keepers of his reputation, that the existence on the journals of the resolution of the 28th of March, 1834, has tarnished the character of the chief magistrate, and therefore it must be expunged. It is not true; and every popular demonstration denies it. His fame stands too firm and high to need any artificial propping. And I protest against submitting the measure of my political faith to be tested by the anomalous and degrading standard of the Virginia expunging resolutions.

I ask pardon of the house for digressing in a few subsequent allusions to matters having no connexion with the house of representatives. I could not, were I disposed to, be ignorant of the current insinuations from numerous irresponsible sources, to injure me politically in public estimation.

I perfectly understand the authors of the engines of detraction set in motion to drag me into a state of abject political servility, or to render life unpleasant as the price of independence and integrity. My first responsible political act was a vote given in 1808, to aid in bringing Simon Snyder into the gubernatorial chair.

To many of you it is known, and a recurrence to past events will prove, that I have enjoyed a reasonable, perhaps as some have complained, an undue share of the confidence of every democratic administration from that to the present time. I have frequently, from a sense of duty, differed from my political friends in power, as to party measures, without once thinking that thereby I was incurring party proscription and anathema; and still less for expressing an honest difference of opinion as to the import and meaning of the constitution. Having thus passed on, without known or intentional deviation, for a term of nearly thirty years, now, if nothing but immolation will appease my enemies, let the blow come. I am prepared for the worst, and only regret that I can point to so many names, of higher merit, who have much sooner sunk under the baneful effects of this systematized ostracism.

The public records, as cited above, show clearly, that, acting under official oath twenty-one years ago, I declared against the doctrine of expurgation.

I must now be content with the opinion of the house as to my sincerity, when I declare that every consideration which I have been able to bestow on the subject since, has confirmed me stronger in the correctness of that opinion. Under these circumstances I ask the house of representatives, what was my duty as a senator? I answer for myself. If my health had permitted, I would have been taken to the senate chamber on the night of the 16th of January, and would have offered my proposition, reversing the resolution of the 28th of March, 1834; and if this had been rejected, I would then, as one of the most imperative and conscientious duties of my life, have voted against the expunging resolution, freely awarding to others, who have thought and acted differently, what I claim for myself, viz: honesty of purpose. I declare to you, gentlemen of the house of representatives, that I could not vote for that resolution, without having, in my own estimation, committed a flagrant infraction of the constitution of my country, a clear violation of the oath I had taken to support it, and must stand, ever after, before God and my own conscience, GUILTY of deliberate moral REPRISAL.

SAMUEL MCKEAN.

Washington, Feb. 10, 1837.

THE EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

SPEECH OF MR. CLAY, (OF KENTUCKY),
On the resolution to expunge a part of the journal for the session of 1833-1834.

In senate, Monday, January 16, 1837.

Mr. Clay rose and said that, considering that he was the mover of the resolution of March, 1834, and the consequent relation in which he stood to the majority of the senate by whose vote it was adopted, he had felt it to be his duty to say something on this expunging resolution; and he had always intended to do so when he should be persuaded that there existed a settled purpose of pressing it to a final decision. But it had been so taken up and put down at the last session—taken up one day, when a speech was prepared for delivery, and put down when it was pronounced, that he had really doubted whether there existed any serious intention of ever putting it to the vote. At the very close of the last session, it will be recollected that the resolution came up, and in several quarters of the senate a disposition was manifested to come to a definitive decision. On that occasion he had offered to waive his right to address the senate, and silently to vote upon the resolution; but it was again laid upon the table, and laid there forever, as the country supposed, and as he believed. It is, however, now revived; and, sundry changes having taken place in the members of this body, it would seem that the present design is to bring the resolution to an absolute conclusion.

I have not risen, (continued Mr. Clay) to repeat, at full length, the argument by which the friends of the resolution of March, 1834, sustained it. That argument is before the world, was unanswered at the time, and is unanswerable. And I here, in my place, in the presence of my country and my God, after the fullest consideration and deliberation of which my mind is capable, re-assert my solemn conviction of the truth of every proposition contained in that resolution. But, whilst it is not my intention to commit such an infliction upon the senate as that would be of retracing the whole ground of argument formerly occupied, I desire to lay before it, at this time, a brief and true state of the case. Before the fatal step is taken of giving to the expunging resolution the sanction of the American senate, I wish by presenting a faithful outline of the real questions involved in the resolution of 1834, to make a last, even if it is to be an ineffectual, appeal to the sober judgments of senators. I begin by reasserting the truth of that resolution.

Our British ancestors understood perfectly well the immense importance of the money power in a representative government. It is the great lever by which the crown is touched, and made to conform its administration to the interests of the kingdom and the will of the people. Deprive parliament of the power of freely granting or withholding supplies, and surrender to the king the purse of the nation, he instantly becomes an absolute monarch. Whatever may be the form of government, elective or hereditary, democratic or despotic, that person who commands the force of the nation, and at the same time has uncontrolled possession of the purse of the nation, has absolute power, whatever may be the official name by which he is called.

Our immediate ancestors, profiting by the lessons on civil liberty which had been taught in the country from which we sprung, endeavored to encircle around the public purse, in the hands of congress, every possible security against the intrusion of the executive. With this view, congress alone is invested, by the constitution, with the power to lay and collect the taxes. When collected, not a cent is to be drawn from the public treasury, but in virtue of an act of congress. And, among the first acts of this government, was the passage of a law establishing the treasury department, for the safe keeping and the legal and regular disbursement of the money so collected. By that act a secretary of the treasury is placed at the head of the department; and, varying in the respect from all the other departments, he is to report, not to the president, but directly to congress, and is liable to be called to give information in person before congress. It is impossible to examine dispassionately that act, without coming to the conclusion that he is emphatically the agent of congress in performing the duties assigned by the constitution to congress. The act further provides that a treasurer shall be appointed to receive and keep the public money, and none can be drawn from his custody but under the authority of a law, and in virtue of a warrant drawn by the secretary of the treasury, countersigned by the comptroller, and recorded by the register. Only when such a warrant is presented can the treasurer lawfully pay one dollar from the public purse. Why was the concurrence of these four officers required in disbursements of the public money? Was it not for greater security? Was it not intended that each exercising a separate and independent will should be a check upon every other? Was it not the purpose of the law to consider each of these four officers, acting in his proper sphere, not as a mere automaton, but as an intellectual, intelligent and responsible person, bound to observe the law, and to stop the warrant, or stop the money, if the authority of the law were wanting?

Thus stood the treasury from 1789 to 1816. During that long time no president had ever attempted to interfere with the custody of the public purse. It remained where the law placed it, undisturbed, and every chief magistrate, including the father of his country, respected the law.

In 1816 an act passed to establish the late bank of the United States for the term of twenty years; and, by the 16th section of the act, it is enacted "that the deposits of the money of the United States in places in which the said bank and the branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank or branches thereof, unless the secretary of the treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct; in which case, the secretary of the treasury shall immediately lay before congress, if in session, and, if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons of such order or direction."

Thus it is perfectly manifest, from the express words of the law, that the power to make any order or direction for the removal of the public deposits is confided to the secretary alone, to the absolute exclusion of the president, and all the world besides. And the law, proceeding upon the established principle that the secretary of the treasury, in all that concerns the public purse, acts as the direct agent of congress, requires, in the event of his ordering or directing a removal of the deposits, that he shall immediately lay his reasons therefor before whom? The president? No; before congress.

So stood the public treasury and the public deposits from the year 1816 to September, 1833. In all that period of seventeen years, running through or into four several administrations of the government, the law had its uninterrupted operation, no chief magistrate having assumed upon himself the power of diverting the public purse from its lawful custody, or of substituting his will to that of the officer to whose care it was exclusively entrusted.

In the session of congress of 1832-'3 an inquiry had been instituted by the house of representatives into the condition of the bank of the United States. It resulted in a conviction of its entire safety, and a declaration by the house, made only a short time before the adjournment of congress on the 4th of March, 1833, that the public deposits were perfectly secure. This declaration was probably made in consequence of suspicions then afloat of a design on the part of the executive to remove the deposits. These suspicions were denied by the press friendly to the administration. Nevertheless, the members had scarcely reached their respective homes before measures were commenced by the executive to effect a removal of the deposits from that very place of safety which it was among the last acts of the house to declare existed in the bank of the United States.

In prosecution of this design, Mr. McLean, the secretary of the treasury, who was decidedly opposed to such a measure, was promoted to the department of state, and Mr. Duane was appointed to succeed him. But Mr. Duane was equally convinced with his predecessor that he was forbidden by every consideration of duty to execute the power with which the law had entrusted the secretary of the treasury, and refused to remove the deposits; whereupon he was dismissed from office, a new secretary of the treasury was appointed, and, in September, 1833, by the command of the president, the measure was finally accomplished. That it was the president's act was never denied, but proclaimed, boasted, defended. It fell upon the country like a thunderbolt, agitating the union from one extremity to the other. The stoutest adherents of the administration were alarmed; and all thinking men, not blinded by party prejudice, beheld in the act a bold and dangerous exercise of power; and no human sagacity, can now foresee the tremendous consequences which will ensue. The measure was adopted not long before the approaching session of congress; and, as the concurrence of both branches might be necessary to compel a restoration of the deposits, the object was to take the chance of a possible division between them, and thereby defeat the restoration.

And where did the president find the power for this most extraordinary act? It has been seen that the constitution, jealous of all executive interference with the treasury of the nation, has confined it to the exclusive care of congress, by every precautionary guard, from the first imposition of the taxes to the final disbursement of the public money.

It has been seen that the language of the sixteenth section of the law of 1816 is express and free from all ambiguity; and that the secretary of the treasury is the sole and exclusive depository of the authority which it confers.

Those who maintain the power of the president have to support it against the positive language of the constitution, against the explicit words of the statute, and against the genius and theory of all our institutions.

And how do they surmount these insuperable obstacles? By a series of far-fetched implications, which, if every one of them were as true as they are believed to be incorrect or perverted, would stop far short of maintaining the power which was exercised.

The first of these implied powers is, that of dismissal, which is claimed for the president. Of all the questioned powers ever exercised by this government, this is the most questionable. From the first congress down to the present administration, it had never been examined. It was carried, then, in the senate by the casting vote of the vice president. And those who, at that day, argued in behalf of the power, contended for it upon conditions which have been utterly disregarded by the present chief magistrate. The power of dismissal is no where in the constitution granted, in express terms, to the president. It is not a necessary incident to any granted power; and the friends of the power have never been able to agree among themselves as to the precise part of the constitution from which it springs.

But, if the power of dismissal was as incontestable as it is justly controvertible, we utterly deny the consequences deduced from it. The argument is, that the president has, by implication, the power of dismissal. From this first implication another is drawn, and that is, that the president has the power to control the officer, whom he may dismiss, in the discharge of his duties, in all cases whatever; and that this power of control is so comprehensive as to include even the case of a specific duty expressly assigned by law to the designated officer.

Now, we deny these results from the dismissing power. That power, if it exists, can draw after it only a right of general superintendence. It cannot authorise the president to substitute his will to the will of the officer charged with the performance of official duties. Above all, it cannot justify such a substitution in a case where the law, as in the present instance, assigns to a designated officer exclusively the performance of a particular duty, and commands him to report not to the president, but to congress, in a case regarding the public purse of the nation, committed to the exclusive control of congress.

Such a consequence as that which I am contesting would concentrate in the hands of one man the entire executive power of the nation, uncontrolled and unchecked.

It would be utterly destructive of all official responsibility. Instead of each officer being responsible, in his own separate sphere, for his official acts, he would shelter himself behind the orders of the president. And what tribunal, in heaven above or on earth below, could render judgment against any officer for an act, however atrocious, performed by the express command of the president, which, according to the argument, he was absolutely bound to obey?

Whilst all official responsibility would be utterly annihilated in subordinated officers, there would be no practical or available responsibility in the president himself.

But the case has been supposed, of a necessity for the removal of the deposits, and a refusal of the secretary of the treasury to remove them; and it is triumphantly asked if, in such a case, the president may not remove him, and command the deed to be done. That is an extreme case, which may be met by another. Suppose the president, without any necessity, orders the removal from a place of safety to a place of hazard? If there be danger that a secretary may neglect his duty, there is equal danger that a president may abuse his authority. Infallibility is not a human attribute. And there is more security for the public in holding the secretary of the treasury to the strict performance of an official duty specially assigned to him, under all his official responsibility, than to allow the president to wrest the work from his hands, annihilate his responsibility, and stand himself practically irresponsible. It is far better that millions should be lost by the neglect of a secretary of the treasury, than to establish the monstrous principle that all the checks and balances of the executive government shall be broken down, the whole power absorbed by one man, and his will become the supreme rule. The argument which I am combatting places the whole treasury of the nation at the mercy of the executive. It is in vain to talk of appropriations by law, and the formalities of warrants upon the treasury. Assuming the argument to be correct, what is to prevent the execution of an order from the president to the secretary of the treasury to issue a warrant, without the sanction of a previous legal appropriation, to the comptroller to countersign it, to the register to register it, and to the treasurer to pay it? What becomes of that quadruple security which the precaution of the law provided? Instead of four substantive and independent wills, acting under legal obligations, all are merged in the executive voters.

But there was, in point of fact, no cause, none whatever, for the measure. Every fiscal consideration (and no other had the secretary or the president a right to entertain) required the deposits to be left undisturbed in the place of perfect safety where by law they were. We told you so at the time. We asserted that the charges of insecurity and insolvency of the bank were without the slightest foundation. And time, that great arbiter of human controversies, has confirmed all that we said. The bank, from documents submitted to congress by the secretary of the treasury at the present session, appears to be able not only to return every dollar of the stock held in its capital by the public, but an addition of eleven per cent. beyond it.

Those who defend the executive act have to maintain not only that the president may assume upon himself the discharge of a duty specially assigned to the secretary of the treasury, but that he may remove that officer, arbitrarily, and without any cause, because he refused to remove the public depositories without cause.

My mind conducts me to a totally different conclusion. I think, I solemnly believe, that the president "assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both," in the language of the resolution. I believed then in the truth of the resolution; and I now in my place, and under all my responsibility, reavow my unshaken conviction of it.

But it has been contended on this occasion, as it was in the debate which preceded the adoption of the resolution of 1834, that the senate has no right to express the truth on any question which, by possibility, may become a subject of impeachment. It is manifest that if it may, there is no more usual or appropriate form in which it may be done than that of resolutions, joint or separate, orders, or bills. In no other mode can the collective sense of the body be expressed. But senators maintain that no matter what may be the executive encroachment upon the joint powers of the two houses, or the separate authority of the senate, it is bound to stand mute, and not breathe one word of complaint or remonstrance. According to the argument, the greater the violation of the constitution or the law, the greater the incompetency of the senate to express any opinion upon it! Further, that this incompetency is not confined to the acts of the president only, but extends to those of every officer who is liable to impeachment under the constitution. Is this possible? Can it be true? Contrary to all the laws of nature, is the senate the only being which has no power of self-preservation—no right to complain or to remonstrate against attacks upon its very existence?

The argument is, that the senate, being the constitutional tribunal to try all impeachments, is thereby precluded from the exercise of the right to express any opinion upon any official malfeasance, except when acting in its judicial character.

If this disqualification exist, it applies to all impeachable officers, and ought to have protected the late postmaster general against the resolution, unanimously adopted by the senate, declaring that he had borrowed money contrary to law. And it would disable the senate from considering that treasury order which has formed such a prominent subject of its deliberations during the present session.

And how do senators maintain this obligation of the senate to remain silent and behold itself stripped, one by one, of all its constitutional powers, without resistance, and without murmur? Is it imposed by the language of the constitution? Has any part of that instrument been pointed to which expressly enjoins it? No, no, not a syllable. But it is attempted to be deduced by another far-fetched implication. Because the senate is the body which is to try impeachments, therefore it is inferred the senate can express no opinion on any matter which may form the subject of impeachment. The constitution does not say so. That is undeniable; but senators think so.

The senate acts in three characters, legislative, executive and judicial; and their importance is in the order enumerated. By far the most important of the three is its legislative. In that, almost every day that it has been in session from 1789 to the present time, some legislative business has been transacted; whilst, in its judicial character, it has not sat more than three or four times in that whole period.

Why should the judicial function limit and restrain the legislative function of the senate, more than the legislative should the judicial? If the degree of importance of the two should decide which ought to impose the restraint, in cases of conflict between them, none can doubt which it should be.

But if the argument is sound, how is it possible for the senate to perform its legislative duties? An act in violation of the constitution or laws is committed by the president or a subordinate executive officer, and it becomes necessary to correct it by the passage of a law. The very act of the president in question was under a law to which the senate had given its concurrence. According to the argument, the correcting law cannot originate in the senate, because it would have to pass in judgment upon that act. Nay, more, it cannot originate in the house and be sent to the senate, for the same reason of incompetency in the senate to pass upon it. Suppose the bill contained a preamble reciting the unconstitutional or illegal act, to which the legislative corrective is applied, according to the argument, the senate must not think of passing it. Pushed to its legitimate consequence, the argument requires the house of representatives itself cautiously to abstain from the expression of any opinion upon an executive act, except when it is acting as the grand inquest of the nation, and considering articles of impeachment.

Assuming that the argument is well founded, the senate is equally restrained from expressing any opinion which would imply the innocence or the guilt of an impeachable officer, unless it be maintained that it is lawful to express praise and approbation, but not censure or difference of opinion.—Instances have occurred in our past history, (the case of the British minister, Jackson, was a memorable one), and many others may arise in our future progress, when, in reference to foreign powers, it may be important for congress to approve what has been done by the executive, to present a firm and united front, and to pledge the country to stand by and support him. May it not do that? If the senate dare not entertain and express any opinion upon an executive measure, how do those who support this expunging resolution justify the acquittal of the president which it proclaims?

No senator believed in 1834 that, whether the president merited impeachment or not, he ever would be impeached. In point of fact he has not been, and we have every reason to suppose that he never will be impeached. Was the majority of the senate, in a case where it believed the constitution and laws to have been violated, and the liberties of the people to be endangered, to remain silent, and to refrain from proclaiming the truth, because, against all human probability, the president might be impeached by a majority of his political friends in the house of representatives?

If an impeachment had been actually voted by the house of representatives, there is nothing in the constitution which enjoins silence on the part of the senate. In such a case, it would have been a matter of propriety for the consideration of each senator to avoid the expression of any opinion on a matter upon which, as a sworn judge, he would be called to act.

Hitherto I have considered the question on the supposition that the resolution of March, 1834, implied such guilt in the president that he would have been liable to conviction on a trial by impeachment before the senate of the United States. But the resolution, in fact, imported no such guilt. It simply affirmed that he had "assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both." It imputed no criminal motives. It did not profess to penetrate into the heart of the president. According to the phraseology of the resolution, the exceptional act might have been performed with the purest and most patriotic intention. The resolution neither affirmed his innocence, nor pronounced his guilt.—It amounts, then, say his friends on this floor, to nothing. Not so. If the constitution be trampled upon, and the laws be violated, the injury may be equally great whether it has been done with good or bad intentions. There may be a difference to the officer, none to the country. The country, as all experience demonstrates, has most reason to apprehend those encroachments which take place on plausible pretences, and with good intentions.

I put it, Mr. President, to the calm and deliberate consideration of the majority of the senate, are you ready to pronounce, in the face of this enlightened community, for all time to come, and whoever may happen to be the president, that the senate dare not, in language the most inoffensive and respectful, remonstrate against any executive usurpation, whatever may be its degree or danger?

For one, I will not, I cannot. I believe the resolution of March, 1834, to have been true: and that it was competent to the senate to proclaim the truth. And I solemnly believe that the senate would have been culpably neglectful of its duty to itself, to the constitution, and to the country, if it had not announced the truth.

But let me suppose that in all this I am mistaken; that the act of the president to which exception was made was in conformity with the spirit of our free institutions and the language of our constitution and laws; and that, whether it was or not, the senate of 1834 had no authority to pass judgment upon it: what right has the senate of 1837, a component part of another congress, to pronounce judgment upon its predecessor? How can you who venture to impute to those who have gone before you an unconstitutional proceeding escape a similar imputation? What part of the constitution communicates to you any authority to arraign and try your predecessors? In what article is contained your power to expunge what they have done? And may not the precedent lead to a perpetual code of defacement and restoration of the transactions of the senate as consigned to the public records?

Are you not only destitute of all authority, but positively forbidden to do what the expunging resolution proposes? The injunction of the constitution to keep a journal of our proceedings is clear, express and emphatic. It is free from ambiguity: no sophistry can pervert the explicit language of the instrument; no artful device can elude the force of the obligation which it imposes. If it were possible to make more manifest the duty which it requires to be performed, that was done by the able and eloquent speeches, at the last session, of the senators from Virginia and Louisiana, (Messrs. Leigh and Porter), and at this of my colleague. I shall not repeat the argument. But I would ask, if there were no constitutional requirement to keep a journal, what constitutional right has the senate of this congress to pass in judgment upon the senate of another congress, and to expunge from its journal a deliberate act there recorded? Can an unconstitutional act of that senate, supposing it to be so, justify you in performing another unconstitutional act?

But in lieu of any argument upon the point from me, I beg leave to cite for the consideration of the senate two precedents: one drawn from the reign of the most despotic monarch in modern Europe, under the most despotic minister that ever bore sway over any people; and the other from the purest fountain of democracy in this country. I quote from the interesting life of the cardinal Richelieu, written by that most admirable and popular author, Mr. James. The duke of Orleans, the brother of Louis the 13th, had been goaded into rebellion by the wary Richelieu. The king issued a decree declaring all the supporters of the duke guilty of high treason, and a copy of it was despatched to the parliament at Paris, with an order to register it at once. The parliament demurred, and proceeded to what was called an arret de portage. "Richelieu, however, could bear no contradiction in the course which he had laid down for himself;" [how strong a resemblance does that feature of his character bear to one of an illustrious individual whom I will not further describe!] "and hurrying back to Paris with the king, he sent in the monarch's name, a command for the members of the parliament to present themselves at the Louvre in a body and on foot. He was obeyed immediately; and the king receiving them with great haughtiness, the keeper of the seals made them a speech, in which he declared that they had no authority to deliberate upon affairs of state; that the business of private individuals they might discuss, but that the will of the monarch in other matters they were alone called upon to register. The king then tore with his own hands the page of the register on which the arret de portage had been inscribed, and punished with suspension from their functions several of the members of the various courts composing the parliament of Paris." How repeated acts of the exercise of arbitrary power are likely to subdue the spirit of liberty, and to render callous the public sensibility and the fate which awaits us, if we had not been recently unhappily taught in this country, we may learn from the same author. "The finances of the state were exhausted, new impositions were devised, and a number of new offices created and sold. Against the last named abuse the parliament ventured to remonstrate; but the government of the cardinal had for its first principle despotism, and the refractory members were punished, some with exile, some with suspension of their functions. All were forced to comply with his will; and the parliament, unable to resist, yielded, step by step, to his exactions."

The other precedent is supplied by the archives of the democracy of Pennsylvania in 1816, when it was genuine and unmixed with any other ingredient.

The provisions of the constitution of the United States and of Pennsylvania, in regard to the obligation to keep a journal, are substantially the same. That of the United States requires that "each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, except such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members of either house on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of the members present, be entered on the journal." And that of Pennsylvania is, "each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and publish them weekly, except such parts as require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members, on any question shall, at the desire of any two of them, be entered on the journals." Whatever inviolability, therefore, is attached to a journal, kept in conformity with the one constitution, must be equally stamped on that kept under the other. On the 10th of February, 1816, in the house of representatives of Pennsylvania, "the speaker informed the house that a constitutional question being involved in a decision by him yesterday, on a motion to expunge certain proceedings from the journal, he was desirous of having the opinion of the house on that decision, viz. that a majority can expunge from the journal any proceedings in which the yeas and nays have not been called." Whereupon Mr. Holgate and Mr. Smith appealed from said decision; and on the question, is the speaker right in his decision? the members present voted as follows: yeas three, nays seventy-eight. Among the latter are to be found the two senators now representing in this body the state of Pennsylvania. On the same day a motion was made by one of them (Mr. Buchanan) and Mr. Kelly, and read as follows: "Resolved, That in the opinion of this house no part of the journals of the house can be expunged even by unanimous consent."

The senate observes that the question arose in a case where the yeas and nays had not been called. Even in such a case there were but four members out of eighty-two that thought it was competent to the house to expunge. Had the yeas and nays been called and recorded, as they were on the resolution of March, 1834, there would not have been a solitary vote in the house of representatives of Pennsylvania in support of the power of expunging.—And if you can expunge the resolution, why may you not expunge also the recorded yeas and nays attached to it?

But if the matter of expunction be contrary to the truth of the case, reproachful for its base subserviency, derogatory from the just and necessary powers of the senate, and repugnant to the constitution of the United States, the manner in which it is proposed to accomplish this dark deed is also highly exceptionable. The expunging resolution, which is to blot out or enshroud the four or five lines in which the resolution of 1834 stands recorded, or rather the recitals by which it is preceded, are spun out into a thread of enormous length. It runs, whereas, and whereas, and whereas, and whereas, and whereas, &c. into a formidable array of nine several whereases. One who should have the courage to begin to read them, unaware of what was to be their termination, would think that at the end of such a tremendous display he must find the very devil. It is like a kite or a comet, except that the order of nature is inverted, and the tail, instead of being behind, is before the body to which it is appended.

I shall not trespass on the senate by inquiring into the truth of all the assertions of fact and of principle contained in these recitals. It would not be difficult to expose them all, and to show that not one of them has more than a colorable foundation. It is asserted by one of them that the president was put upon his trial, and condemned, unheard, by the senate in 1834. Was that true? Was it a trial?—Can the majority now assert, upon their oaths, and in their consciences, that there was any trial or condemnation? During the warmth of debate, senators might endeavor to persuade themselves and the public that the proceeding of 1834 was, in its effects and consequences, a trial, and would be a condemnation of the president; but now, after the lapse of near three years, when the excitement arising from an animated discussion has passed away, it is marvellous that any one should be prepared to assert that an expression of the opinion of the senate upon the character of an executive act was an arraignment, trial and conviction of the president of the United States!

Another fact, asserted in one of those recitals, is, that the resolution of 1834, in either of the forms in which it was originally presented or subsequently modified prior to the final shape which it assumed when adopted, would have been rejected by a majority of the senate. What evidence is there in support of this assertion? None. It is, I verily believe directly contrary to the fact. In either of the modifications of the resolution, I have not a doubt that it would have passed! They were all made in that spirit of accommodation by which the mover of the resolution has ever regulated his conduct as a member of a deliberative body. In not one single instance did he understand from any senator at whose request he made the modification, that, without it, he would vote against the resolution. How, then can even the senators, who were of the minority of 1834, undertake to make the assertion in question? How can the new senators, who have come here since, pledge themselves to the fact asserted in the recital of which they could not have had any conscience? But all the members of the majority—the veterans and the raw recruits—the six years men and the six weeks men—are required to concur in this most unfounded assertion, as I believe it to be. I submit it to one of the latter (looking towards Mr. Dana, from Maine, here by a temporary appointment from the executive), whether, instead of inundating the senate with a torrent of fulsome and revolting adulation poured on the president, it would not be wiser and more patriotic to illustrate the brief period of his senatorial existence by some great measure fraught with general benefit to the whole union? Or, if he will not or cannot elevate himself to a view of the interest of the entire country, whether he had not better dedicate his time to an investigation into the causes of an alien jurisdiction being still exercised over a large part of the territory of the state which he represents? And why the American carrying-trade to the British colonies, in which his state was so deeply interested, has been lost by a most improvident and bungling arrangement?

Mr. President, what patriotic purpose is to be accomplished by this expunging resolution? What new honor or fresh laurels will it win for our common country? Is the power of the senate so vast that it ought to be circumscribed, and that of the president so restricted that it ought to be extended? What power has the senate? None separately. It can only act jointly with the other house, or jointly with the executive. And although the theory of the constitution supposes, when consulted by him, it may freely give an affirmative or negative response, according to the practice, as it now exists, it has lost the faculty of pronouncing the negative monosyllable. When the senate expresses its deliberate judgment, in the form of resolution, that resolution has no compulsory force, but appeals only to the dispassionate intelligence, the calm reason, and the sober judgment of the community. The senate has no army, no navy, no patronage, no lucrative offices, nor glittering honors to bestow. Around us there is no swarm of greedy expectants, rendering us homage, anticipating our wishes, and ready to execute our commands.

How is it with the president? Is he powerless? He is felt from one extremity to the other of this vast republic. By means of principles which he has introduced, and innovations which he has made in our institutions, alas! but too much countenanced by congress and a confiding people, he exercises uncontrolled the power of the state. In one hand he holds the purse, and in the other brandishes the sword of the country. Myriads of dependants and partisans, scattered over the land, are ever ready to sing hosannas to him, and to laud to the skies whatever he does. He has swept over the government, during the last eight years, like a tropical tornado. Every department exhibits traces of the ravages of the storm. Take, as one example, the bank of the United States. No institution could have been more popular with the people, with congress, and with state legislatures. None ever better fulfilled the great purposes of its establishment. But it unfortunately incurred the displeasure of the president; he spoke, and the bank lies prostrate. And those who were loudest in its praise are now loudest in its condemnation. What object of his ambition is unsatisfied? When disabled from age any longer to hold the sceptre of power, he designates his successor, and transmits it to his favorite! What more does he want? Must we blot, deface and mutilate the records of the country to punish the presumptuousness of expressing an opinion contrary to his own.

What patriotic purpose is to be accomplished by this expunging resolution? Can you make that not to be which has been? Can you eradicate from memory and from history the fact that in March, 1834, a majority of the senate of the United States passed the resolution which excites your enmity? Is it your vain and wicked object to arrogate to yourselves that power of annihilating the past which has been denied to Omnipotence itself? Do you intend to thrust your hands into our hearts and to pluck out the deeply-rooted convictions which are there? Or is it your design merely to stigmatize us? YOU cannot stigmatize US.

Ne'er yet did base dishonor blur our name.

Standing securely upon our conscious rectitude, and bearing aloft the shield of the constitution of our country, your puny efforts are impotent, and we defy all your power. Put the majority of 1834 in one scale, and that by which this expunging resolution is to be carried in the other, and let truth and justice, in heaven above, and on earth below, and liberty and patriotism, decide the preponderance.

What patriotic purpose is to be accomplished by this expunging resolution? Is it to appease the wrath and to heal the wounded pride of the chief magistrate? If he be really the hero that his friends represent him he must despise all mean condescension, all grovelling sycophancy, all self-degradation and self-abasement. He would reject, with scorn and contempt as unworthy of his fame, your black scratches and your baby lines in the fair records of his country. Black lines! Black lines! Sir, I hope the secretary of the senate will preserve the pen with which he may inscribe them, and present it to that senator of the majority whom he may select, as a proud trophy, to be transmitted to his descendants. And hereafter, when we shall lose the forms of our free institutions, all that now remain to us, some future American monarch, in gratitude to those by whose means he has been enabled, upon the ruins of civil liberty, to erect a throne, and to commemorate especially this expunging resolution, may institute a new order of knighthood, and confer on it the appropriate name of the knight of the black lines.

But why should I detain the senate or needlessly waste my breath in fruitless exertions. The decree has gone forth. It is one of urgency, too. The deed is to be done—that foul deed which like the blood-stained hands of the guilty Macbeth, all ocean's waters will never wash out. Proceed, then, to the noble work which lies before you, and, like other skilful executioners, do it quickly. And when you have perpetrated it go home to the people, and tell them what glorious honors you have achieved for our common country. Tell them that you have extinguished one of the brightest and purest lights that ever burnt at the altar of civil liberty. Tell them that you have silenced one of the noblest batteries that ever thundered in defence of the constitution, and bravely spiked the cannon. Tell them that, henceforward, no matter what daring or outrageous act any president may perform, you have forever hermetically sealed the mouth of the senate. Tell them that he may fearlessly assume what power he pleases, snatch from its lawful custody the public purse, command a military detachment to enter the halls of the capitol, overawe congress, trample down the constitution, and raze every bulwark of freedom; but that the senate must stand mute, in silent submission, and not dare to raise its opposing voice. That it must wait until a house of representatives, humbled and subdued like itself, and a majority of it composed of the partisans of the president, shall prefer articles of impeachment. Tell them, finally, that you have restored the glorious doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance and, if the people do not pour out their indignation and imprecations, I have yet to learn the character of American freemen.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

DOCUMENTS ACCOMPANYING THE MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE U. STATES, TRANSMITTED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES ON THE 26TH JANUARY.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Ellis.

Department of state, Washington, July 26, 1836.

SIR: The enclosed copies of letters to this department from Mr. Coleman, the acting consul of the United States at Tabasco, will inform you of the outrageous conduct of the authorities there with regard to the officers, crew and cargo of the schooner Northampton, wrecked on the Mexican coast in that quarter, and in relation to the acting consul himself.

The accumulation of causes for complaint on the part of our citizens against the Mexican government, the frequency of their occurrence of late, and, so far as appears from the correspondence of your predecessors, the indisposition of that government to inquire into them, to grant satisfaction for them, or to take proper steps to prevent their recurrence, have by no means tended to strengthen the spirit of forbearance with which the president has hitherto acted towards Mexico; entertaining, as he does, a sincere sympathy for her domestic troubles, and a hearty desire to preserve and cultivate the relations of peace, friendship and good neighborhood with her government and people. He is satisfied, however, that further delay in the acknowledgment, if not in the redress, of the injuries complained of, cannot be acquiesced in, compatibly with the dignity, rights and interests of the United States. He therefore directs, that in presenting to the notice of that government the case of the Northampton, you will make a fresh appeal to its sense of honor and justice in relation to our claims generally; and, to show that the president's estimate of the grievances suffered by our citizens resorting to Mexico, especially since the conclusion of the treaty, is not exaggerated, your note will refer to the following cases, in which the interposition of this government has been asked for since the 5th of April, 1832, and all of which either you or your predecessor has heretofore been instructed to bring to the notice of the Mexican government.

On the 31st of December, 1831, an alcalde of Menoitlan, in the colony of Guazacualco, instituted what is said to have been an illegal, arbitrary and oppressive proceeding against doctor Baldwin, a citizen of the United States, under color of a suit at law, preferred and carried on by a creature of the alcalde himself. Baldwin appeared before the alcalde to answer the charge; an altercation ensued; and the alcalde ordered him to the stocks, which Baldwin refusing to submit to, attempted to escape, and was pursued by a party of soldiers, who attended the court. In the race, Baldwin fell, received an injury in one of his legs, was captured, carried back into the presence of the alcalde, placed in the stocks, and afterwards imprisoned.

In February, 1832, the schooner Topaz, of Bangor, Maine, was employed by the Mexican government to carry troops from Matamoras to Galveston bay. The master and mate were murdered by the soldiers on the passage, the crew imprisoned, and the vessel seized and converted to the Mexican service.

On the 21st June, 1832, the American schooner Brazoria was seized in the port of Brazoria, by John Austin, the Mexican military commandant in that quarter, and employed to make an attack upon Anahuac, then in possession of insurgents. During the attack, she was injured so as to be made unseaworthy, and was abandoned as a total loss, for which the underwriters have received no compensation.

In the summer of 1832, the steamboat Hidalgo and schooner Consolation, belonging to Aaron Leggett, of New York, were forcibly taken possession of by Mexican officers at Tabasco, and used by them. The brig John, belonging to Leggett, was also detained, and money was extorted from him. The consequences resulting from these acts are represented to have been ruinous to the sufferer, and the Mexican government is clearly bound by the treaty to indemnify him for them.

In March, 1834, capt. McCeige, of the schooner Industry, of Mobile, was imprisoned at Tabasco, and an exorbitant fine demanded of him without cause. The payment of the fine being made the only condition upon which he could be allowed to depart, he abandoned his vessel and her cargo to the authorities, who afterwards sold them.

In the summer of 1834, the brig Paragon, of New York, was causelessly fired into on her way to Vera Cruz by the Mexican public armed schooner Tampico. In answer to an official representation on the subject by Mr. Butler, that government promised that the affair should be inquired into; but this department is not informed that the promise has been fulfilled.

In the beginning of May, last year, the answer of officers supposed to belong to the custom house, who boarded the brig Ophir, of New York, on her arrival at Campeachy, to an inquiry of the captain as to which of the ship's papers it would be necessary to present at the custom house, was accidentally, or intentionally, misinterpreted. In consequence of this, notwithstanding all the papers were shown to the boarding officers, the invoices only being exhibited at the custom house, the vessel was seized and condemned.

In May, 1835, also, the schooner Martha, from New Orleans, was seized at Galveston bay by the Mexican armed schooner Montezuma for an alleged non-compliance with some of the formalities of their revenue laws. Four of the passengers of the Martha were put in irons under the hatches of the Montezuma, and otherwise treated with great barbarity, merely for an imputed intention to use their fire arms against a guard that had been placed on board the Martha.

In November, 1835, the schooner Hannah and Elizabeth, of New Orleans, was stranded in attempting to enter Matagorda bay. While in this condition, she was fired into by the Mexican armed schooner Bravo, boarded by twenty armed soldiers under the command of two officers, who forcibly took the master, crew and passengers from the wreck, pillaged them of most of their clothes, and chained them in the hold of the Bravo until their arrival at Matamoras, where they were continued in confinement; but through the urgent representations of our consul there, all but the captain were eventually released. It is not known to the department that he has yet been liberated, or that any satisfaction has been offered by the Mexican government.

On the 17th of February last, William Hallett and Zalmon Hull, citizens of the United States, were arrested in the streets of Matamoras by a party of armed soldiers, who struck Hull in the face with a sword, and forcibly took both to the principal barrack in that city, where they were confined upon suspicion of being about to proceed to Texas. Shortly afterwards sentinels were placed at the doors of the consul's residence, under false pretences, and all communication with the house prohibited. Armed soldiers broke open his gate during his absence, forcibly took a mare and two mules belonging to him, entered his house with drawn swords, and searched every room in it, for the avowed object of finding the consul. Hallett and Hull have been released, but the department is not aware that any reparation has been made for the proceedings against them, or for the insult to the consul.

In February last, an attempt was made at the city of Mexico to take from Mr. W. A. Slacum, protected by a courier's passport from this department, public despatches of this government, addressed to Mr. Butler. The attempt failed, but Mr. Slacum was fined and detained for carrying official letters on his person, authenticated by the endorsement of this department, and directed to the charge d'affaires of the United States in Mexico.

In March last, the schooner Eclipse was detained at Tabasco, and her master and crew maltreated by the authorities.

In April last, the brig Jane, schooner Compeer, and other merchant vessels of the United States, were forcibly detained at Matamoras.

You will also notify the Mexican government that it is expected any damage which may have been sustained by citizens of the United States, in consequence of the recent embargo at Vera Cruz, Tampico and other Mexican ports on the gulf, will be repaired, pursuant to the stipulation in the treaty. The papers now sent, show that the military commandant of Tampico, has made the embargo a pretext for interrupting or obstructing the correspondence between the commander of the United States revenue cutter Jefferson and our consul there. For these acts, proper satisfaction will likewise be expected. The outrages and indignities committed against consuls and other officers of the United States, though not more unjust nor attended with circumstances of greater hardship than those done to individual citizens, are nevertheless to be considered as greater violations of the rights of the United States, and to be represented accordingly.

Though the department is not in possession of proof of all the circumstances of the wrongs done in the above cases, as represented by the aggrieved parties, yet the complaints are such as to entitle them to be listened to, and to justify a demand on the Mexican government that they shall be promptly and properly examined, and that suitable redress shall be afforded. You will, therefore, immediately address a strong but respectful representation to the Mexican government on the subject of these various injuries. You will also remind it of the numerous other complaints which have been made from time to time, and which still remain undressed. You will likewise set forth the great forbearance which the government of the United States has practiced towards Mexico, and the friendly and benevolent motives which have led to it; and you will state that the president, finding that this moderation and forbearance, so far from being appreciated by Mexico, seem only to be met by new injuries, is constrained, by a high sense of duty, to ask of the Mexican government such reparation as these accumulated wrongs may, on examination, be found to require.

If, contrary to the president's hopes, no satisfactory answer shall be given to this just and reasonable demand within three weeks, you will inform the Mexican government that, unless redress is afforded without unnecessary delay, your further residence in Mexico will be useless. If this state of things continue longer, you will give formal notice to the Mexican government that, unless a satisfactory answer shall be given within a fortnight, you are instructed to ask for your passports; and, at the end of that time, if you do not receive such answer, it is the president's direction that you demand your passports, and return to the United States, bringing with you the archives of the legation.

Mr. William A. Weaver, who is sent as a special messenger with this communication, you will detain until you can frame a full report to the department, as to the state of the business of your mission, as well that under the charge of Mr. Butler as that entrusted to you. You will also send by the messenger, on his return, (if they can be prepared within a reasonable time), copies of Mr. Butler's despatches Nos. 14, 23, 52, 53, 54, 58 and 84, the originals of which were never received; and of all his correspondence with the Mexican government and with others, on public business, so far as the records and files in the legation will allow you to do. Mr. Butler was repeatedly instructed to supply these papers, but the instructions have not been complied with. The expense of the transcripts required will be made a separate charge in your accounts, and will be accompanied by proper vouchers. During Mr. Weaver's necessary detention, you will avail yourself of his assistance in making the copies. He has received five hundred dollars on account of his expenses to Mexico. You will furnish him with a like sum to defray his expenses on his return to Washington, for which your draft on the department will be honored. I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.
Powhatan Ellis, esq. charge d'affaires U. S. Mexico.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Ellis.

Department of State, Washington, Dec. 10, 1836.

Sir: Mr. Gorostiza has, upon his own responsibility, terminated his extraordinary mission to the United States. The president will not believe that the Mexican government is under the influence of the obvious prejudices which have distorted and discolored every object seen here in the view of their functionality. The full and frank explanations of his motives and purposes, in the precautionary means taken on the frontiers, should have satisfied that government that nothing could be further from the president's intentions than to injure Mexico in her interests or in her honor. Under this conviction, he trusts that the departure of the extraordinary mission will, in no respect, interrupt the friendly relations between the two governments; and he instructs me to say, that whatever feelings such a step was calculated to produce, it shall not be permitted to diminish his confidence in the amicable disposition of the Mexican government, nor to operate in his mind prejudicially to its interests. Although the president supposes that the Mexican government will have found, in the communications heretofore made by the department to its envoy extraordinary, satisfactory grounds to justify the measure viewed so unfavorably by Mr. Gorostiza, yet his sincere and strong desire to prevent any misunderstanding on the subject, induced him to determine on the departure of that minister, to make such explanations as might prevent the Mexican government from being misled into the adoption of the errors of their minister. Since my return to the seat of government, the great pressure of other public business, and the condition of the president's health, have delayed until now the execution of that purpose.

So soon as the contest in Texas was found to be inevitable, it became the president's duty to consider its probable consequences to the United States, with a view to guard against the injuries it might produce to our citizens, and to the performance of the obligations of the government to a friendly and neighboring power. The more immediate danger was, that the contending parties might, in the struggle, find it necessary or convenient to seek, for advantage or protection, refuge on the territory of the United States; and that, being pursued by their adversaries, our soil might become the battle ground for deciding the contest. Sufficient warning to both was therefore given, that this could not and would not be permitted. Subsequent events rendered any further precautionary steps in that regard unnecessary; but among the stipulations of Mexico and the United States to each other, was found one obliging each party to restrain the Indians within its dominions from all depredations upon the adjoining power. The extent in which this provision was understood by Mexico will be seen by recurring to the complaints made to this government, that some of the Indians on our side had crossed over, without even an allegation of its having been done with any hostile design towards Mexico. Without assenting to the claims of Mexico as to the extent of the obligations of the United States under the treaty stipulation, the president was duly sensible that it required decisive means on his part to prevent the Indians within the United States from entering into the quarrel in Texas. In addition to warning advice given through our Indian agents, the presence of some of our troops was deemed indispensable to enforce, if necessary, the counsel given to them.—The presence of this force was imperatively demanded to prevent evils which might arise from various other causes. The savage tribes prone to war, within reach of the contending parties, were numerous; and, on the Mexican side, known to be under very imperfect control. These warlike tribes, without regard to the combatants, might be tempted to fall upon the frontiers of the United States or Mexico, hoping that their depredations might be imputed to the known parties in the war. One of the combatants, in the event of defeat, or to strengthen himself against the more potent adversary, might solicit, and, it was to be feared, might obtain, the active co-operation of some of the Indian tribes, whose conduct, when once in the field, it would be impracticable to regulate according to the rules of civilized warfare, or to the obligations of their allies—to respect the territory, the persons and property of neutrals. The distance of the scene of operations from the seat of government compelled the chief magistrate to trust the discretionary power of using the troops to the commanding officer; yet, such care was taken in framing the order, given with the authority to act, that the president believed it scarcely possible that cause of just complaint could arise; yet, from extreme caution, and from an anxious desire to prevent the possibility of misconception on the part of Mexico, the steps taken were immediately made known to the minister plenipotentiary of that country, with the most explicit specification of the objects for which, and for which alone, the discretionary power to the commander on the frontier was given. The president did not doubt that, on the actual occurrence of any of the evils anticipated, or on satisfactory evidence of imminent danger of them, the commanding officer of the troops on the frontier had an indisputable right, in defence of the United States, or in protecting Mexican territory, according to the stipulation of the treaty, to occupy any position on either side of the line supposed to divide the two countries, which might be necessary to enable him to perform either of those duties. Yet he deemed it proper, from the peculiar circumstances of the contest in Texas, to limit that discretion by special instructions to move towards the Mexican side only under a state of things which should make that step justifiable in the eyes even of those who were disposed to watch every movement on our part with suspicion and jealousy.

You will perceive that Mr. Gorostiza, in his conference with me, distinctly admitted our right, in the event of hostility to the United States by Mexican Indians, to invade the territory of Texas, either to prevent intended injury or to punish actual depredation. In a note written subsequently, he seeks to avoid the force of that admission, by confounding the principle upon which it obviously rests with the right of making war for a violation of treaty engagement. You will find no difficulty in showing to the Mexican government that it rests upon principles of the law of nations, entirely distinct from those on which war is justified—upon the immutable principles of self-defence—upon the principles which justify decisive measures of precaution to prevent irreparable evil to our own or to a neighboring people. The grossness of the error of placing it on the right of war, as also the folly of relying upon that mode of redress, you can render obvious, by supposing that hostilities were, under present circumstances on the frontier, about to begin. Our fellow citizens, of all ages and classes, to be exposed to massacre, their property to destruction, and the whole frontier to be laid waste by those savages, Mexico was bound to control. Until these evils happen, on Mr. Gorostiza's theory, we have no right to take a position which will enable us to act with effect; and, before we do act, according to our promises under the thirty-third article of the treaty, after the frontier has been desolated, we must demand redress of Mexico—wait for it to be refused—and then make war upon Mexico. We are quietly to suffer injuries we might prevent, in the expectation of redress—redress for irreparable injuries from Mexico, who did not inflict them, but who was, from circumstances, without the power to prevent, as she would be, after they were inflicted, without the power to redress them. To make war upon Mexico for this involuntary failure to comply with her obligations, would be equivalent to an attempt to convert her misfortunes into crimes—her inability into guilt. If these injuries had been committed, and our complaints made to Mexico, what answer could be given to declarations of the Mexican government like these? "We had not the power to prevent the evils of which you complain. Our inability to perform our promises was well known to you. It was your duty, having the means, to prevent these evils. We expected this would be done; and if, unwisely, you have suffered them to be inflicted upon you, while we regret infinitely what has occurred, we can only express our regret, and call upon you to consider that your vengeance should fall not on Mexico or her citizens, but upon the tribes who committed the cruelties on your frontiers, or upon the rebellious people (in Texas) by whom those tribes should have been restrained!" In determining upon the precautions authorised by him to avert evils that could not be repaired, to avoid the mockery of calling upon Mexico for redress for injuries it was out of her power to guard against, and the cruelty of seeking for satisfaction of weakness, which was due only from guilt, the president will not—cannot—believe that Mexico, in the present condition of her affairs, will consider her character or interests in the slightest degree injured; and you will distinctly state to that government, that, until they have a force competent to perform the treaty stipulations near the frontier, he will be compelled to regard every indication of dissatisfaction as founded not upon the principles of national law, but on a groundless suspicion of the intentions of the United States.

I shall send, with this despatch, a copy of the president's message at the opening of congress, from which you will be able to draw additional evidences of the just and amicable intentions of the chief magistrate. The president desires that you should give such explanations to the Mexican government as these instructions will enable you to make; which, if received in the proper and friendly spirit in which they are offered, will, he trusts, remove all ground for doubts and anxieties, if any have been entertained on the subject.

It would be gratifying to the president, if this communication, which you will have to make to the Mexican government, was limited to these explanations. Unfortunately, the conduct of its late minister extraordinary has made it necessary to touch upon even a more unpleasant topic. You will learn with astonishment that Mr. Gorostiza, while enjoying his diplomatic privilege, although after he declared his mission at an end, published, on his own authority, a pamphlet (a copy of which is herewith sent to you) containing parts of his unpublished correspondence with this department, and extracts from his letters to the Mexican secretary of foreign relations, with a long introductory preface. The publication of his correspondence with the department, without the authority of his government, is believed to be unexampled in the history of diplomacy, and was not decorous to the government of the United States. The extracts from his correspondence with his own government, and his introduction to the whole, contain statements and comments defamatory of the government and people of the United States, and obviously intended to injure the character of both, for honor and good faith, in the eyes of the world. This pamphlet, although not circulated generally among our citizens, was in the hands of editors of newspapers, who have published extracts from it; and the president has been informed that two copies of it were sent by its author, at the moment of his departure from the United States, to some, if not to all, the members of the foreign diplomatic body accredited here. This act, still more extraordinary, because it almost immediately followed the communication of the president's intention to direct that explanations, which he believed would be satisfactory, should be made to the Mexican government, has excited but one sentiment among those to whom it is known. In directing you to make known the publication of this pamphlet to the Mexican government, the president does not doubt the truth of the declaration made by its author, that this publication was his own personal act, for which he had no authority from his government; nor will he permit himself to suppose for an instant that it will adopt or sanction conduct so glaringly violating all the decorum of diplomatic usage; so disrespectful to the government and people of the United States; so unworthy the representative of a respectable government; and so well calculated to interrupt the harmony and good will which ought to subsist between the United States and Mexico.

How far the character of the Mexican government for decorum and justice, and an honorable desire to maintain a respectable rank among the civilized nations of the world, require a distinct manifestation of its just displeasure at such an extraordinary step, are questions that belong to itself alone to consider and decide.

In giving you this instruction to make known to the Mexican government the conduct of its envoy, without a demand of reparation at its hands, the president is influenced, as well by the explicit disavowal of the envoy of all participation on the part of his government in the act complained of, as by the sincere conviction, already expressed, that a step so reprehensible will not be countenanced by it.—But if, contrary to all just expectation, the Mexican government shall adopt that act, or give sanction to it, by approving of their minister's conduct, the continuance of diplomatic intercourse between the two countries can no longer be either useful or reputable to the United States. However painful may be the consequences, the honor of the American people requires the president to instruct you, as I now do, in that event, to demand your passports, and to return forthwith, bringing with you all the archives of the legation, to the United States. I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

Powhatan Ellis, esq. charge d'affaires of the U. S.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

February 17. Petitions were presented this day from citizens of Massachusetts, Vermont and New Jersey, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, all of which were not received, the motions to receive them being laid on the table on motions of Mr. Grundy.

Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, presented a memorial from citizens of Pennsylvania protesting against the recognition of the independence of Texas till slavery should be abolished within her limits. Laid on the table.

Several reports, &c. having been delivered, which will be noticed hereafter, various resolutions and unfavorable reports on the table, were considered and adopted.

The resolution offered by Mr. Preston, calling on the president of the United States for a copy of the proceedings of the court of inquiry at Frederick, instituted to inquire into certain charges made against major general Scott, in relation to the Creek war, being before the senate,

Mr. Preston spoke at some length in favor of the resolution. A long debate followed, in which Messrs. Crittenden, Preston, Benton, Cuthbert, Strange and Rives participated. Mr. Strange moved to lay the resolution on the table; negatived by yeas 17, noes 23. On motion of Mr. Rives, the resolution was, in the end, referred to the committee on military affairs: yeas 28, noes not counted.

Mr. Wright gave notice that he should, on Monday next, call up the bill for reducing the tariff on foreign merchandise.

On motion of Mr. Kent, the senate proceeded to the further consideration of the bill for the relief of the executrix of Richard W. Meade. Mr. Clayton addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the bill. A long discussion followed, in which Messrs. Hubbard, Black, Clay, Davis and Walker participated. Mr. Hubbard moved to amend the bill by striking out the second section and inserting a provision that the board constituted by the bill should examine the claim, and report the result to the senate, with the reasons therefor, at the next session of congress. Mr. Black moved to amend this amendment, so that the award of the commissioners, if any, should be paid to the claimant by the secretary of the treasury; and if nothing should be found due to the claimant, the board should then report, &c.

This amendment was adopted by yeas 25, noes 15.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted, and the bill was passed by the following vote, the yeas and noes having been ordered on the call of Mr. Hubbard:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Illinois, Ewing, of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Kent, King, of Georgia, Knight, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Rives, Sevier, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clayton, Dana, Davis, Hendricks, Hubbard, King, of Alabama, Moore, Page, Parker, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Strange, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wright—17.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to remit the duties on certain goods destroyed by fire at the late conflagration in New York. The bill was explained in detail by Mr. Wright, underwent many small amendments, and, together with the amendments, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. The senate then adjourned.

February 18. Mr. Benton presented the credentials of hon. Lewis F. Linn, re-elected a senator of the United States from the state of Missouri, for six years from and after the 4th of March next.

Among the petitions presented were the following:

By Mr. Tipton, praying an alteration in the laws regulating the coasting trade.

By Mr. Linn, from the legislature of Missouri, praying pre-emption rights in certain cases.

Also, from citizens of Wisconsin, praying the improvement of the harbor of Milwaukee.

By Mr. Bayard, from the board of trade of the city of Wilmington; in relation to a port of entry at New Castle.

Several committees were discharged from the consideration of subjects referred to them, and several delivered reports, &c. which will be noticed when before the senate for its final action.

After other business, on motion of Mr. Grundy, the resolution from the committee on the post office and post roads, directing the postmaster general to pay Stockton & Stokes and others to the full amount of the award of the solicitor of the treasury, was taken up and adopted.

The bill to remit the duties on goods destroyed by fire at the late conflagration in New York, was read a third time, passed and sent to the house of representatives for concurrence.

[This bill in its ultimate form, received the unanimous approbation of the senate.]

On motion of Mr. Robbins, the joint resolution authorising the purchase of the manuscripts of the late president Madison, was taken up and considered.

Mr. Robbins spoke at some length in favor of the resolution, and in commendation of Mr. Madison.

Mr. Calhoun said we owed more to Mr. Madison for our institutions, than to any man now living, or that had gone before. His profound exposition of our government, in the celebrated report in the legislature of Virginia, was by far the ablest document which had come from his pen, and from that Mr. C. had obtained a deeper insight into the nature and structure of our government than from any other document. But Mr. C. thought he would honor the memory of that great man far more by opposing this resolution than by supporting it. He would, however, postpone for the present what he intended to say on the subject, on account of the business which was to come before the senate to-day. The resolution, if it should pass, he believed would require no alteration, and, therefore, the debate upon it might be reserved for its third reading. The resolution was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to adjust certain claims to reservations of land under the 14th article of the treaty of 1830, with the Choctaw Indians.

Mr. Black moved to amend the bill by striking out three of its sections, and substituting others in their place, which were read by the secretary in so low a voice as to be quite unintelligible at the reporter's seat.

Mr. Black explained the circumstances of the case, which were in substance these. The Choctaw lands were obtained by the U. S. in virtue of a treaty held at Dancing Rabbit creek. It was not without great difficulty that that treaty was effected; the leading chiefs and the greater part of the nation being strenuously opposed to ceding their lands and removing west of the Mississippi. They actually refused to treat, and left the ground, and the treaty was at last made with a comparatively small number of chiefs; nor could it have been effected at all but for the insertion of an article which provided that such Choctaws as were desirous to remain, and should notify that desire within a given time to the United States' agent, should have lands reserved for them in the following proportion: Every head of a family, one section; for every child over ten years of age, half a section, and for every child under ten years, a quarter of a section. The agent was a man of intemperate and careless habits; and when the Choctaws applied to him, giving notice of their intention to remain on their lands, he in some cases refused to receive the application, and in other cases to record it. Proclamations having been made for the sale of the lands, a number of these Indians, who supposed that they were safe in the possession of their lands, had the land sold from under them. Application was immediately made to the president of the United States, who, on being aware of the hardship of the case, issued an order reserving from sale enough land to make up to these Indians the loss they had sustained, and appointed an agent to locate these floating titles, subject to the subsequent decision of congress. These locations were familiarly known by the title of contingent locations, and were laid down on the very best lands in the state of Mississippi. As soon as it came to be known that this provision was made for the satisfying of the claims of Choctaw Indians whose lands had been improperly sold, those claims became an object of eager speculation. Large speculating companies and sub-companies were formed to take advantage of this state of things. Agents were sent by them across the Mississippi to that portion of the nation which had removed under the treaty, and a large number of claims were collected from among them. All these claims were located on the banks of the Mississippi, or on rich bottoms and islands in the neighborhood of the bayous, and embraced some thousands of sections of the finest land in Mississippi. A bill had been introduced at the last session by the committee on private land claims, the effect of which would be to confirm all these locations, and thus to sanction one of the most stupendous frauds which had been attempted since the days of the famous Yazoo scheme. The object of Mr. Black's amendment was so to alter the bill of the last year (which has not become a law) as to prevent the confirmation of these claims, but, as was understood by the reporter, to provide for their examination, by a board of commissioners, before whom the Choctaws were to prove their claims in person, and which declared all previous sales of their floating rights null and void.

Mr. Black said he was willing to modify his amendment, if it was thought best, so as to allow to the Indians who should make good their rights before the commissioners the amount in money for which their lands were sold.

Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, advocated the amendment, though he considered it as not sufficiently guarded.

Mr. Bayard replied at length, vindicating the bill as reported last year by the committee on private land claims, (to which he belongs). He contended that the bill did no more than fulfil the treaty stipulation to which the faith of the United States had been pledged. The Indians who wished to remain were entitled to the amount of land which that treaty gave them. By the gross and oppressive misconduct of our own agent they had been deprived of these rights, and turned out of house and home, when reposing on the good faith of this government. It was indispensable that somebody should have taken up their cause, and made an effort to get them justice; and it was rather too much to expect that persons who had gone to great trouble and expense for that purpose should be so very disinterested as not to require some share in the land which, but for them, would have been lost entirely. He denied, however, that the bill of the last session went unconditionally to confirm the contingent locations. It appointed a board of commissioners, before whom the rights of the Indians must be substantiated by competent proof, such as would be received at common law, before a court of justice. He disclaimed all desire to encourage speculation, or foster speculators on Indian rights, and he therefore introduced several amendments into the bill, with a view to obviate the evils which Mr. Black had stated; one of which provided that the land to be given to the Indian in exchange for that of which he had been deprived should not greatly exceed it in value. Another of them declared all compacts made by the Indians for the disposal of these claims null and void, and reserved a decision upon them until the next session of congress.

Mr. Walker, in pursuance of instructions from the legislature of Mississippi, strenuously opposed the bill as reported by the committee. He also opposed the amendments proposed by Mr. Bayard, greatly preferring that of his colleague, (Mr. Black); on which he demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. Preston, after a course of general observations on the practical difficulty, and even impossibility of making any arrangement in favor of these Indians which would not immediately be seized upon by the superior sagacity of the whites, and converted to their own advantage, suggested that the best plan of getting rid of the whole difficulty would be to allow the Choctaws, who had been unjustly deprived of their lands, to enter the same quantity in any lands of the United States subject to private entry; not that he had the least idea that they would hold these lands, for he had no doubt that, before a year was passed, they would all be converted into money, which money would all be expended in a drunken frolic. But this would satisfy the claims of justice on the government, and these Choctaws would then be left to follow the destiny of the residue of their tribe, who had gone west of the Mississippi river.

Mr. White thought the most prudent course would be to appoint a board of commissioners to make diligent inquiry into the facts of the case; the number of heads of families; the number of their children over and under ten years of age; the notification of their intention to remain; the lands they had occupied, and the prices at which those lands had sold; and to make a full and accurate return to congress; and let congress decide on the whole case as thus presented.

[The above presents a concise view of the substance of a debate of a protracted and desultory character, which occupied the senate till a late hour.]

The bill was then laid over till Monday.

Mr. Buchanan, from the committee on foreign relations, presented the following report:

The committee on foreign relations, to whom was referred the message of the president of the United States of the 6th instant, with the accompanying documents, on the subject of the present state of relations with Mexico, report:

That they have given to this subject that serious and deliberate consideration which its importance demands, and which any circumstances calculated to interrupt our friendly relations with the Mexican republic would necessarily ensure. From the documents submitted to the committee, it appears that, ever since the revolution of 1822, which separated Mexico from Spain, and even for some years before, the United States have had repeated causes of just complaint against the Mexican authorities. From time to time, as these insults and injuries have occurred, demands for satisfaction and redress have been made by our successive public ministers at the city of Mexico, but almost all these demands have hitherto proved unavailing.

It might have been expected that, after the date of the treaty of amity, commerce and navigation, concluded between the two republics on the fifth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one, these causes of complaint would have ceased to exist. That treaty so clearly defines the rights and the duties of the respective parties, that it seems almost impossible to misunderstand or to mistake them. The committee, notwithstanding, regret to be compelled to state that all the causes of complaint against Mexico, which have been specially noticed in the correspondence referred to them, have occurred since the conclusion of this treaty.

We forbear from entering into any minute detail of our grievances. The enumeration of each individual case, with its attendant circumstances, even if the committee were in possession of sufficient materials to make such a compilation, is rendered unnecessary from the view which they have taken of the subject. These cases are all referred to in the document No. 81, entitled "claims on Mexico," in the letter of instructions from Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Ellis, of the 20th of July, 1836, and in the subsequent correspondence between Mr. Ellis and Mr. Monasterio, the acting Mexican minister of foreign affairs.

If the government of the United States were disposed to exact strict and prompt redress from Mexico, your committee might, with justice, recommend an immediate resort to war or reprisals. On this subject, however, they give their hearty assent to the following sentiments contained in the message of the president. He says, "the length of time since some of the injuries have been committed, the repeated and unavailing applications for redress, the wanton character of some of the outrages upon the property and persons of our citizens, and upon the officers and flag of the United States, independent of recent insults to this government and people by the late extraordinary Mexican minister, would justify, in the eyes of all nations, immediate war. That remedy, however, should not be used by just and generous nations, confiding in their strength, for injuries committed, if it can be honorably avoided; and it has occurred to me that, considering the present embarrassed condition of that country, we should act with both wisdom and moderation, by giving to Mexico one more opportunity to atone for the past, before we take redress into our own hands."

In affording this opportunity to the Mexican government, the committee would suggest the propriety of pursuing the form required by the 34th article of the treaty with Mexico, in all cases to which it may be applicable. This article provides that "if (what indeed cannot be expected) any of the articles contained in the present treaty shall be violated or infringed in any manner whatever, it is stipulated that neither of the contracting parties will order or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor declare war against the other, on complaint of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended, shall first have presented to the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proofs, and demanded justice and satisfaction, and the same shall have been either refused or unreasonably delayed."

After such a demand, should prompt justice be refused by the Mexican government, we may appeal to all nations, not only for the equity and moderation with which we shall have acted towards a sister republic, but for the necessity which will then compel us to seek redress for our wrongs, either by actual war or by reprisals. The subject will then be presented before congress at the commencement of the next session, in a clear and distinct form, and the committee cannot doubt but that such measures will be immediately adopted as may be necessary to vindicate the honor of the country, and ensure ample reparation to our injured fellow citizens. They leave the mode and manner of making this demand to the president of the United States.

Before concluding their report, the committee deem it necessary to submit a few remarks upon the conduct of Mr. Gorostiza, the late envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Mexican republic to the United States. In regard to that functionary, they concur fully in opinion with Mr. Forsyth, that he was under the influence of prejudices which distorted and discolored every object which he saw whilst in this country. On the 15th of October, 1836, he terminated his mission by demanding his passports. And for what reason? Because the president refused to recall the orders which he had issued to the general commanding the forces of the United States in the vicinity of Texas, directing him to pass the frontier, should it be found a necessary measure of self-defence; but prohibiting him from pursuing this course unless the Indians were actually engaged in hostilities against the citizens of the United States, or he had undoubted evidence that such hostilities were intended, and were actually preparing within the Mexican territory.

A civil war was then raging in Texas. The Texian troops occupied positions between the forces of Mexico and the warlike and restless tribes of Indians along the frontiers of the United States. It was manifest that Mexico could not possibly restrain by force these tribes within her limits from hostile incursions upon the inhabitants of the United States, as she had engaged to do by the 33d article of the treaty. No matter how strong may have been her inclination, the ability was entirely wanting. Under such circumstances, what became the duty of the president of the United States? If he entertained reasonable apprehensions that these savages meditated an attack from the Mexican territory against the defenceless citizens along our frontier, was he obliged to order our troops to stand upon the line, and wait until the Indians, who know no rule of warfare but indiscriminate carnage and plunder, should actually invade our territory? To state the proposition is to answer the question. Under such circumstances, our forces had a right, both by the law of nations and the great and universal law of self-defence, to take a position in advance of our frontier, in the country inhabited by these savages, for the purpose of preventing and restraining their incursions.

The Sabine is so distant from Washington, that it became absolutely necessary to intrust this discretionary power to the commanding general. If the president had not issued such orders in advance, all the evils might have been inflicted before the remedy could have been applied; and in that event he would have been justly responsible for the murders and devastation which might have been committed by the Mexican Indians on citizens of the United States.

When these discretionary orders were issued to general Gaines, they were immediately communicated to Mr. Gorostiza, in the most frank and friendly spirit. The fullest explanations of the whole proceeding were made to him, and he was over and over again assured that this occupation of the Mexican territory, should it become necessary, would be of a limited, temporary and purely defensive character, and should continue no longer than the danger existed; that the president solemnly disclaimed any intention of occupying the territory beyond the Sabine with the view of taking possession of it as belonging to the United States; and that this military movement should produce no effect whatever upon the boundary question.

The committee believe that Mr. Gorostiza ought to have been satisfied with these explanations.—But they failed to produce any effect upon his mind. Without instructions from his government, he retired from his mission upon his own responsibility. This was not all. Before he left the U. States he published a pamphlet, containing a portion of his correspondence with our government and with his own, from which latter it appears that, whilst engaged upon the business of his special mission here, he was making charges of bad faith against the United States to the Mexican secretary of foreign relations. The committee will not enlarge upon the glaring impropriety of such conduct. The publication of such a pamphlet by a foreign minister, in the country to which he has been accredited, before taking his departure, can be considered in no other light than as an appeal to the people against the acts of their own government. It was a gross violation of that diplomatic courtesy which ought ever to be observed between independent nations, and deserves the severest condemnation. This act was still more extraordinary when we consider that it almost immediately followed the note of Mr. Dickens to him, of the 20th October, 1836, assuring him that the president would instruct Mr. Ellis to make such explanations to the Mexican government of the conduct of that of the United States as he believed would be satisfactory.

The committee regret to learn, from the note of Mr. Ellis to Mr. Forsyth of the 9th December last, that the Mexican government has publicly approved of the conduct of its minister whilst in the United States. They trust that a returning sense of justice may induce it to reconsider this determination. They are willing to believe that it never could have been made, had that government previously received the promised explanation of the president, contained in the letter of Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Ellis of the 10th December, 1836, which, unfortunately, did not reach Mexico until after the latter had taken his departure. This letter, with the president's message at the commencement of the present session of congress, cannot fail to convince the Mexican government how much they have been misled by the representations of their minister.

After a full consideration of all the circumstances, the committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the senate concur in opinion with the president of the United States that another demand ought to be made for the redress of our grievances from the Mexican government, the mode and manner of which, under the 34th article of the treaty, so far as it may be applicable, are properly confided to his discretion. They cannot doubt, from the justice of our claims, that this demand will result in speedy redress; but should they be disappointed in this reasonable expectation, a state of things will then have occurred which will make it the imperative duty of congress promptly to consider what further measures may be required by the honor of the nation and the rights of our injured fellow citizens.

Ordered, That 2,000 extra copies of the above report be printed.

And then the senate adjourned.

February 20. A memorial was presented by Mr. Clay, from a very large number of persons, who stated themselves to be American authors and friends of literature, calling the attention of congress to the subject of copy-right laws, and expressing an anxious wish that those laws might be so modified as to extend their benefits to foreign authors. Mr. C. further remarked that the evidences in favor of the measure of granting copy-rights to foreign authors were so strong, as not to leave a doubt on any mind of its favorable reception by the country. Under these circumstances, he said, he should call up the bill, granting such rights, as soon as convenient. The memorial was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Prentiss presented the petition of a number of citizens of Sheffield, in Vermont, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia; and moved that it be received, and referred to the committee for the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. Grundy, the motion to receive was ordered to be laid on the table.

Other petitions, &c. were presented by Messrs. Wright, Davis, Bayard, Southard, Tomlinson, Ewing, of Illinois, Robbins and Linn, all of which were referred.

Mr. Wright, from the committee on finance, on a senate resolution of the 5th of January, reported a bill authorising the payment of compensation to agents and the attorneys of agents, under certain treaties with foreign powers allowing indemnities. Read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Wright, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, the bill, recommitted to them, anticipating the payment to claimants of the French and Neapolitan indemnities.

Mr. Southard, from the committee on naval affairs, made an unfavorable report on the message of the president of the United States, and the petition of citizens of Charleston, South Carolina, in relation to the establishment of a navy yard south of Chesapeake bay. The report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed, with the accompanying documents.

Mr. S. also, from the same committee, reported the bill referred to them, for the establishment of a naval academy, with two amendments; which were read.

Mr. White, from the committee on Indian affairs, reported the bill from the house referred to them, making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, and for Indian annuities for the year 1837, with several amendments; which were read; and Mr. W. gave notice that he should call the bill up to-morrow.

Mr. Rives presented the memorial of the university of Virginia, asking a change in the copy-right laws in favor of foreign authors.

The senate proceeded to the consideration (on its third reading) of the following joint resolution:

Resolved, &c. That the joint committee on the library be, and they are hereby, authorised and empowered to contract for and purchase, at the sum of thirty thousand dollars, the manuscripts of the late Mr. Madison, referred to in a letter from Mrs. Madison to the president of the United States, dated fifteenth of November, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, and communicated in his message of the sixth of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, conceding to Mrs. Madison the right to use copies of the said manuscripts in foreign countries as she may think fit.

A long debate ensued on this resolution in which Messrs. Calhoun, Preston, Webster, Niles, Crittenden, Rives and Clay participated.

The question on the passage of the resolution was then decided by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Kent, Linn, Lyon, McKean, Mouton, Norvell, Parker, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Spence, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Wright—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Davis, Hubbard, King, of Alabama, Knight, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Ruggles, Swift, Tipton—14.

So the resolution was passed, and sent to the house of representatives for concurrence.

Mr. Wright, pursuant to notice given on Saturday, moved to take up the bill for the reduction of the tariff. Mr. Bayard pressed for the resumption of the Choctaw land bill, as the unfinished business. The question being taken on Mr. Wright's motion, it was negatived: ayes 13, noes not counted.

The senate then resumed the consideration of the bill for confirming certain contingent locations of land in the state of Mississippi, &c.

The question being on Mr. Black's amendment to strike out certain sections of the bill, as stated in Saturday's report, and substitute others therefor. After some remarks from Mr. White, which he concluded by reading an amendment he intended to move as a substitute for the whole bill, Mr. Black consented to withdraw his amendment. Mr. White thereupon moved his substitute for the whole bill, which proposes a board of commissioners to examine the claim of each Choctaw Indian, and make a particular report of all the facts to congress at its next session. Mr. Bayard moved an amendment to it, which, after a desultory conversation, was withdrawn. Mr. White's substitute was thereupon agreed to, the blanks filled with $3,000 as salary for each commissioner, $2,000 for the district attorney, $1,500 for a clerk, and the bill limited to the 1st of March, 1838. It was then reported to the senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. Tipton endeavored to get up a bill supplementary to the act for the removal of the Indians west of the Mississippi; but the senate refused at this time to consider it, and,

On motion of Mr. Southard, proceeded to take up the calendar, and consider the bills thereon in their respective order.

The following bills were considered as in committee of the whole, reported to the senate, and respectively ordered to a third reading, viz:

A bill to authorise the employment of boys in the naval service. (Briefly explained by Mr. Southard.) A bill in addition to an act entitled an act to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the receivers of public money. A bill for the relief of Tench Ringgold. A bill authorising certain internal improvements in Florida. A bill for the completion of certain internal improvements in Florida. A bill authorising the location of the Gainesville and Narketta rail road, chartered by the states of Alabama and Mississippi, through the public lands. A bill to authorise the Ohio rail road company to locate a rail road through the public lands. A bill for the completion of the improvement of certain rivers and roads in Florida. A bill making appropriation for the completion of certain military roads in Arkansas. (On this bill some debate arose, from attempts by Mr. Norvell and Mr. Moore to attach to it amendments for certain roads in Michigan and Alabama; but the one was withdrawn, and the latter rejected by yeas and nays.)

Mr. Norvell gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill for the construction of a military road in Michigan. Mr. Walker, that he should to-morrow call up for consideration his resolution for recognizing the independence of Texas.

The senate then went into executive business; and afterwards adjourned.

February 21. Mr. Hubbard presented the credentials of the hon. Franklin Pierce, elected United States senator from New Hampshire for six years from the 3d of March next.

Petitions praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia were presented—

By Mr. Davis: From sundry inhabitants of Paxton, Massachusetts, from George Haskell and others, and from Nathaniel Taylor and others. And by Mr. Knight, from inhabitants of Rhode Island.

Which petitions were severally objected to by Mr. Walker, and the question of reception laid on the table, on motion of Mr. Grundy. The petitions thus not being received,

Other petitions were presented by Mr. Webster and Mr. Ewing, of Illinois, all referred.

Mr. Davis presented the memorial of Joshua Jones and others in relation to the evils to be apprehended from the immigration of foreigners, in its present and increasing extent, and praying an investigation of the subject. Laid on the table.

Several committees were discharged from the consideration of business referred to them.

Mr. Lyon, on leave, introduced a bill granting to the state of Michigan five per cent. on all the sales of the public lands within her limits, from January 1st, 1834, to July 1st, 1836. Read twice, and referred.

Mr. Buchanan gave notice that he should, on Tuesday next, call up the report of the committee on foreign relations on the subject of our relations with Mexico.

By Mr. Preston—Resolved, That the secretary of war be authorised to extend the experiments on fire arms authorised to be made by a former resolution of the senate, to such other improvements as may be presented, and as may be thought deserving of such experiments.

By Mr. Tomlinson—Resolved, That the committee on pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reviving the act of May 24th, 1828, to provide for persons who were disabled by known wounds, received in the revolutionary war.

The bills ordered to a third reading on yesterday, were read a third time, passed, and sent to the house of representatives for concurrence.

On the bill making appropriations for certain military roads in Arkansas, the yeas and nays were taken on the call of Mr. King, of Geo. and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Kent, Linn, McKean, Nicholas, Norvell, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Webster, Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Calhoun, King, of Ala. King, of Georgia, Knight, Moore, Morris, Page, Parker, Preston, Rives, Strange, Tomlinson, Wall—15.

Mr. Wright moved to take up the bill reducing the duties on certain imported articles. Mr. Clay said, before voting on this motion, he wished to inquire of the senator whether it was intended that the bill should pass in its present shape, or that protected articles should be stricken from it. He believed the senate generally would agree to a reduction of the duties on all except protected articles. Mr. Wright said it was impossible to answer this question. He merely wished the senate to take up the bill and act upon it, as they should think proper. He had no instructions from the committee, and he was not prepared himself to move to strike out any part of the bill. Mr. Calhoun said he believed there would be no dispute about the reduction of a large proportion of the articles; the others would be indicated by the discussion on the bill. Mr. Walker said he should vote against the motion to take up the bill, because he hoped the senate would take up to-day the subject of recognizing the independence of Texas. Mr. Calhoun preferred to try first the question on Mr. Wright's motion, and, if that should fail, the question on Texas might then be tried. Mr. Wright said if the subject was doubtful in the minds of a majority of the senate, he was not disposed to worry the body. He would regard a refusal to take up the bill now as amounting to a refusal to act upon it at the present session. He would, therefore, ask for the yeas and nays on the question; which were ordered. Mr. Clay said he should certainly vote for taking up the bill now, after what Mr. W. had said, because a bill passed the senate at the last session for reducing the duties on all the articles enumerated in this bill, with three or four exceptions. He wished moreover to know what was the intention of Mr. W. and other senators on this subject, and to ascertain whether they really intended to preserve the general policy of the compromise. Mr. Webster said he considered it as very important that the bill should be taken up. He deemed it the indispensable duty of congress to reduce the tariff so far as it could be done without interfering with protected articles. Mr. Calhoun also urged the importance of taking up the bill now, and hastening its progress. Mr. Buchanan said the legislature of Pennsylvania had instructed him and his colleague on this subject; and although the instructions had not yet arrived, he knew this morning that they had passed, and that they instructed them to vote against any reduction of the tariff as it was established in March, 1833, on the principle that to touch this subject at all might endanger their interests. Mr. B. confessed, though he held the opinions of the legislature in high respect, that, had it not been for these instructions, he should have voted to take off the duties entirely, so far as it would not interfere with protection, and would not violate the compromise act; and he would have done it on the principle of throwing useless lumber overboard for the purpose of saving the valuable part of the cargo. But he now felt bound to act according to his instructions, and would certainly bow to them with the utmost deference and respect.

Mr. Clay said he hardly thought the legislature of Pennsylvania had gone so far as the senator supposed. The compromise act had expressly provided that, if there should be any deficiency in the revenue, it should be made up by increasing the duty on articles below 20 per cent. and, on the other hand, if there should be an excess of revenue, it should be remedied by a reduction on articles below 20 per cent. so that, with the exception of three or four articles, this bill was in entire accordance with the compromise act. And, so far from injuring the manufacturing interest, Mr. C. believed it would be beneficial to it. They therefore ought not to hesitate to take up the bill, and pass those parts of it which would not interfere with protection. Mr. Buchanan said he was very much indebted to the gentleman for his commentary on Mr. B.'s instructions. But, under his favor, he would construe them for himself. (Mr. B. here read the instructions, which were clear, explicit and imperative.)

The question on taking up the bill was now tried, and carried in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing, of Ill. Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King, of Ala. King, of Geo. Knight, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Norvell, Page, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Southard, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Webster, Wright—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Kent, McKean, Robbins, Sevier, Spence, Tipton—7.

The senate, on motion of Mr. Wright, took up the bill to reduce the tariff.

Mr. Wright laid before the senate a letter from Ellicott & Co. on the subject of the manufacture of chemicals, the small amount of duty that would be reduced, and the great injury inflicted on our own establishments by making free of duty the articles of aquafortis, muriatic acid, bichromate of potash, chromate of potash, prussiate of potash, tartaric acid, Prussian blue, calomel, sulphate of magnesia, sulphate of quinine, Rochelle salts, and tartar emetic.

Mr. Webster, after a few brief remarks on the impropriety of taking off the duty on these articles without further information, moved to strike them out of the bill. [The bill proposes to admit them free of duty.]

Mr. Sevier wished to except the articles of calomel, quinine and salts, as being the only ones in which his constituents had an interest; they took large quantities of them.

After a short debate, in which Messrs. Knight, Kent, Davis, Linn, Clay, Buchanan, Sevier and Calhoun took part, the question was put on striking out the residue of these articles, with the exception of calomel, salts and quinine, and agreed to.

The question being put separately on striking out these, (i. e. retaining the present duty upon them), it was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Buchanan, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Illinois, Kent, Knight, McKean, Norvell, Prentiss, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, King, of Alabama, King, of Ga., Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Parker, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Spence, Strange, Tipton, Walker, Wright—24.

So they were retained in the bill as free of duty.

Mr. Davis moved to strike out the words "worsted yarn." A debate ensued, in which Messrs. Dana, Cuthbert, Preston, Wright and Grundy took part: when the motion prevailed—yeas 23, noes not counted. So worsted yarn was stricken from the bill, and the duty upon it retained.

Mr. Davis moved to strike out the article of "olive oil;" and after a debate in which Messrs. Davis, Niles, Wright, and Cuthbert participated, the motion was negatived—yeas 15, noes 19. So olive oil was left free of duty.

Mr. Wall moved to strike out "China, porcelain, and earthen and stone ware;" and after a debate, in which Messrs. Wall, Calhoun, Buchanan, Webster, Cuthbert, and Clay took part, Mr. Norvell demanded the yeas and nays, in order that, as this might be considered a test question, whether the senate would or would not interfere with the compromise, the opinions of senators might be ascertained. They were ordered accordingly, and stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, McKean, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Hubbard, King, of Alabama, Linn, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Walker, Wright—20.

So the article was stricken out, the duty retained, and the principle laid down in the compromise act complied with.

Mr. Davis next moved to strike out the article of "common salt." On this motion a prolonged debate ensued of great interest and animation, in which Messrs. Benton, Wright, and Preston, each occupied the floor at considerable length, and in which, not merely the immediate question of the duty on salt, but the general bearings of the bill, particularly in its relation to the compromise act of 1833, were discussed.

Mr. Davis obtained the floor, and was about to address the senate, when on motion of Mr. Webster, the senate, at half past five o'clock, adjourned.

February 22. After several petitions had been presented and referred, and several bills reported and ordered to a second reading,

On motion of Mr. White, the senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the Indian department for 1837.

Mr. White explained, at some length, the various provisions of the bill, and the several amendments to the bill proposed by the committee were considered and adopted.

Messrs. Sevier, Linn, Calhoun and Tipton participated in a discussion, chiefly relating to the removal and location of the Indians; the most of which was rendered totally unintelligible to the reporter by the noise and lowness of speaking.

On motion of Mr. White, the bill was amended so as to authorise the removal of the Indians to the west of the Mississippi, generally, instead of south west of the Arkansas.

The bill having been still further amended, on motions of Messrs. Sevier and White, was ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. Davis, the bill for reducing the tariff was postponed, and made the special order for to-morrow. And

The bill authorising the public vessels to be employed on our coast as relief-vessels, in the winter season, was considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. Davis, the bill making Jersey City a port of entry, and for other purposes, was considered as in committee of the whole, and amendments offered by Messrs. Davis and Walker were ordered to be printed with the bill; when, on motion of Mr. Tallmadge, the senate adjourned at half past one o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Feb. 17. On motion of Mr. Patton, the rule of the house was suspended for the purpose of taking up, on its first and second reading, the bill from the senate entitled "an act supplementary to the act entitled an act to amend the judicial system of the United States."

On motion of Mr. Gholson, the bill having been read twice, was referred to the committee on the judiciary.

On motion of Mr. Grennell, the bill from the senate providing for the compensation of the volunteers from Tennessee and other western states, was read twice by its title, and referred to the committee of claims.

The speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of state, transmitting statements showing the number and designation of the passengers who have arrived from foreign countries into each collection district of the United States, and in each quarter during the year 1836, according to returns made to the secretary of state, pursuant to the act of 2d March, 1819, regulating passenger ships and vessels.

On motion of Mr. Sutherland, the same was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

R. M. Whitney accused of a contempt of this house having been placed at the bar, the examination of witnesses was resumed.

Saturday, Feb. 18. By unanimous consent, Mr. Jenifer, from the select committee to which was referred the memorial of the tobacco planters, and the resolutions of the general assembly of the state of Maryland, upon the subject of high rates of duty and restrictions imposed by foreign governments upon American tobacco, reported the following joint resolution; which read the first and second time, viz:

Resolved, &c. That the president be requested to instruct the ministers and other representatives of this country in France, England, Russia, Prussia, Holland and Germany, to negotiate with the respective governments by which they are accredited for a modification of the duties and restrictions upon tobacco imported from the United States, and that he be also requested to appoint special agents to negotiate in like manner with the governments of those countries into which tobacco is imported under similar restrictions, that have no accredited representatives from the United States.

[This resolution was accompanied by an able report, going fully into the subject, which we shall publish hereafter.]

By unanimous consent, Mr. Howard, from the committee on foreign affairs, to whom the president's message and sundry memorials in relation to Texas were referred, reported the following resolutions, which were read and laid upon the table, viz:

Resolved by the house of representatives of the United States, That the independence of the government of Texas ought to be recognized.

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be directed to provide in the bill for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government, a salary and outfit for such public agent as the president may determine to send to Texas.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of war ad interim, enclosing a communication from the officer in charge of the topographical bureau, from which it will be seen that, for the reason therein stated, it has not been, and will not be, during the present session of congress, in the power of this department to comply with the resolutions of the house of representatives of 21st of March and 11th of April last, requiring charts of the harbors of Princeton, Nantucket, Great Point and Holmes' Hole. Ordered to lie on the table.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of war ad interim, enclosing a report and plan for the improvement of the harbor of White Hall, New York, required by a resolution of the house of representatives of the 18th inst. Ordered to lie on the table.

Reuben M. Whitney, charged with a contempt of the delegated authority of the house, in refusing to appear before the select committee of which the hon. Henry A. Wise is chairman, was again brought to the bar of the house. The examination of witnesses was resumed, and the house was occupied therein until ten o'clock, at which hour the house adjourned.

[It is understood that there is yet other testimony to be given.]

Monday, Feb. 20. An ineffectual motion was made by Mr. Shields to dispense with the reading of so much of the journal of Saturday as contained the record of testimony given on that day in the case of Reuben M. Whitney.

The journal having been read, On motion of Mr. Gholson, of Mississippi, Reuben M. Whitney charged with a contempt of the delegated authority of this house, in refusing to appear before the select committee, of which the hon. Henry A. Wise is chairman, in obedience to a summons issued for that purpose, was again brought to the bar of the house.

The examination of witnesses was resumed, and continued, with a good deal of intermediate debate on the course of examination.

At a late hour, a resolution was offered by Mr. Lane to discharge R. M. Whitney from custody; which (debate having been cut off by the previous question) was adopted—yeas 102, nays 70.

And R. M. Whitney was thereupon discharged.

Tuesday, Feb. 21. Mr. Pickens moved to amend the journal so as to state thereon that Mr. Gholson, of Mississippi, chairman of the committee appointed on the part of the house to conduct the examination in the case of Reuben M. Whitney, stated, before the vote of last evening to discharge Whitney, that he had propounded fourteen questions to another witness, which were in the progress of being answered. [This statement, Mr. P. said, was made just after Mr. Lane handed in his resolution providing for the discharge of R. M. Whitney.]

The speaker said it had not been usual to make such entries on the journal, which was a record of proceedings, simply, and not at all a register of debates.

After a few remarks from Messrs. Pickens, Cushing, and G. Lee, the proposed amendment was disagreed to.

By general consent, Mr. Adams presented a letter from the governor of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, in relation to the claim of that state on the government; which was referred to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Adams asked leave to present certain petitions; which being objected to, Mr. A. moved to suspend the rule until 2 o'clock for the purpose of calling for petitions in the order of states and territories. Mr. A. remarked that he had in his possession one hundred and forty-one petitions and memorials, which he desired to present; and asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rule for that purpose, which the house refused; and the question being taken, the rule was not suspended.

Several ineffectual motions were made to suspend the rule for the introduction of resolutions, &c.

The unfinished business was the report heretofore made by Mr. Howard, from the committee on foreign affairs, in relation to Texas, and which is composed of the two following resolutions:

Resolved by the house of representatives of the United States, That the independence of the government of Texas ought to be recognized.

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be directed to provide in the bill for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government, a salary and outfit for such public agent as the president may determine to send to Texas.

Mr. Howard said he thought it would not be courteous to the other committees of the house to press these resolutions at this time, to the exclusion of all reports from other committees, who had been prevented for the last ten days from making them. As the house had been kind enough to allow him, by unanimous consent, to introduce this report at an unusual hour, he was not inclined to press it this morning. He would inquire from the chair whether, if he submitted a motion to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Thursday morning, for the purpose indicated, the resolutions would come up in anticipation of all other business?

This motion gave rise to a long and desultory debate, which resulted in laying the whole subject on the table—yeas 99, nays 86. Mr. Williams moved to reconsider the vote—when Mr. A. Mann moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, which was decided in the affirmative, yeas 106, nays 90.

The speaker said it would not be in order to submit the motion to-day, but that it would be to-morrow.

Mr. Lewis said he hoped the friends of Texas would adopt that course.

The speaker presented a message from the president of the United States, transmitting a report from the secretary of state, and accompanying documents on the subject of our relations with Peru.

On motion of Mr. Adams, the message and documents were referred to the same committee of the whole to which had been referred the bill for the relief of William Tudor; and were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Peyton asked the consent of the house to submit a resolution that the house issue a subpoena, signed by the speaker, to Reuben M. Whitney, requiring him to appear before the committee to answer certain interrogatories which he sent to the chair. [These interrogatories are directed to the fact of the authorship of an anonymous letter accompanying Reuben M. Whitney's letter to the president of the bank of Burlington, Vermont, and which said letter Mr. W. referred to as coming from an individual high in the confidence of the executive.]

Mr. P. said that the committee, by a majority of one, had refused to summon Reuben M. Whitney, because they doubted their power to do so; for this reason he had made application to the house. Objections having been made, Mr. P. moved a suspension of the rule, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and were—yeas 86, nays 97. So the rule was not suspended.

Mr. Peyton then moved a suspension of the rule to enable him to offer a resolution that a subpoena be issued to require Reuben M. Whitney to appear at the bar of the house to answer the said interrogatory. Mr. P. asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and were—yeas 76, nays 102. So the rule was not suspended.

The remainder of this day's session was occupied in considering the navy appropriation bill in committee of the whole.

Wednesday, Feb. 22. A large number of reports were made this day, principally by the committee on claims, all of which, calling for the action of the house, will be duly noticed when before it.

Mr. D. J. Pearce, from the committee on commerce, reported a bill declaring the assent of congress to an act of the state of North Carolina for the relief of sick and disabled American seamen.

The bill having been read twice, Mr. D. J. Pearce, moved that it be engrossed for a third reading.

After some remarks from Messrs. Parker, D. J. Pearce, McKay, Reed and Cambreleng, the said bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. McKeon, Ordered, That the committee on commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution directing the committee to inquire into the expediency of regulating the pilots in the several ports of the United States. The committee reported at length upon the same; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Jarvis, from the committee on naval affairs, upon the resolution of the state of New Jersey, relative to a dry dock, reported the following resolution, which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the secretary of the navy be directed to cause an examination to be made of the various positions not heretofore examined, within the waters of New York bay and its vicinity, which are adapted to the establishment and construction of dry docks, and to report their comparative advantages and disadvantages to the house of representatives at the opening of the next session of congress.

Mr. Galbraith, from the select committee upon the subject of banking operations and the re-issues of the notes of the bank of the United States, reported a bill providing for the punishment of re-issuing the notes of the late bank of the United States.

Mr. Everett took this occasion to disclaim any participation in the bill or report, never having seen either. The committee met soon after their appointment, when nothing was done. They were to wait the call of their chairman for their next meeting. He now understood they had had a meeting some days since, but of this he had had no notice to attend. The first notice he had was yesterday, when the chairman said that the committee proposed meeting that evening, at the lodgings of one of the members. Mr. E. informed him that he was too much indisposed to go out in the evening, but would attend any morning in the committee room at the house. He therefore disclaimed all share, or merit or responsibility for the bill or report.

Mr. Mason, of Maine, moved that 5,000 copies be printed. [Lies over.]

Mr. Thomas, from the committee on the judiciary, reported, with amendments, the senate bills entitled "an act supplementary to the act entitled an act to amend the judicial system of the United States," and "an act to alter and amend the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," approved 30th April, 1790, and, without amendment, the senate bill to extend the jurisdiction of the district court of the United States for the district of Arkansas. The last mentioned bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. Hannegan moved a suspension of the rule to enable him to submit a motion, that the house would take a recess this day from half past one to four o'clock.

Objections having been made, Mr. H. moved a suspension of the rules to allow him to make the motion. On that motion Mr. E. Whittlesey called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 103, nays 76, (not two-thirds.) So the rule was not suspended.

Several other ineffectual attempts were made to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking up business not in order.

The speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of the treasury, relative to claims to lands in Louisiana, in obedience to a resolution of the house of representatives of the 26th December last.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house passed to the orders of the day, and took up the naval appropriation bill; and after some time had been occupied in considering the item ($400,000) for fitting out the ship Pennsylvania, which was advocated at length by Mr. Sutherland, and opposed by Mr. Jarvis. The latter gentleman was proceeding, when Mr. Williams, of Kentucky, raised the point whether it was in order for the gentleman of Maine to proceed, there being no quorum present. And the very gentlemen (Mr. W. said) who had voted against the motion of Mr. Hannegan to suspend the rule were now absent from the house. The chair (Mr. Craig, of Virginia) at first decided that it was in order for debate to proceed; but, on subsequent reference to parliamentary law, decided that, in the absence of a quorum, business must be suspended. The chair then counted the members, and ascertained that eighty members only were present.—[No quorum.] After some desultory conversation, Mr. Briggs moved the house adjourn. Mr. E. Whittlesey asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: yeas 44, nays 69. [No quorum voting.] But the majority of members present refused to adjourn. Mr. Cambreleng moved a call of the house; which motion was rejected. Mr. Mercer suggested that a quorum was now present, and the speaker having counted, ascertained that 106 members only were within the bar. Mr. Boyd said he was perfectly satisfied that no quorum would be present. He moved an adjournment.

Mr. Cambreleng asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and thereupon Mr. B. withdrew his motion. Various other propositions for calls of the house for a recess, and for adjournment, were made and rejected; when Messrs. Granger and Briggs, having been appointed tellers, to ascertain the number of members present, reported one hundred and eleven. [No quorum.] After some other irregular motions, Mr. Wise moved that the sergeant-at-arms be directed to go to the president's house, and invite the members of this house to return. Mr. Reynolds moved that the house adjourn. Mr. Cambreleng asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were, yeas 47, nays 70. [No quorum voting.] But the majority of those present refused to adjourn. After various other propositions, which were not entertained, Mr. Hannegan moved that the house adjourn. Mr. E. Whittlesey called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were yeas 63, nays 56. So the motion was agreed to, and the house adjourned, (3 o'clock).

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In the senate. After other business had been disposed of, which will be noticed in our next, the bill of Mr. Clay to distribute for a limited time among the several states the proceeds of the sales of the public lands coming up in its order,

Mr. Clay said he was confident there would be no surplus of revenue if pending measures should be fulfilled. He would therefore not press the bill at this moment, and moved to lay it on the table, which was done accordingly.

The senate continued to debate the general subject of the reduction of the tariff, till the Intelligence of yesterday went to press. No decision had then been had on the duty upon salt.

In the house of representatives. Mr. Cambreleng, from the committee of ways and means, reported the senate bill entitled "an act designating and limiting the funds receivable for the revenues of the United States, with the following amendment as section 4:

"And be it further enacted, That no part of this act shall be construed as repealing any existing law relative to the collection of the revenue from customs or public lands, in the legal currency, or as substituting bank notes of any description as a lawful currency of coin, as provided in the constitution of the United States; nor to deprive the secretary of the treasury of the power to direct the collectors or the receivers of the public revenue, whether derived from duties, taxes, debts or sales of public lands, not to receive in payment of any sums due to the United States the notes of any bank or banks which the said secretary may have reason to believe unworthy of credit, or which he apprehends may be compelled to suspend specie payments."

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the bill, with the amendment, were ordered to be printed, and take their place on the speaker's table.

A number of petitions, reports and resolutions having been disposed of, a resolution was offered by Mr. Cambreleng, that from and after this day, the daily hour of meeting of the house shall be ten o'clock, and that there shall be a recess on each day from three till half past 4 o'clock, which was, after several attempts to amend it, adopted.

The house then took up the unfinished business, being the bill making appropriations for the naval service of 1837, which was amended and passed.

After numerous ineffectual motions in relation to other bills, the house, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, went into committee of the whole on the state of the union; Mr. Sutherland in the chair, on the bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1837, and was thus engaged at our last advices from Washington.

DOMESTIC CHRONICLE.

Growth of cotton in the U. States. An article in a late number of the Mobile Register gives an interesting account of the cotton growth of the United States. It says that in only four of the states, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Florida, has the cultivation of cotton increased. The whole of the crop of the United States in 1836, was estimated at 490,000,000 of pounds. The number of field hands, as correctly as could be ascertained, was supposed to be 340,000 valued at $800 each. The total capital invested in the growth of cotton in the U. States was estimated at $800,000,000. The great increase in the demand of slaves has enhanced their value enormously, and therefore, the above may be considered as falling far short of the actual value of property invested in the cultivation of cotton.

Banking in Mississippi. The legislature of Mississippi have passed an act incorporating the Mississippi Union bank, with a capital of fifteen and a half millions of dollars. It is to be located at Jackson, the seat of government, and to have branches in different parts of the state, for the accommodation of the citizens generally.

Money in the south. A few days ago the books were opened at Savannah for the subscription of the capital stock of the Savannah insurance and trust company—$500,000 divided into 5,000 shares of $100 each. So great was the competition for the stock that when the books were finally closed it was found that no less than 342,202 shares had been subscribed, on which thirty per cent. or $10,261,260 had been paid at the time of subscription.

Resignation of Daniel Webster. The Boston "Courier" of the 17th inst. says—"We have seen a letter from a gentleman at Washington, written on Tuesday, which says, Mr. Webster assured me to-day, that he should resign his seat in the senate at the end of the session. He says he has been fourteen years in succession a member of congress, from our state, and now must take a respite to attend to his own private affairs."

Indiana. The legislature of this state adjourned sine die, on the 6th inst. Her portion of the surplus has been divided—one half placed in bank, the interest to be applied to internal improvement; the other half to be loaned out by county commissioners, and the interest to be applied to the support of common schools.

A valuable pine tree. A tree which grew on some timber lands in Cuba, Allegany co. was felled and cut into saw logs last month. It produced 18 mill logs, nine of which were 12 feet long, and the others 16 feet long. These 18 logs, when sawed, would average 800 feet of inch boards, one-half clear stuff. The boards obtained from the single tree are worth, on the spot, ninety dollars! A very handsome dividend. [Albany Journal.]

Mr. Loyall of the Norfolk district in Virginia, will not be a candidate for re-election to congress.

Large oxen. Two oxen raised in New Bedford, were slaughtered this week, which weighed when dressed 2,800 lbs. The weight of each of them was as follows—1st ox, one side 585 lbs. one do. 577, tallow 203, hide 130—total 1,495 lbs. 2d ox, one side 512 lbs. one do. 511, tallow 163, hide 119.

Flour in Troy, New York. The last Troy Budget says that there is less flour now in Troy, and less wheat, than has been found here, at the same season of the year, for many years past. Let a few facts and comparisons illustrate our position. Last year at this time there were in the city nearly 30,000 barrels of flour. At this time the whole quantity does not exceed 4,000 barrels. Then flour sold at 7 dollars, now at 12 dollars per barrel. One house had at this time last year, wheat on hand sufficient for 2,000 bbls. of flour. At this time there are not 200 bushels of wheat here. Such is the difference found by the contrast between the winters of 1836 and 1837. It is believed by experienced men that the supply of flour in the city now is not more than sufficient for 3 or 4 weeks ordinary demand.

It is stated as a fact, which redounds much to the credit of Adams county, Pennsylvania, that there is not a single individual confined in the public prison at this time, either for crime or debt.

Herring. The Yarmouth (Mass.) Register relates of this interesting fish, that, in the year 1831, Ebenezer Nye and others, of Falmouth, for the purpose of admitting herring, opened an outlet from a fresh water pond, through the land, to the sea. To give the experiment a fair trial, they put a few dozen of live herrings into the pond. The second year after a few herrings were observed ascending the outlet into the pond, and since their numbers have been annually increasing? Last year twenty-five barrels were taken.

A snow storm in Vermont. The annexed sketch of a real snow storm is from a late letter:

"Never talk to me again about snow storms; you know nothing about them. I wish you could just peep at the snow here; we are almost buried in it. Absolutely, when Jimmy went on Monday morning to milk the cows, he was obliged to jump out of the second story window, the doors could not be opened; of course he was buried, but as the snow was light, he scrambled out. In the course of the day, with the assistance of men and horses, we got a little cleared out, so that it was possible to get to the wood shed, at least."

Ne-ah-mi-co, a distinguished chief and warrior of the Creek nation, died a few weeks ago near Fort Gibson. He was one of the principal hostile chiefs who committed the late massacres in Alabama, and was among the first party of emigrants who were sent through Arkansas state last fall to their new country.

Gen. Scott. A public dinner, in testimony of continued personal regard and undiminished confidence in his gallantry and patriotism, was last week tendered to maj. gen. WINFIELD SCOTT, at Richmond, by a number of citizens, and members of the legislature of Virginia. It was declined by the general, END OF VOLUME FIFTY-ONE.

on the ground of the delicacy of his position, as a military man, with the result of an official inquiry in his case then yet in suspense, (which has been since still further suspended by the executive).

Gen. Gaines, has addressed the following to the editor of the Frederick (Md.) "Times."

The editor of "the Times" of Frederick, Md. is respectfully requested to notify the author of "An Acrostic," which appeared in the Times of Thursday last, apparently intended for me, inasmuch as it embraces my name, that I have no claim whatever to the honors of the victory usually designated "the sortie" from Fort Erie. Our excellent general, Jacob Brown, was justly entitled to all the honors due to the commander-in-chief of the division in the achievement of that glorious victory. Respectfully, your most obedient servant,

EDMUND P. GAINES, U. S. army.

February 20, 1837.

The Legislature of Alabama adjourned on the 23d ult. after the passage of 179 acts. One of the acts passed by them raised the salaries of all the judges in the state.

They also incorporated a number of rail road companies, as follows:

The Linden rail road company; Mobile and New Orleans do. do.; Eagle rail road and lumber company; Florida and Georgia rail road do.; rail road from the Mississippi line to Mobile; Lexington and Woodville rail road company; Selma and Tennessee do. do.; Tallapoosa and Coosa do. do.; city of Alabama and Montgomery do. do.

Valuable recipes. How to make flour cheap.—Destroy it. How to make rents cheap. Tear down the houses. How to make meat cheap. Externalize the cattle. [N. Y. Jour. Com.]

To which the Philadelphia Herald adds— "How to make money plenty. Drive foreign capital out of the country, by showing Europeans that there is no protection for property or vested rights in this country."

Soup houses. The following is believed to be a correct statement of the number of persons supplied at four of the soup houses in Philadelphia. There is a fifth, for which no return has been had:

	Adults.	Children.
Southern	250	450
N. Liberties	423	649
Southwark	220	860
Spring Garden	148	250
	1,041	2,179—Total 3,220

Appointments by the president, by and with the advice and consent of the senate. George A. Porter, to be consul of the United States, for the port of Constantinople.

William H. Tracey, to be consul of the United States, for the port of Guayama, in the island of Porto Rico.

William B. Slaughter, to be secretary for the territory of Wisconsin.

A deaf and dumb printer and editor. A newspaper has been established at Canajoharie, in New York, printed, published and edited by Levi S. Backus, deaf and dumb, a native of Hebron, (Ct.) and educated as a charity scholar in the asylum at Hartford.

Missouri. The population of Missouri is estimated at 244,208 inhabitants, of whom 40,540 are slaves. There are fifty counties in the state, St. Louis being the largest, containing 19,993 inhabitants.

Missouri, so rich in internal resources, promises to possess one of the greatest iron companies in the world. A charter was recently obtained by a company to work the two celebrated Iron mountains of that state which they possess. The capital is five millions. A bed of anthracite has happily been discovered near the Iron mountains.

A new freak. The Oswego Advertiser states that, "in a cavern in the side of a small mountain in the Niagara district, U. Canada, water is continually oozing from the rock. This water freezes in summer and dissolves in winter; that as water grows cold in autumn and winter the ice melts away, but as spring opens it begins to freeze, and form large icicles, so that by harvest, they may be conveniently used to make ice water. Let those who are versed in the freaks of nature give us the why and wherefore of this strange variation from her general laws."
